

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE first volume of The Scottish Journal has now been brought to a close. As an experiment—a trial of the popular appreciation of a periodical devoted to times gone by, to facts illustrative of the history, literature, and social condition of past ages—we have reason to congratulate ourselves on its prospect of ultimate success. In the warm support we have experienced from contributors in the most distant parts of the country, and the aid of gentlemen devoted to antiquarian research in this the nucleus of Scottish literature, we feel satisfied that such a medium as the Journal is necessary. Apart from the gratification that may be derivable from its pages, its use, as a repository for the preservation of stray documents of historical, family, or literary interest, must be obvious, and, we believe, is felt by all who patronize the publication.

Although, however, the experiment has proven, beyond doubt, that the circle of antiquarian readers has been greatly extended of late years; it has also, we think, shown as unequivocally that it yet must undergo a very considerable extension before it is wide enough to support a periodical at the low price of Three-halfpence. When the Scottish Journal was first proposed, Twopence was conceived to be the lowest charge upon which any reasonable calculation of covering the outlay could be founded; indeed, in this conviction, a portion of the prospectuses were printed off; but circumstances afterwards induced us to come down to what seems to be the minimum rate of any thing like respectability among the numerous class of cheap publications. Having made trial of this low standard for six months, and finding that the returns are not such as to warrant the continuation of the publication, we have, after mature consideration, resolved to adopt the price originally proposed. The Scottish Journal will therefore be published at Twopence each number, in place of Three-halfpence, in future—the Parts, of course, undergoing a corresponding increase of price.

While we professedly look chiefly for support to the upper classes of society—to those who have not only more leisure, but, from their education and associations, feel more interest in antiquarian and family research—we are not unmindful of one of the original leading objects of the Journal, which was to foster a popular love of inquiry into the past, and provide a cheap medium for its gratification. Keeping this aim steadily in view—and at Twopence the Journal must still be regarded as cheap—we shall continue the weekly issue, though it would probably be our interest to publish monthly only.

Having thus candidly stated the reasons for this change in the financial feature of the Journal, we may also mention that we are sanguine of effecting no small improvement in its literary conduct. Much time and research are no doubt requisite for the proper fulfilment of our editorial duties; but we trust, by the continued favours of our literary friends, and the growing patronage of the public, gradually to render the Journal in all respects what it ought to be.

Topography, Antiquities, Traditions,
&c. &c.

No. 1.

Edinburgh, Saturday, September 4, 1847.

Price 1½d.

INTRODUCTION.

HE literature of the present age is decidedly light, with a tendency towards the frivolous. Whether this has been produced by a depreciated taste on the part of the public, or fostered by the press—which teems with aimless imaginings—may be a question for philosophical decision, but of little practical importance. That the fact is so, must be admitted. It is gratifying, at the same time, to know that, amidst this waste of intellect, there is yet no small degree of health and soundness at the core of society. While the masses have been amusing themselves by the waysides of literature, pleased with fanciful gleanings, a spirit of industrious research has been at work, throwing light on the dark pages of history—to instruct alike the present and future generations by a knowledge of the past. The Archaeological Societies and Literary Clubs of England, Ireland, and Scotland, have been the means of excavating a mine of curious and instructive matter—details upon which the student of the world's history and of human nature can dwell with profit and satisfaction. The result of their labours, it is true, are patent only to a comparatively small circle—those who take a more immediate interest in affairs belonging to “the olden time”—still there has been of late years a considerable increase amongst the students of antiquity.

The great object of THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL will be to promote a still farther increase—to render accessible, through a cheap medium, the stores of intellectual recreation and delight which, at present, are as a sealed book to the mass of readers. To do this effectually, it may be necessary, perhaps, to popularise, as it were, the subjects brought forward in the Journal—to present them in an attractive and easily digested form; but, though this may be judicious, it is quite a mistake to suppose that the page of antiquity is dry and forbidding. On the contrary, it presents innumerable enticing features. It has a wide range in the “romance of history”—the acts of nations and of individuals long gone by—abounding in incident quite as novel as the most highly-wrought fictions of the day; while, in the elucidation of the habits, the manners, the amusements and sentiments of former times, there is a pleasure which grows with our acquisition of knowledge. At the same time, we form a standard by which to contrast the present with the past—enabling us to form a better idea of our own position on the map of time, and adding materially to the resources, the happiness of a discursive mind. Many things looked upon by the multitude as novelties, inventions of this ingenious and all-engrossing age, are but a revival of the speculations, the schemes, and devices of our grandfathers.

In the prosecution of the object contemplated by THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL, it will be the endeavour of its Conductors to take advantage of the endless diversity embraced in the extensive sphere of their labours, so as to present a periodical acceptable to almost every class of readers. As its title implies, it will contain Topographical Descriptions—Battle Fields and other places of interest.

Accounts of Ancient Remains.

Discoveries of Antiquities.

Papers on former Habits, Manners, Customs, Laws, &c.

Historical and Biographical Sketches.

Extracts from Old Manuscripts and Rare Books.

Effusions of the Olden Muse, with Illustrative Notes.

Traditions,—not dressed up and lengthened into Tales, but veritable Traditions.

Reviews of Antiquarian Publications.

Varieties, &c. &c.

The Conductors of the JOURNAL are already in possession of considerable supplies, from which to amplify their columns; and they have great pleasure in stating that they have the cordial support of a number of literary gentlemen in Edinburgh and the provinces, who have a taste for the lore of “other years.” At the same time, they invite correspondence; and parties who favour them with old writings, or copies of them—and many curious and interesting documents are to be found in the charter chests of families—may rest assured of the utmost attention being paid to their communications. The JOURNAL, not limited to Scottish subjects alone, will embrace whatever may be deemed suitable and worthy in reference to the sister and foreign kingdoms.

EARLY RECORDS OF SCOTLAND.

THE loss of the early records of Scotland—seriously felt by the historian and genealogist—has occasioned no small doubt as to the real history and condition of the country previous to the existence of such writings of authority as have been preserved. The fabulous details of some of our Scottish historians, zealous to fill the gap occasioned by the absence of national documents, tended to a disbelief even of the truth; and a very general impression prevailed, not long since, that Scotland possessed no written memorials beyond the reign of Robert the Bruce. There was a tradition amongst the mass that Edward I. of England had carried away most of the public records; but still, as their bearing and importance were unknown, they were deemed of little moment. It was impossible, however, for the most rapacious hand to blot out the entire evidence of a nation's rights—obliterating every mark of civilization: and, fortunately for Scotland, her progress in European civilization was sufficiently decided to render the work of annihilation next to impossible. In the chartularies of her monasteries there existed sufficient evidence of the wealth and learning of the country at an early period, and various manuscripts, preserved by the monks, have thrown unquestionable light on her political and social state. But the elucidation of these has been a work of time—a work greatly retarded by the various protracted wars and civil commotions which continued, with brief interruptions, from the time of Edward I. downwards. Subsequent to the dispute about the succession, which gave rise to the war of independence, Scotland may be said to have retrograded for several centuries—indeed, until the accession of the first James, who fell a victim in the patriotic endeavour to reconstruct the social system. We have but faint glimpses of the state of Scotland during the Roman, Pictish and Scottish epochs; but there can be little doubt of her gradual advancement in wealth and civilization after the union of the Pictish and Scottish crowns in 843, until she attained a high degree of both in the reign of Alexander III. The loss of the public records, during so interesting a period, is deeply to be deplored.

The first known ravage of the national archives was committed in 1292, when Edward I., to whom the question of succession had been submitted, ordered such records as were in the castle of Edinburgh, or other strong places in Scotland, to be transmitted to Berwick-upon-Tweed. An inventory of these records is still preserved in the chapter-house of Westminster. It is entitled "Catalogus munimentorum quæ capta fuerunt in thesauria de Edenburg, in presentia Abbatum de Dumfermelyn and de Sancta Cruce Edenburgi, and Johannis de Lythe granes Ballivi de Lincoln, and Thomæ de Fisseburne, et Willielmi de Dumfreys custodis rotulorum regni Scotiæ, et deposita apud Berwick vicesimo tertio die Augusti, anno 20 Edwardi Primi regis Angliæ, per præceptum ejusdem regis, superioris domini regni Scotiæ." Several of the charters and other documents enumerated—chronicles of events, &c.—refer to the reign of David I., who ascended the throne in 1124. A roll marked "A roll of the ancient laws of the kingdom of Scotland"—unus rotulus de antiquis sta- tutis regni Scotiæ—shows that what was considered ancient in 1292 must have originated several centuries previously. From a catalogue of the records purporting to have been restored to Scotland, after the decision in favour of Baliol, it is evident that there had been another removal of public documents in 1292—the latter to Roxburgh castle. The list is entirely different from the "catalogus munimentorum," and enumerates a great variety of documents. But a still more sweeping devastation followed. On the formal surrender of the crown and kingdom of Scotland by Baliol, Edward, in 1296, took uncontrolled possession of the country—and, no doubt, of all its accessible records. There are three schedules in the chapter-house at Westminster, entitled, in Agarde's Index, "Tres schedulæ facientes mentionem de bullis, chartis, et aliis memorandis inventis in thesauro regis Scotiæ, apud Edinburgh, 20 Edw. I." One of these rolls, or schedules, contains an inventory of instruments inspected by the order of King Alexander III., in 1282, in the treasury at Edinburgh. Many of the papers enumerated, consist of negotiations with Norway and other foreign countries, besides numerous public and private charters. Whether these documents were destroyed by Edward, or lost through carelessness, is a question. Some circumstances favour the belief that the latter was the case. Had he destroyed them, it is scarcely to be supposed that the charter by King Richard of England, discharging the concession of superiority extorted by his father from William—a decisive refutation of Edward's claim to the superiority of Scotland—would have escaped him. It is preserved amongst the charters of King Richard to King William. In 1651, Cromwell followed the example of Edward, by carrying away the public records to London, and though the greater part of them were returned after the Restoration, an irreparable loss was entailed by the shipwreck of eighty-five hogsheads of papers on their way from London—a small portion of them only being saved. But it is not to be wondered that many of the documents should have gone amissing or been destroyed, from the loose manner in which they were kept, both in England and Scotland, until a very recent period.

It was not till towards the close of last century that due attention began to be paid to the preservation of the public registers. The Right Honourable Lord Frederick Campbell, Lord Clerk-Register of Scotland, acted with much enthusiasm in his official capacity. He not only caused a thorough arrangement to be made of the documents extant—but exerted every means in his power to recover those that were known to be missing. At his desire, an index of lost charters was drawn up in 1798, by William Robertson, Esq., one of the deputies of the Lord Clerk-Register for keeping the records of Scotland, and printed with a view to lead to their discovery. This volume is entitled "An Index, drawn up about the year 1629, of many Records of Charters, granted by the different sovereigns of Scotland, between the years 1309 and 1413, most of which records have been long missing, with an introduction, giving a state, founded upon authentic documents, still preserved, of the ancient Records of Scotland, which were in that kingdom in 1292," &c. In this well-executed work, the editor says,—

"The Lord Clerk-Register for Scotland, Lord Frederick Campbell, some years ago, in attending to the duties of his office, observed the perishing condition of the Parliamentary Records of Scotland, and formed the design of getting them printed for the public benefit, as the Journals of both Houses and the Parliamentary Rolls had been done in England.

"Preparatory for this Work, the Editor transcribed, with his own hand, as much of the earliest and most decayed part of these Parliamentary Records as would make up two Folio Volumes; and was directed, by the Lord Register, as soon as the business of his office would permit, to make an accurate research in the Tower of London, and in the Chapter-House at Westminster, to ascertain whether these ancient repositories contained any materials, from which the defects in the Parliamentary Records of Scotland might be supplied, it being well known, that King Edward I. had carried to England all the Records prior to the reign of King Robert I.

"In the mean time, Mr Astle, one of the Trustees of the British Museum, whose knowledge in historical antiquity is not less known than his anxious endeavours to make it useful to the public, informed the Lord Register, that he had discovered some curious Manuscripts in the British Museum respecting Scotland, and in particular the Index now printed.

"He likewise informed the Lord Register of a still more important discovery, which he had made as Keeper of his Majesty's State-Paper Office, which was a Quarto Manuscript on Vellum, written in a character of great antiquity, and which, besides Transcripts of many Deeds relative to Scotch affairs, contained Minutes of several Parliaments of Scotland antecedent to the earliest Parliaments mentioned in the printed Statute-Book.

"In consequence of this very important information, the Lord Register directed copies to be immediately made, both of the Index in the Museum, and the Quarto Manuscript in the State-Paper Office, pressing the Editor to repair to London as soon as he conveniently could, for the purpose of more effectually carrying on the intended research in all the above-mentioned repositories.

"The Editor accordingly, in August 1793, repaired to London, where his first care was to collate the two copies above-mentioned with their originals.

"The Index of Charters was found to be No. 4609, of the Harleian Manuscripts at the British Museum; and on the first page of that Index, at the top of it, there is written as follows:—

"This Book contains Lists or Inventories of several Rolls or Records of Charters, granted by King Robert I., King David II., King Robert II., and King Robert III., successive Kings of Scotland.*

"This List is the more valuable, as several of these Rolls are lost."

"On an attentive examination, this Index was found to comprehend Twelve Rolls and One Book of Charters which now exist, and have always been kept with the other Public Records of Scotland.

"But besides these, it comprehends and relates to a much greater number of Rolls and Books of Charters which are not now to be found in the Public Records of Scotland. The number falling under this description is no less than Fifty-one Rolls of Royal Charters, and Three Books, consisting partly of Charters, partly of Decrees in Parliament.

"These Fifty-one Rolls and Three Books, together

* It contains also charters granted by Robert Duke of Albany as Regent of Scotland.

with Two Rolls of Decrees in Parliament, though proved by this Index to have been known and patent to inspection in the year 1629, have been mislaid or disappeared during so long a period, that neither the Editor, nor any person known to him, had any knowledge of their having ever existed, till he had access to and perused the Index which makes the subject of the present publication.

"The Fifty-one Rolls and Three Books above mentioned as now existing in the Public records of Scotland, seem to have contained about 1845 Charters and 30 Decrees in Parliament, exclusive of the contents of the two Rolls of Decrees in Parliament mentioned, which do not appear to be particularly stated in the Index.

"The manuscript discovered by Mr Astle in the State-Paper Office was, on examination, found to be the most ancient Book of Scottish Record now known to exist, and in every respect so curious and important, that the Lord Register thought it incumbent on him to endeavour to recover it, for the purpose of its being preserved in the Records of that part of the Kingdom to which it incontestably appeared to have belonged.

"For this purpose a petition was presented to his Majesty, who was graciously pleased to order the Manuscript Book to be removed from the State-Paper Office at London, with which it had no connection, and to be delivered to the Lord Register of Scotland, that it might be deposited in the General Register-Office kept at Edinburgh for the preservation of the Public Records belonging to that part of the kingdom.

"This Manuscript Book having been brought by the Lord Register to Scotland in November 1793, it was judged proper that it should be submitted to the examination of the Supreme Court of that country, in order to its receiving the sanction of that Court."

Believing it impossible that "about 1845 Charters, and 30 Decrees of Parliament should have all perished by accident"—and still more so, "that they should have been intentionally destroyed," the hope of discovering at least some of them was not deemed altogether chimerical from "recent instances of discoveries similar to those now sought after," which are detailed as follows:—

"First Instance. The Index discovered at the Museum, No. 4609, appeared on inspection to be written in a character considerably more modern than the year 1629, when the original Index was formed; whence it was concluded that the Museum Index could only be a copy of the original Index. There was little probability, however, of finding the Index from which the Museum copy had been made; but fortunately that Index was, in the month of November 1794, discovered, and appears to be the very Index from which the copy in the Museum had been made. It was found about fifteen months after the Museum Index had been first seen by the Editor. The subjoined note,* written on that Index at the moment it was discovered, will shew whence it came.

"Second Instance. When the ancient Manuscript

* "This Manuscript Index of Royal Charters, and of some Parliamentary Proceedings, was brought to the General Register-House by Robert Hamilton, Esq., Advocate, along with some other Manuscripts, on Monday the 17th of November 1794; all which Manuscripts, this Index as well as the rest, Mr Hamilton said were the property of William Hamilton Esq. of Wishaw.

WILLM. ROBERTSON.
ALEX. ROBERTSON."

Book before mentioned was received from the State-Paper Office, it was not supposed to have any connection, with the contents of the Index found at the Museum. But it has since been clearly discovered to have been in the hands of the compiler of that Index, and that part of it is there included; consequently that ancient Manuscript Book has been carried out of Scotland posterior to the year 1629, when the Index was made out; a fact strongly corroborated by a short marginal note on the verso of the 9th leaf of that Book of Record itself.

"Third instance. In the year 1785, Twenty-nine Volumes of Records relative to the Thirds of the Popish Benefices in Scotland, appropriated by the Legislature for the support of the Reformed Clergy,* were found amongst the papers of a Gentleman of business† at Edinburgh some months after his death.

"The latest instance of similar discoveries was in October 1794, when Eight Volumes of the Secretary of State's Register of Seisins‡ for the district of Edinburgh and Haddington, were discovered in a bookseller's shop in Edinburgh. That Register having been abolished in the year 1609, those Eight Books had of course remained concealed, and that not ten miles from Edinburgh, during more than 185 years.

"Those Eight Books of the Secretary's Register, and the Twenty-nine Volumes relating to the Thirds of Benefices, were, like the Manuscript Book got from the State-Paper Office, submitted to the judgment of the Court of Session, and after being accurately examined by different committees of the Judges, they were by that Supreme Court all declared to be authentic Public Records, and were appointed to be lodged as such among the other Records in the General Register-House."

This well-designed effort of the Lord Clerk-Register was not without effect. Not many years ago, some important documents were discovered at Tynninghame castle, the seat of the Earl of Haddington, and a Register, recording the proceedings of parliament from 1384 till 1400. The Earl of the time was Clerk-Register to James VI., and they had no doubt been deposited there and lost sight of. More recently still, three original Rolls of Parliament, of the reign of David II.—1368 and 1369,—and of the General Council and Parliament of Robert II.—1388 and 1389—were brought to the Register-Office by a person who would give no information as to where they came from. Part of the Scottish Statute-Book was printed in 1541. Of late years very considerable progress has been made in printing the public documents, so that they may be more easily consulted, and better secured against accident and the ravages of time. The Crown Charters, Retours and Acts of Parliament, have all been printed at the expense of the State. The first volume of the Acts—being the last put to press—was only completed in 1844. It is compiled chiefly from old manuscripts—particularly of Regium Majestatem—of which the following is a list:—

The Berne (in Switzerland) manuscript.
The Register of Arbroath.
The Ayr manuscript.
The Bute manuscript.
The Cromartie manuscript.
The Advocates' Library manuscript.
The Edinburgh University manuscript.
Alexander Foulis' manuscript.
The manuscript in the Advocates' Library.
The Harleian manuscript.
The Drummond manuscript.
The Cambridge manuscript.
The Cockburn manuscript.
The manuscript in Advocates' Library.
The Monynet manuscript.
The Colvil manuscript.
The Cambridge manuscript.
John Bannatyne manuscript.
The Lambeth manuscript.
The Cuk manuscript.
Thomas Bannatyne manuscript.
The Malcolm manuscript.
The Hailes manuscript.
The First Skene manuscript.
The Last Skene manuscript, and
The Marchmont manuscript.

These manuscripts—so many copies of the same code of laws—were used by the burghs and professional persons in the same way that the printed statutes are now. They differed, however, in many respects—and were subject, like all manuscript books, to interpolation. Hence the necessity, in printing the first volume of the Scottish Acts of Parliament, of careful collation. The Ayr manuscript is considered one of the most important, as containing the only existing body of statutes passed in the reign of Robert I., to which age the manuscript belongs. It appears to have been the property of the burgh of Ayr in the 15th century; or perhaps the Clerk of the Council or Guildry of that burgh. Of its later history nothing is known. It was purchased at a book-stall in Ayr, in the year 1824, by Mr Ebenezer Thomson, one of the masters in the Ayr Academy, from whom it was acquired for the General Register-House at Edinburgh.

It is an octavo volume, still in old oak boards, containing 83 leaves of vellum, 8 inches high, by 5 inches wide, written in a fine and uniform hand.

§ 1.—The first article is a collection of laws. The title of the second chapter is "Brene eiusdem."

* See Act 10 of the Scots Parliament 1567. This was called the Assumption of Thirds.

† "Namely, Roderick Macleod, Esq., who was admitted a Clerk to his Majesty's Signet in the year 1732, and died at an advanced age in 1784. The volumes were in a trunk, which probably had been sent locked to Mr Macleod by some of his employers, and had remained in his custody unopened among other trunks and boxes, till the circumstances of their being there deposited were forgotten. As soon as William Macleod Bannatyne, Esq. of Kaima, Advocate, the son of the deceased Mr Macleod, understood the nature of the volumes, he, with exemplary propriety, immediately transmitted them to the General Repository of the Records. Of those volumes, the earliest is for the year 1576, and the latest for the year 1615.

‡ "The Secretary's Register, as it is called, was the first attempt to introduce our most useful Record, that of Seisins. But having been committed to the superintendence of the Secretary of State instead of the Lord Clerk-Register, and most of the Books having remained concealed, and many of them having been lost in consequence of their not being made transmissible to public custody, the institution became useless, and was abolished by Act of Parliament. The Register of Seisins in its present form was instituted in the month of June 1617."

The remaining part of the section consists of 36 chapters, the greater part of which are printed in the 4th book of "Regium Majestatem," though in some instances with different titles.

§ 2.—Is a Treaty for the Submission and Settlement of the Scotch border after the battle of Durham.

§ 3.—In a much later hand, Notes of the Ayr Court of Guild, 1430–1, with lists, apparently of the brethren of Guild, resident both within and without the burgh. They fill about 4 pages.

§ 4.—A list of all the remaining contents of the volume.

§ 6.—De Articulis inquirendis in Burgo, in itinere Camerarii secundum usum Scocie. At the end is a reference to the battle of Bannockburn, and the parliamentary proceedings at Cambuskeneth.

§ 7.—Capitula Capelle Regis Scocie tam de literis in Curiis Racitandis quam de Brenibus per Regem de Cancellaria mittendis.—A collection of breves and royal writs of great interest and value.

§ 8.—Assise Regis David facte apud Strivelyn.

§ 9.—Statuta Regni facta per Regem Robertum.

§ 10.—Leges Burgorum Scocie.

§ 11.—Statuta Gilde apud Berwicum facta.

§ 12.—Additional Notes of the Ayr Court of Guild.

§ 13.—A Kalendar. On VII. Idus Julii is commemorated Dedicatio ecclesie de Jedot (burgh), which, with another entry (the Border Treaty of 1346), leads to the conjecture that this volume was at first connected with the East Marches, though afterwards transferred to Ayr.

TO

LADY MARY MONTGOMERY.

(BY WILLIAM HAMILTON OF BANGOUR.)

SAY, thou with endless beauty crown'd,
Of all the youth that sigh around,
Thy worshippers, and anxious wait
From thy bright eyes their future fate;
Say, whom do most these eyes approve?
Whom does Montgomery choose to love?
Not him, who strives to build a name,
From ruins of another's fame:
Who proud in self-conceit throws down
His neighbour's wit, to raise his own.
Should the vain man expect success,
The fool of compliment and dress?
Thy eyes undazzled can behold,
The gaudy nothing deckt in gold.
Thy wise discernment soon descries,
Where folly lurks in wit's disguise;
Trac'd through each shape in which 'tis seen,
Through the grave look, the solemn mien;
The proud man's front, the vain man's walk,
The foplin's dress, the coxcomb's talk.
A large estate, and little sense,
To charms like thine have no pretence.
Shalt thou, O insolent! prevail?
Heav'n never meant its goods for sale:
Beauty, the pearl of price, is giv'n,
Not bought, 'tis the free grace of Heav'n.
The happy youth with arts refin'd,
Simple of heart, of steadfast mind:
Whom thirst of gain could never draw
To trespass friendship's sacred law:

Whose soul the charms of sense inspire;
Who loves, where reason bids admire:
Cautious to shun, with wise disdain,
The proud, the airy, and the vain.
Him whom these virtues shall adorn,
Thou, fair Montgomery, wilt not scorn:
Of all the gifts of Heav'n possess,
To him thou yield'st thy willing breast;
For him the blush, with modest grace,
Glow's rosy, o'er thy blooming face:
For him thy panting bosom swells,
And on thy lips such sweetness dwells.
Crown'd with success, the happy boy
Shall revel in excess of joy:
While in thy presence, heav'n appears
In sweets laid up for many years.
The bean and witting then shall fly,
The fop in secret corner sigh;
Condemn'd to cry in love's despair,
Ah! why so wise who was so fair?

The subject of this very happy offering of the muse was Lady Mary Montgomery, daughter of Archibald, ninth Earl of Eglinton, by his second Countess, Lady Anne, daughter of George, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord High Chancellor of Scotland. Lady Mary was distinguished as well for her good sense and amiable disposition as for her beauty. The object of her choice—

"The happy youth, with arts refin'd, Simple of heart, of steadfast mind,"

was Sir David Cuninghame of Milncraig, Bart., a property in Ayrshire.

Of the author, the accomplished William Hamilton of Bangour, we possess no proper memoir. The short biographical sketch prefixed to the edition of his poems, published in 1790 by "W. Gordon, Bookseller in the Parliament Close," gives few particulars beyond the year of his birth and the day of his death. Though his poems have been much admired, and some of his songs—which first graced The Tea-Table Miscellany—are to be found in almost every lyrical collection that has issued from the press since the days of Ramsay, the utmost ignorance prevailed as to his history and family. Even the very locality of Bangour came to be a matter of doubt. In Anderson's British Poets, published in 1794, Bangour is said to be in Ayrshire; Campbell, in his British Poets, published in 1819, repeats the same statement; so does Allan Cuninghame, in his Collection of English and Scotch Songs. In Burke's "Landed Gentry," a work which ought to be of authority, and where some account is given of the descendants of the poet, the designation of the present representative runs thus:—"Hamilton, James, Esq. of Bangour, Co. Ayr, and of Ninewar, East Lothian." In the "History of the House of Hamilton," Bangour is said to be in Linlithgow; and in a paper, in the "Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries," furnished by James Chalmers, Esq., London, nephew of George Chalmers, author of Caledonia, who supplies a number of details respecting the life of Hamilton,* Bangour and Ninewar are put down as in West Lothian. In Chambers' "Lives of Distinguished and Illustrious Scotsmen," the writer of the biography of Hamilton, who has evidently been indebted to Mr Chalmers' notes, states that "he was descended from the Hamiltons of Little Earnock in Ayrshire; his great-grandfather, James Hamilton (second son of John Hamilton of Little

Earnock), being the founder of the family of Bangour." By the way, John, not James, was the name of the great-grandfather of the poet. Such contradictory statements are rather surprising, referring, as they do, to a simple matter of fact, which could have been ascertained beyond question by a little trouble. Fullarton & Co.'s Gazetteer of Scotland is the only work in which we have found the birth-place of the poet accurately stated; but even there, as if the genius of blundering were inseparable from the subject, the writer falls into a serious mistake, in stating that his ancestors were "of that ilk," a designation which would elevate them, as the head of all the Hamiltons, above the ducal house itself.

William Hamilton of Bangour, born in 1704, was the second son of James Hamilton, advocate, of Bangour,* parish of Uphall, in Linlithgowshire, which had been possessed by the family for some time previously. His grandfather and great-grandfather, descended of the Hamiltons of Earnock, near Hamilton, in Lanarkshire, are both mentioned in the testament of Sir Walter Stewart of Allanton, who died in March 1652. They are amongst the "holl friendis" appointed as overseers to his lady and daughter in the management of his property, and are designated "Johne Hamiltone of Bangor", Jon. Hamiltone his eldest lawⁿ sone and appeirand air.† James Hamilton, the poet's father, was a commissioner of supply for Linlithgow, appointed by parliament in 1696. His mother was an heiress of that county.‡ The writer of the brief sketch, in the edition of Hamilton's poems already alluded to, says "he was a gentleman of an opulent fortune, and of an ancient and honourable family." By the same authority, we are informed that he "had all the advantages of a liberal and polite education. His taste, like his studies, was unconfined, but his peculiar genius for poetry appeared at an early time of life. It was improved by a lively imagination, an exquisite delicacy of sentiment, an extensive acquaintance with the belles lettres, and a thorough knowledge of the world."

When twenty years of age, Hamilton was one of the gentlemen contributors to The Tea-Table Miscellany. He wrote the lines "To the Countess of Eglington, with the Gentle Shepherd," in 1725—being then twenty-one. "As he wrote entirely for his own amusement," continues the writer already quoted, "and that of his particular friends, few, if any, of his pieces were prepared for the press by himself. A collection of several of them was first published at Glasgow in 1748—(and afterwards reprinted)—not only without his name, but without his consent, and even without his knowledge. He was then abroad, and it was hoped the appearance of that collection would have drawn from him a more perfect edition. But though after his return, he corrected many errors of the Glasgow copy, occasioned by the inadvertency of transcribers, and considerably enlarged some of the poems, he did not live to make a new and complete publication. * * * Mr Hamilton possessed the social virtues in an eminent degree. His writings breathe the passions which he felt, and are seldom cold or inanimate. The qualities of his heart and head were equally remarkable; and, in short, he was, in the proper sense of the word, a fine gentleman."

The notes respecting the life of Hamilton, furnished by Mr Chalmers in the Transactions of the Society of Antiquaries, sufficiently account for the paucity of information in the biographical sketch we have just been quoting from. Although a death-blow had been given to the hopes of the Stuarts by the defeat at Culloden, still political feeling ran high—and a degree of caution was necessary in the statement of facts. Hamilton married his first wife, Katherine, daughter of Sir James Hall of Dunglass, in 1743; yet, domestic and warm as were his affections, his national and poetic enthusiasm prompted him to espouse the cause of Prince Charles in 1745. After the battle of Prestonpans, he celebrated the victory by an ode, which was printed and circulated, and set to music by Macgibbon. It does not, for obvious reasons, appear in Gordon's edition of his poems; but it is published both in Anderson's and Alexander Chalmers' editions of the British Poets.

Hamilton's wife died in October 1745, leaving him an only son. This circumstance, which must have made a deep impression on his sensitive mind, prevented him, in all probability, from taking a more active part in the rebellion—for he is not known to have borne arms in the ranks of the Prince. He felt greatly overwhelmed by the result of the conflict at Culloden. A soliloquy, published in the Scots Magazine in 1746, gives expression to his feelings. It is as follows:—

Mysterious inmate of this breast,
Enkindled by thy flame;
By thee my being's best exprest,
For what thou art I am.

With thee I claim celestial birth,
A spark of heaven's own ray;
Without thee sink to vilest earth,
Inanimated clay.

Now in this sad and dismal hour
Of multiply'd distress,
Has any former thought the power
To make thy sorrows less.

When all around thee cruel snares
Threaten thy destin'd breath,
And every sharp reflection bears
Want, exile, chains or death;

Can ought that past in youth's fond reign
Thy pleasing vein restore,
Lives beauty's gay and festive train
In memory's soft store?

Or does the Muse? 'Tis said her art
Can fiercest pangs appease.
Can she to thy poor trembling heart
Now speak the words of peace?

Yet she was wont at early dawn
To whisper thy repose,
Nor was her friendly aid withdrawn
At grateful evening's close.

Friendship, 'tis true, its sacred might,
May mitigate thy doom;
As lightning shot across the night,
A moment gilds the gloom.

O God! thy providence alone
Can work a wonder here,
Can change to gladness every moan,
And banish all my fear.

Thy arm, all powerful to save,
May every doubt destroy;
And from the horrors of the grave,
New raise to life and joy.

From this, as from a copious spring,
Pure consolation flows;
Makes the faint heart midst sufferings sing,
And midst despair repose.

* There is a Barngor, or Bangour, in Ayrshire. Hew Lacey had a charter of "the 1d. land of Dundrome, Blaidache, Barngor, Kilmechanache, &c., in vic. de. air," from Robert the Bruce—Robertson's Index of Charters. Dundrome is evidently a misprint for Sondrome (now called Sundrum), in which barony, in the parish of Coyton, Barngor is situated. It was possessed for many centuries by a branch of the Crawford family.

† Commissary Records of Glasgow.

‡ Chalmers.

Yet from its creature, gracious Heaven,
Most merciful and just,
Asks but for life and safety given,
Our faith and humble trust.

Having thus committed himself—for, although his poetical effusions were published anonymously, they were known to be his composition by a wide circle—he found it necessary to retire to the Highlands, where he lurked for some time—suffering much discomfort, both bodily and mentally.* He, however, escaped to France, and lived there for three years in close retirement. Taking no part in the cogitations of the Jacobites while abroad, his friends at home were enabled to make up his peace with government, and he returned to his native land in 1749. It was while absent, in exile, that some of his poems were collected and printed.

In consequence of the death of his elder brother, who died unmarried, Hamilton succeeded to the family estates in 1750. He had never possessed a robust constitution, and the fatigues to which he had been exposed after Culloden, greatly impaired his health. Going abroad for the benefit of a warmer climate, he died, at Lyons on the 25th March 1754, in the 50th year of his age. His body was brought home, and interred in the Abbey Church of Holyrood. Hamilton married a second time, but the name of the lady is not known. She survived him for twenty-five years, and died in 1779. He had no issue by this marriage. His son James, by his first wife, succeeded him; and the present representative of the family is, as already stated, his great grandson.

Besides the preceding address to Lady Mary Montgomery, Hamilton wrote lines to her ladyship, in the Spenserian style, on seeing her sit to her picture, beginning,

"When Lindsay drew Montgomerie, heavenly maid," &c.

VALLEY OF DALRYMPLE—"CONQUEIST" OF THE BARONY OF THAT NAME.

BY A SOJOURNER ON THE BANKS OF THE DOON.

DALRYMPLE is the name of a parish in Ayrshire. The much celebrated Doon divides it from the parish of Kirkmichael, on the east. The church, and the few houses which constitute the original village of Dalrymple, stand in a picturesque bend on the margin of the river. A modern, but truly rural and lovely village, consisting of two sides of a square, has sprung up on the plain immediately adjacent. It has been questioned, but there can be little doubt, that the etymology, like that of most other places of old standing in Scotland, is Celtic. By the Highlander, who knew no English, at this day it would be called Dail-a'-chruim-puill—signifying the dale of the crooked pool. The change from pure Gaelic to Dalrymple may easily be accounted for, from our dislike of aspirate sounds, and a propensity to abbreviate. The a', because almost silent in the Gaelic—and the ch, because aspirate, would both be taken away, leaving the word to be written or pronounced Dalruim-puill, or more simply, Dalrimpill, which is the usual spelling in old documents.

Dail-a'-chruim-puill, even at this day, is accurately descriptive of the valley or dale where stand the church and village of Dalrymple, and it would be still more so at the time the name was given. The Doon, which intersects the level, turns and bends considerably; but anciently it was much more crooked.

* Chalmers.

The outline of the old course of the river, from below Nether Skeldon, till it reaches the village, is still traceable—describing almost the figure S.

It is said by our old historians that a great battle was fought on the banks of the Doon, between the Roman legions and the Scots and Picts, in which the former suffered severely, and the latter were defeated with great loss. On the Dalrymple side of the Doon, at the head of the plain called Barbieston-holm, a tumulus existed some years ago—in which, when broken up, a skeleton was found in a stone coffin, of gigantic stature, and a number of Roman and British weapons. Another cairn remained until lately, nearly at the bottom of the holm, at a place which bears the name of Saint Valley, probably from its having been the site of a Romish chapel. In this cairn several Roman and British relics were also discovered—one of them, a bronze pitcher, is preserved at the manse. These are evidences of some conflict or other having taken place, at a remote period, between the "conquerors of the world" and the native tribes of Caledonia.

It has been objected by some, who look merely at the existing features of the country, that the valley, on the Dalrymple side of the river, is too small to have been the arena of a great battle. But when the ancient course of the Doon is taken into consideration, this objection falls to the ground. There are various other circumstances corroborative of the accuracy of the old historians. Within the circle of a few miles are the remains of no less than five British fortlets on the surrounding eminences, all commanding a view of the valley. One of these, the highest, describes the summit of the Downans hills—rendered famous by Burns, in his poem of Hallowe'en—

"Upon that night, when fairies light,
On Cassillis Downans dance."

The Roman road from Kirkcudbright by Dalmellington to Ayr, portions of which still remain, followed, at some distance, the course of the Doon, on the Kyle side of it, till, at a farm called Linston, where one of the fortlets is to be found, it deviated northward in the direction of Ayr. Chalmers, in his Caledonia, argues that the Romans were in the habit of pushing their armies into the midst of the British encampments,—not that these encampments were formed for the purpose of watching the movements of the invaders. Chalmers, however, great as he is in facts, cannot be regarded as an authority in matters of this kind; and it seems pretty evident that the fortlets in question were constructed by the native warriors as positions from whence to observe and give notice of the approach of the enemy. The holm at Barbieston was the most fordable part of the Doon, as well as an easy pass into Carrick—an obvious reason why the natives concentrated their forces at that particular point, and risked a great and fatal battle in disputing the farther progress of the Romans.

Not far from Saint Valley—part of this sanguinary field—and within a few hundred yards of the old course of the Doon, stood, on a rising ground in the plain, the castle of the Dalrymples, of the barony of Dalrymple, the progenitors of the noble family of Stair. Every vestige of the building has long ago been removed—so long indeed that no one in the district knows when or by whom it was swept away—and few in the district are aware that it ever existed at all. Such is the obliterating hand of time. There are, however, one or two individuals in the village who remember, when young, to have sported on the green knoll where once towered the castle walls, and rolled themselves down the grassy sides of the hollow that formed the ditch around it. This, too, is now filled up and ploughed over; and a slight elevation above the surrounding level alone marks where the strong house of the Dalrymples had been.

This family is supposed, and rightly we think, to have derived their name from the valley—from which circumstance we should suppose them to have been neither Normans nor Saxons, but descendants of the ancient Celtic stock. We are aware that some learned antiquaries hold the adoption of a local patronymic to be a proof of foreign blood; but in this view we cannot coincide. What so natural, when surnames came to be used, as that a family should make choice of the designation by which their lands were known? And we are aware that, in our own day at least, emigrants from this country are in the habit of conferring their names and designations on the property they acquire abroad. In the case of the Dalrymples, the Christian names of the earliest of them on record are the same as those which prevailed amongst our Celtic ancestors of Ayrshire—such as Gilchrist, Malcolm, Roland, Hew, &c.

Almost nothing is known of the barony of Dalrymple, or of the Dalrymples in early times, save what occurs in the charters of the Kennedys of Dunure and Cassillis, afterwards Earls of Cassillis, now bearing the title of Marquis of Ailsa. "King Robert II., on the 30th of May 1731, confirmed to John Kenedy, the half of the barony of Dalrimpill, with its pertinents, in the county of Ayr; which half fuit Malcolm Gilchristi, filii adæ de Dalrimpill, and which the said Malcolm resigned to us. The same monarch, 18th September 1377, confirmed to the same John Kennedy the half of the barony of Dalrympill, with its pertinents, in the county of Ayr, quæ fuit Hugonis filii Rolandi de Dalrympil, and which the said Hugh resigned to us."^{*}

On the Kirkmichael side of the Doon, considerably farther down than the village of Dalrymple, embosomed among woods, stands the strong house of Cassillis, on a bank close to the river. The spot is, in itself, picturesque and interesting, but there is a romantic interest associated with it, from the tragedy so widely known by the ballad of "Johnnie Faa." In the days of Wallace, this castle belonged to Sir Neil Montgomerie, of the house of Eaglesham, who was put to death by the English in the Barns of Ayr, along with a number of the other chiefs of Ayrshire. In describing this cruelty, Henry, the blind minstrel, says:—

"The third entrit, that pete was for thy,
A gentill knycht, schir Neill of Mungumry."

A feud between the Kennedys and Dalrymples fell out in this way:—"The airis of Sir Neill," says the chronicler of the Kennedys,† "brukit the landis of Cassillis, quhill the ring of Robert the Second, the first of the Stewartis, at the quilk tyme the saidis landis fell to ane lass: and the Laird of Dalrimpill, her nyteboir, come to hir hous of Cassillis, and persewitt her, be forse, to have hir in marriage; the quilk scho wald nocht condescend to, bot defendit the hous. And at this tyme, the Laird of Donour,‡ that than was [Sir John Kennedy] cuming by, and perceiving the samyn, sett upone the Laird of Dalrimpill and slew him, and releifit the lady, and tuk hir with him to his hous of Donour; quhair, under promises off marriage, he maid hir to resing her landis in the Kingis handis in fauoris off him; bot I cannot reid that ever he mareyit hir to his wyff. Bot scho seing herself disappoyntit be that deid, tuk displeasour, and deit schoortlie thairefter. This was about the third yair off Robert the Second, quilk was the 1373 year of God. Now, the Laird of Dalrimpill being slane, as ye have hard, his landis fallis to his broder sonis, amangis the quilk thair wes gritt stryff, bot the youngest at last sold his rycht to the Laird of Donour. And thane, the Laird of Donour sett for the eldest, and slew him, littil abuiif the Kirk of Dalrimpill, quhair now thair is ane gritt cairne of stanis, to this day. And sa, be that rycht that he had of the youngest, he brukis the landis of Dalrimpill, and this wes dalrimpill's conquest."

There seems to be some ground for the chronicler's doubt as to whether the Laird of Dunure ever married the heiress of Cassillis. It is so said in the Broomlands MS. History of the Montgomery Family; but no documentary or other evidence exists to show that he did so. The oldest charter of the property is one of sale from Marjory de Montgomery, with consent of Marjory de Montgomery, daughter of John de Montgomery, her cousin.* The charter is without date, but supposed to have been granted about 1360. Whether this charter of sale proceeded upon a promise of marriage, as is asserted, it is, of course, impossible to say; but the chronicler's statement is otherwise, in some respects, borne out by tradition. It is reasonable to suppose that the slaughter of the Laird of Dalrymple, and the carrying away so rich a prize as the heiress of Cassillis, whose fair lands lay so temptingly adjacent to his barony, should excite a strong desire of revenge on the part of the Dalrymples. It was so far fortunate for Sir John Kennedy, however, that their own private disagreements rendered them comparatively powerless. According to a tradition, handed down by the domestics at Cassillis, Sir John had, on one occasion, a narrow escape. A reconciliation appears to have been brought about between the two houses; and the Dalrymples, by way of showing how heartily they had given up the feud, invited the new proprietor of Cassillis to a feast at the castle of Dalrymple. With almost incredible temerity or imprudence, Sir John Kennedy came alone, or at best with only one or two attendants. As he was about to enter the drawbridge, which he would, in all probability, never have recrossed, he heard the nurse, who had perhaps placed herself intentionally at the gate to apprise him of his danger, remark audibly to herself, that it was "a pity such a bird should be caught in such a snare." Sir John instantly took the alarm, and, hastily repairing to Cassillis, summoned his retainers, at the head of whom he attacked the Dalrymples, committed great slaughter, and laid waste their castle. Such "wes Dalrimpill's conquest."

This tradition rests on the authority of a domestic of David, tenth Earl of Cassillis, who died in 1792, without issue. The events it relates may, if ever it occurred, have taken place between the date, 1371, of the first charter of half of the barony of Dalrymple, upon the resignation of Malcolm, and that of the other half, on the resignation of Hugh, in 1377.

THE Canongate of Edinburgh seems to have been a favourite with the muse of the "olden time." It is repeatedly alluded to in similar lyrics to the foregoing, as well as the more laboured episodes of the courtly poets of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; while, in our own day, the magic pen of the "author of Waverley," by his "Chronicles of the Canongate," has added a freshness to its classical and traditional interest that will long sustain it amidst the plebeian desolation into which it has fallen. Though forming a distinct burgh, governed by magistrates of its own, the Canongate is literally a continuation of the High Street of Edinburgh beyond the boundary of the ancient wall which encompassed the city—and, as such, is associated with most of those historical events that crowd the time-worn escutcheon of the Scottish capital. But it is no part of our present object, by tracing these, to enter upon a field which has already been pretty well explored. The "Chronicles" we mean to elucidate, refer more immediately to the municipality, its government and laws, together with such memorabilia, interesting or curious, as the records of the burgh supply. In this self-imposed task, we have the labours of an able pioneer before us—the "History of Edinburgh," by the well-known Maitland, published in 1753.

The burgh of Canongate dates its origin back to the days of David I.—that "sore saint for the crown"—who, in 1128, founded the Abbey of "Sanctæ Crucis," or Holyrood. If our ancient writers are to be credited, David was induced to build this religious house by supernatural influence. Wyntoun, however, who is very accurate as to the date of the foundation, takes no notice of the circumstance. He merely says—

"A thousand and hundyr and twenty yhere
And awcht to thai to rekyne clere,
Howdyd was the Halyrwd hows
Fra thine to be relogyows."

Maitland gives the tradition in his own peculiar style:—"In the early times of popery," he says, "nothing of moment was undertaken without a miracle. One of the first magnitude ushered in the founding of this abbey and church; for, King David I., being a hunting in the forest of Drum-selch, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh castle, on Rood-day, or exaltation of the cross, was attacked by a large hart, who overbore both him and his horse; but luckily for David, while he was endeavouring with his hands to defend himself from the furious assaults of the buck, a cross from heaven slipped into his hand, which so frightened the stag that he forthwith turned tail, and ran away in the greatest confusion, to the great joy of the king and his followers, who congratulated him on his happy delivery. The texture of this heavenly cross, no wonder, was such that none could tell whether it was wood or metal! This attack of the hart's having put an end to the chase, David repaired to his castle of Edinburgh; where, in the night following, he was in a dream advised to erect an abbey, or house for canons regular, on the spot where the celestial cross was put into his hand. In obedience to this visionary command, the king erected a house for the said canons, and dedicating it to the honour of the aforesaid cross, deposited the same therein, where it is said to have remained till the reign of King David II., whom it unluckily could not protect, as it did his predecessor, his namesake; for both he and it were taken by the English at the battle of Durham; in which city it is said to have been held in great veneration for ages after."

Maitland quotes the charter of foundation of this abbey, "from the beautiful original in the archives of Edinburgh," accompanying it with a translation. The abbey was richly endowed. It had a grant of the church of the castle [of Edinburgh,] "trial by duel, water, and fire ordeal,* so far as appertains to the ecclesiastical dignity, with the town of Saughton, and its several divisions, the church and parish of St Cuthbert's, with all things thereunto belonging;" all the lands lying under the castle, viz.:—"from the well which riseth or springeth near the corner of my [the king's] garden, by the way which leads to the church of St Cuthbert's. And, on the other hand, along the foot of the Castle-hill to a rock at the eastern side of the said Castle-hill,

* It was anciently the law for the accused to challenge the accuser to fight in public duel, and thus vindicate himself. Iniquitous persons, however, took advantage of this law to wreak their private revenge, and the innocent often suffered. Trial by jury came to be substituted. Ordeal was an ancient method of purgation by water and fire. The former was either in hot or cold water. If in cold, the suspected parties were adjudged innocent if their bodies floated. If in hot, if their arms and legs, which were immersed, escaped unhurt from the boiling water. The parties tried by fire ordeal, walked barefooted and blindfolded over nine glowing ploughshares; or carried in their hands burning irons, usually of a pound weight, which was called simple ordeal; those of two pounds, double ordeal; and those of three pounds, triple ordeal. If the accused were unhurt, they were considered innocent. The fire ordeal was for the trial of free-men and persons of distinction; and that of water, for bondmen and rustics.

with two chapels belonging to the said church of St Cuthbert's; namely, Corstorphin, with two *bovatis and six acres of land; and the chapel of Liberton, with two oxgangs, (thirty acres,) together with all the rights and tithes, as well of the dead as the living in Legbernard, which Macbeth gave to the said church, and I have confirmed." The church of Airth, in Stirlingshire, with salt-pan and certain lands, was also granted to the abbey, with liberty to the canons to erect a mill upon the lands, and have the right of rivers, fishings, meadows, and pastures,—“together,” continues the charter, “with the town of Broughton and its respective divisions; the lands of Inverleith, in the neighbourhood of the harbour, with the said harbour, half of the fishings and tithes of the several fisheries belonging to the church of St Cuthbert. The towns of Pittendrich, Hamar, and Fordam, with their several divisions; and the hospital with a caracate or plough of land,† with a perpetual annuity of forty shillings out of my town of Edinburgh; and for supplying the said canons with apparel, I give to them one hundred shillings out of my cain‡ at Perth, and from the duties which arise to me out of the first merchant ships which arrive at Perth; and if more shall happen to arrive, I then give to the said church, out of my revenues in Edinburgh, the sum of forty-eight shillings; out of Stirling, twenty shillings, with a house, and one draught of a fishing-net at the said place; and forty shillings out of Perth, with a house in my town of Edinburgh, free of all duties and customs whatsoever; together with a house in the town of Berwick, a draught of two nets in Scypwell; a house in Renfrew, five particates,§ and one draught of a net for salmon, with a right to fish for herrings.” David I. at the same time granted to the canons a perpetual annuity of ten pounds for lighting and repairing their church—as much wood out of the forests of Stirling and Clackmannan as they required—one-half of the tallow, lard and hides of the beasts killed in Edinburgh, “with the tithes of whales and sea monsters due to me, from the river Avon to Colbrand's Path, with the tithes of all my pleas and profits from the said Avon to the said Colbrand's Path, and the half of my pleas and profits of Kintyre and Argyll; with the skins of all the rams, sheep and lambs belonging to my castle of Linlithgow, which die naturally; and eight chaldrons of malt, eight of meal, thirty cart-loads of brushwood of Liberton, one of my mills of Dene, with the tents of my mills of Liberton and Dene, and those of my new mill of Edinburgh and Craigsenmark as far as they appertain to me; with all that belonged to Vineth White on the said rock, to be held in free and perpetual alms.”

In addition to all this, the canons had a grant of the Canongate, with liberty to buy and sell in open market. It was then called the “town of Herbergare.” The charter says, “I likewise grant to the said canons the town of Herbergare, lying betwixt the said church and my town (of Edinburgh), and that the burgesses thereof have the liberty of buying and selling goods and merchandise in open market, as freely, and without molestation and reproach, as any of my own burgesses. And I strictly enjoin that no person presume to take by force any bread, ale, or other vendible commodity, without the consent of the said burgesses. I also grant that the said canons be free from all tolls and customs in my several burghs and lands, in all things they deal in; and I strictly forbid all persons from taking a poind, or making a seizure in or upon the lands of the said Holy Cross, unless the abbot refuse to do justice to the person injured. I will, likewise, that the said canons hold all the aforesaid things as fully as I enjoy my lands; and, I grant that the said abbot shall have his court in as full, free, and honourable a manner as the bishop of St Andrew's, abbot of Dunfermling, and abbot of Kelso enjoy theirs.”

The abbey of Holyrood, to which the priories of St Mary's Isle, Blantire, Rowadill, Crusa, and Oranza, appear subsequently to have belonged, was one of the richest in Scotland. At the Reformation, its revenues amounted in money to the yearly sum of £2926, 8s. 6d. Scots, 27 chaldern and 10 bolls of wheat; 40 chaldern and 9 bolls of bear; 34 chaldern, 15 bolls, 3 firlets, 3½ pecks of oats; 501 capons, 24 hens, 24 salmon, 12 loads of salt, and swine, the number of which is not mentioned. The canons were of the St Augustine order, and brought from the priory of St Andrew's, in Fife.

*Herbergare, after this grant, came to be called the Canongate, from its proprietors, the canons of the abbey; and, under that name, had many privileges conferred upon it by Robert, abbot of Holyrood, which were not only confirmed, but additional privileges granted, by David II., Robert III., and James II. and III. These sovereigns “granted to the bailies, consuls, and community of the burgh of the Canongate, the several annuities payable at the Exchequer, by the said burghs, the common moor lying between the lands of Broughton on the west, those of Pilrig on the east, and the way leading from Edinburgh to Leith on the south, with all the rights and customs thereunto belonging; together with all the liberties, commodities, privileges, and immunities, appertaining to a burgh of regality. And that it shall be lawful for the burgesses of the said borough to sell wood, salt, iron, wool skins, hides, bread, ale, cloth, and other staple commodities; with a right to have bakers, cloth-workers, and a number of other

The ridge upon which the city is built, becomes much narrower as it approaches the level at Holyrood. Maitland hints that the name may be from the Saxon herberg, an inn; but it is not easy to see how the Canongate should have been so distinguished over other similar places of entertainment.

TRADITIONAL ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE OF BLAIRLEINE.

THE patriarchal chief, Mac vic Alleine, or Clanranald, was married to the daughter of the feudal chief, Lord Lovat, and the hero of the battle of Blairleine was the issue of this union. His father died when he was an infant, and his mother, who had made herself obnoxious to the clan by several innovations on the economy of the establishment, by much too near akin to the parsimony of the Gaul or stranger, to be palatable to a race prejudiced and armed against any open or covert attempt to reduce them under the feudal system, considered it prudent to retire with her son, during his minority, into the bosom and protection of her own family. Here the young Clanranald became the favourite of his mother's relatives, and was taught all the knightly education and warlike accomplishments of the age; but, unfortunately for him, his worthy mother was but too successful in opening his eyes to the advantages that would be insured to him by reforming the profuse expenditure of his patriarchal establishment, getting his country converted into a feudal barony, and reducing his clan to the condition of vassals and serfs.*

While the young Clanranald was devoting himself to the training and accomplishments suited to a gallant and high-born chief, his uncle, "Iain Muidartach," was exercising in his own country all the influence and authority which his bold, wary, and ambitious conduct, and character had enabled him to acquire over the Macdonalds and their neighbours, in times of no ordinary peril and commotion among the patriarchal clans, occasioned by the grasping intrigues of Argyle on the west, and the feudal chiefs and lords, Macintosh, Mar, Huntly, Lovat, and others on the east. In short, John of Moidart,* by his policy, address, caution, and success in many difficult negotiations and daring exploits, became so powerfully established in the hearts and counsels of the clan as to augur no favourable reception to Ronald Galda, or the stranger (as the young chief was sneeringly named), should he ever venture back to claim his hereditary right.

But Ronald Galda was not a man capable of tamely yielding up his inheritance; and his uncle, Lovat, was determined to support him, not only with his own clan, but also with the clan Macintosh and other feudal allies, until he should be firmly seated and established in the chiefship and hereditary possessions. Notice was accordingly sent to John of Moidart, that his nephew would come to be inaugurated in the chair of his ancestors, and take upon him the government of the clan, on a certain day named by the messenger; and that he wished his uncle to invite the friends of the clan, and make the necessary arrangements for feasting them on the auspicious occasion.

John of Moidart was not slow in making the necessary preparations for the coming gathering; nor did Lovat neglect to summon his clan and allies to attend his nephew to Arasaig, and see him installed in the chair of his ancestors; but instead of taking the direct route by the great glen of Scotland, he crossed over the hills, and, joining the Macintoshes, proceeded by Lochlaggan (the hunting ground of our ancient kings and heroes, as the names of the mountains, glens and islands in the vicinity testify) Glenspean, Kep-poch (the seat of the chivalrous and poetic chiefs of the Macdonalds of Brae Lochaber), by the north side of Highbridge (where the first blow was struck for "bonny Prince Charlie"), and across Gerlochie and by Lechiell, Lochsheal, and Glenfinnan to Arasaig.†

* The history of John of Moidart, who flourished about the middle of the sixteenth century, is a singular commentary on the difference between the traditions of the people and the records of the courts of Scotland. In the latter, John of Moidart figures as a petty robber or thief, and occasionally as a murderer or housebreaker; and in this light must be appear in the eyes of those who scorn the aid of tradition in the elucidation of the national character. For assuredly the patriarchal was the national system, by which the people of Scotland, with the exception of the vassals and serfs of the feudal lords and barons (who alone submitted, or had influence in our then courts of law), were practically governed at that time; and John of Moidart was not only a brave and a powerful chief, but the very Wallace of those who looked upon that system as the palladium of their rights and liberties. No man can form a true estimate of the character of the people of Scotland in "the olden time" who does not recognise the strongly marked difference between the patriarchal and the feudal systems; and who is ignorant of the number of feuds, raids, and battles, occasioned by the encroachments of the one on the other. It was not the violent and disorderly character of the people, but the machiavelian, unconstitutional, and cruel policy of the kings of Scotland, to exalt and consolidate their own power, by reducing the people into vassals and serfs, to feudal, or charter-made lords or chiefs, that was the cause of the feuds and bloodshed which kept the country in a continual state of civil war for so many ages.

† Than the above route none can be more rich in all the features most admired in Highland scenery, or more intimately associated with the poetry and traditions of the olden time; and it is now destined to acquire addi-

* The introduction of the feudal system was a work of slow progress in the Highlands. Between it and the patriarchal there was a vital distinction. Under the patriarchal the land belonged to the clan as a body; by the latter it was made the property of the chief.

The Frasers and Macintoshes were received with courtesy, and apparently with cordiality, by John of Moidart and the vast assemblage of his friends and allies who attended in honour of the august ceremony of installing the new chief.

Ronald Galda, after being introduced to the chiefs, ceann tigheas, and other gentlemen of distinction, strolled over the lawn to look at the preparations which had been made for the refreshment of the multitude of his friends; and, as fate would have it, the parsimonious principles of his mother obtained the mastery of his mind at the sight of the hecatomb of slain sheep and oxen, and he exclaimed, in ill-disguised displeasure, that "as many hens as they had slain of beeves were more than sufficient to dine double the number assembled."

The Macdonalds were prejudiced against the maternal blood of their young chief, and had been devoted to the interests of his wise, generous, and undaunted uncle, John of Moidart, who commanded them, with brilliant success, in many battles. They also heard enough of the sentiments of their young chief and Lovat to suspect them strongly of a design to introduce the feudal system among them. They accordingly took up the remark he had made in the worst spirit, as a watchword, and it flew with lightning speed from man to man, and group to group, till the whole plain seemed to reverberate to the nick-name of contempt instantly affixed upon Ronald Galda by the Macdonald bards, namely, "the hen chief."

The proverbial courtesy and forbearance of the clans at their social meetings was not departed from on this occasion during the ceremony of inauguration and the subsequent banquet; but it was evident to Lovat and Macintosh, that the calmness with which both were allowed to proceed was any thing but a proof of the cordiality with which the clan received their young chief. They accordingly took their departure, carrying the "hen chief" along with them, immediately afterwards. The Macdonalds, suspecting evil designs tional interest from being the route of the Queen from "the beauteous lake of woody isles," by Glenspean and the great glen of Albyn, to Inverness.

Lochlaggan and the surrounding country is the scene of the old poem, published by Ronald Macdonald, called "The aged bard's desire," and of "The hunter and the owl," also translated, but in a spirit which scarcely does justice to the original, by Mrs Grant of Laggan. Not far from it is also the scene of an act of vengeance by Sir James Macdonald of Sleat, whose ancestors had adopted the feudal system in the days of Robert Bruce, against Alastair, the son of Dugald Mor, and his nephews, for the murder of Macdonald of Keppoch and his brothers. They were besieged in a blockhouse, which they had built at Inverlair, by his brother "Ciaran Mabach," who took off their heads, had them boiled in a cauldron at Invergarry, and sent off to Edinburgh by the celebrated bard Iain Goin in justification of the act.

This is the event which caused the erection of the monument at Tobar-nan-cean, where the heads had been washed, by the late Glengarry, who seems to have received and believed an erroneous version of the tradition, to the effect that the race of Dugald Mor had been slain by Lord McDonnell of Glengarry. The attempted fabrication of the above tradition, however, has failed of its object; for although adopted by all "veritable Guide Books," thrust into the hands of all tourists in the Highlands, the monument is known in the district only by the name of "Clach nam breug," i. e., the stone of lies.

against their country on the part of Lovat, and their now evidently alarmed and indignant chief, concluded that they would return in greater force at no distant day. No sooner were their backs turned than they mustered in full force; and, taking a short cut along the north side of the country of the Camerons, descended the mountains of Glengarry to intercept Lovat and the Frasers in the great glen of Scotland, after they should have separated from the Macintoshes—the direct route of the latter being by Glenluy and Glenroy, and of the former by the great glen already mentioned.

Macintosh, suspecting such a manœuvre on the part of John of Moidart, strongly urged Lovat and the Frasers to accompany him home to Moyhall, and to cross the hills to his own country as he had done on his way to Arasaig; but Lovat's pride took the alarm, and he determined, come what might, that he would not deviate from his direct route to his own country. He accordingly marched along the southern margin of Lochloch, while Macintosh proceeded homewards by Glenluy and Glenroy.

Among the Macdonalds there was an old man who had seven sons by his first wife, and one by a second, who was still a youth. This person was himself a powerful and skilful swordsman, and his seven sons were not inferior to their stern and stalwart father, either in strength or dexterity in the use of their weapons. The Macdonalds had proceeded on their march with great celerity, and some of them were outrun in the race; but when they mustered their numbers on the top of the hill of North Laggan, ere they descended into the plain, the old man found that he was not only surrounded by his seven sons by his first, but also attended by a youth, his only son by his second wife, whom he passionately loved, and whom he could not think of leaving behind him, in the event of his fall in the battle, bereaved of her only son. He therefore tried all his powers of persuasion, but in vain, to induce the youth to return home. At length, determined to try the effect of taunts, since other means had failed, he exclaimed, in accents of coarse severity, "I hate to see in battle a beardless youth, escaped from the spoon-feeding care of his mother!" The youth said nothing, but descended into the field of battle by the side of his veteran and determined father.

When Lovat issued from the wood of Letterfinlay, on the broad field of Culross, he saw the Macdonalds drawn up in line, with their right wing resting on the head of Lochloch, and their left on a marsh below the house of Kinloch, thus cutting off his route to his own country, by Shian and Laggan. He was now again strongly advised, by one of the patriarchs of his clan, to ascend the hill slantingly, above Kinloch, and cross by Corryshian, into Glenroy, and, by this route, to rejoin the Macintoshes, and to proceed to his own country by Moyhall. But Lovat and his brave clan were by much too proud and high-minded "to fly from an unfoughten field," and so he immediately advanced to plunge into battle; but the day being extremely hot, and seeing that the Macdonalds had stripped, as had been the wont of the clans when fighting in their own country (as on the day of the battle of the Grampians, and that of Killicrankie), he ordered his clan to strip also. Hence this memorable clan engagement is called the battle of Blairleine—the field of shirts.

The space on which this bloody clan-battle was fought did not exceed half a mile square, being bounded on the one side by Lochloch, on the other by the bog already mentioned, and on the other two sides, by the hills of Kinloch and Kilisann. This space is now partly covered by the loch, which has been embanked at Gerloch, and so deepened, and thrown eastward; and also by the Caledonian Canal; but the two hillocks to which the wounded and the dying are said to have crawled from the field are still visible, the one on the south, and the other on the north side of the glen; but both now are almost covered by the head of the loch. The one was called enocan (the Gaelic e sounds like k hard) nancreukhd, and the other, enocan oich-oich!—names very appropriate for the stations of wounded men.

After the clans had joined in the melee, in which “chief closed with chief, and man with man,” with deadly animosity, and inveterate determination, the tide of battle is described as rolling from one side of the plain to the other—now to the north and now to the south, as the one party or the other prevailed, during the whole afternoon of the summer day.

Ronald Galda, young, powerful, and active, and a perfect master of the science of swordmanship, was determined to requite upon the loftiest crests in the Macdonald band the insults and the contempt of which he had been the object, and the now deliberate usurpation of his title, office, and rights, as chief of his clan, by his uncle. Resolved to bring the stern question between them to the arbitrament of a personal conflict, he overlooked every meaner object of vengeance, and made incredible exertions to meet him in the battle; but cool, wary, and skilful, John of Moidart, surrounded by his leine-chrios, or shirt of mail, as the body guard of a Highland chief has ever been called (until Sir Walter Scott, and his mob of scribbling followers, fastened on them an opprobrious name, at once alien to the genius of their thoughts and language), seemed to decline or to overlook his nephew's repeated attempts to come into contact with him, and traversed the field, wherever his presence was needed—here restoring order in his own ranks, and there, beating the enemy to the ground. But not unscathed did this devoted band move through the broken ranks of the enemy, though everywhere attended by victory. The swords of Ronald Galda and his gallant relative, Lovat, who, with his leine-chrios, never lost sight of his young, brave, and distinguished nephew—distinguished not less by his lofty and commanding stature, than his irresistible sword—were cutting them to the ground, one by one, until, of these gallant bands, composed of the choice warriors of both clans, none were left but Ronald Galda and the old veteran formerly mentioned. The old man saw four of his gigantic and brave sons cut down before his eyes, by Lovat and Ronald Galda, while he himself was compelled to stand fixed to the spot, like a chained lion, over the prostrate body of his chief, John of Moidart, who had fallen severely wounded, to guard it from further injury, until removed from the field; and the other three had fallen at an early period of the engagement. The wounded chief having been carried away, the old man, inflamed with feelings of the most deadly hate and revenge against Ronald Galda, now assailed him with incredible fury; but finding himself baffled by the skilful swordmanship of Ronald, and feeling his own inferiority, if not in strength, at least in quickness and agility of action, he changed from the offensive to the defensive, and while parrying the dexterous strokes and thrusts of his opponent, was slyly giving ground, inch by inch; thus, in his politic retreat, drawing his opponent towards the Macdonald side of the field. At this moment, his youngest son, by his second marriage (who had been separated from him, and was running, in great anxiety and distress, over the now comparatively silent and deserted field of battle, looking for his father) made his appearance; and either not comprehending the motive of the retreating steps of the veteran, or still remembering, with some indignation, the taunt of the morning, exclaimed, “I hate the sight which meets my eye, the backward steps of an old man in battle!” and he instantly dashed in, sword and target in hand, between the old man and Ronald, calling out “coram na Feime”—the equal combat of the Fingalians—being the usual pledge of a fair field and no favour, among the clans. Though equal in courage to his opponent, yet the youth was far his inferior in strength and skill in the use of his weapons. This was evident to the old man at a glance, and his feelings of hatred and revenge against Ronald Galda being now excited to madness, by alarm for his young, gallant, and only remaining son, a demon thought entered into his heart, and he called out, “I will not be a traitor to you, Ronald, they are at you behind!” Ronald, thrown off his guard in the impulse of the moment, looked behind him, and was instantly cut down by the old man, who raised a shout of triumph that communicated the fall of Ronald Galda to friends and foes over all the field.

Lovat and Ronald Galda down, and but few, indeed, of their chivalrous and gallant clan now left, the survivors determined, if possible, to make good their retreat, and draw off to the south-east corner of the field, where they still formed a small band of brothers and kinsmen. But the remnant of the Macdonalds, though in number scarcely exceeding their own, were excited and exasperated into fury by the resistance they had met, and the loss—the irremediable loss—all and each of them had sustained in kinsmen and brothers, dear and precious to their hearts, on the fatal field of Blairleine. They, accordingly, mustered all their strength on the opposite side of the field, and prepared for a new, a last, and an exterminating assault on the remnant of the Frasers, who, seeing that all further resistance was aimless, if not hopeless, fled with precipitation through the great glen of Albyn, towards their now bereaved country and families; but such was the inveteracy and determination of the vengeful Macdonalds, that they followed, in hot pursuit, slaying all whom they could overtake on the way, for the distance of about ten miles.

The last of the Frasers slain in the pursuit, is the only one of the gallant and devoted band whose name has been retained in my memory during the half century which has nearly elapsed since I heard this traditional account of Blairleine from one of the veterans of forty-five, who was a cottar of my father. His name (I mean Fraser's) was Donald. This, it is said, may still be ascertained and attested by any one having Macdonald blood in his veins, who is daring enough to cross the hill of Culeachie, where he fell, at any time before "the wee short hour ayont the twal," when the cock warns all evil things to depart from the haunts of man by his morning challenge—for he is sure to make his appearance, carrying his head, (which was severed from his neck by a single cut of a ferrara) in his hands, and, chasing and flinging it at the horror-struck traveller, as he repeats the following words with an elrich voice and great volubility of accent, "Sinibh, sinibh, eir Donalan gun chean—Sinibh, sinibh, eir Donalan gun chean!" chase, chase him, little Donald, without a head—chase, chase him, little Donald, without a head.

In the meantime, Ronald Galda was carried, still alive, from the field, and laid on a bed in a hut by the side of Cnocan Oich-Oich, while a wild, hair-brained personage, who was alternately the prophet and the leech of the clan, after having examined the wound, proceeded to report the state of the case to John of Moidart. "Will he live," inquired the chief, with a kindling eye and husky voice, casting a look of intelligence at the leech. "He might live," replied the wretch, "but so small is his hold of life that the point of the dealg (pin) which fastens your plaid were sufficient to send him into eternity, for his brain is laid open by the wound." The chief drew the dealg in silence, from his plaid, and handed it to the leech, who, with a fiendish smile on his thin and haggard face, instantly entered the hut, where he found the old man and the youth, his son, watching over the apparently unconscious chief, and bathing his couch with their tears—a change of feeling not uncharacteristic of the wild, passionate, but kind and warm-hearted Highland warrior of "the olden time."

The leech approached the bed and tried, with a gentle hand, to remove the dirk, a weapon which the young chief loved, and which, some how or other, he had contrived to draw from its sheath as he was being carried from the field; but he found that the attempt was discovered, and that Ronald Galda had still sufficient strength to resist him. The old man observed the attempt of the leech, and the tightening grasp of the chief on his dagger, and said fiercely, "Why dost thou want to disarm his hand? Canst thou not examine and bind up the wound without removing the dirk?" "I like not, said the leech, "to exercise my skill on armed men; but if thou wilt remove the weapon, I will do all I can to relieve him, although I fear there is little chance of his recovery, the strongest arm of the Clanranald having addressed his trenchant blade to his skull."

The old man groaned in the inmost core of his heart, and said, "would that that arm had been in the grave ere it aimed the accursed blow at his head; but alas, alas, no man need now fear the dirk of the heroic chief. Do thou examine the wound, and if thou canst but cure and set him again on his feet, thou mayest ever count on an unflinching friend in me, and every man who will adhere to me in his defence."

The leech, in seeming compliance, made the old man and his son draw back from the bed, and leaned over the chief in the apparent examination of the wound. Ronald Galda gave a convulsive start—the leech shrunk back in alarm, but with the quickness of lightning, the dirk was buried in his heart; and, with this last act of just vengeance, Ronald Galda ceased to live.

DRUIDICAL REMAINS AT LEYS, NEAR INVERNESS.

IF we may judge from the number of stone circles scattered over Inverness-shire, it would seem that that county was, in ancient times, a favourite haunt of Druidism. These remains are particularly numerous on the plains bordering the Moray Firth. It is true that the forests of oak, in which the altars of the Druids were raised, have passed away. The stone circles now stand deserted and bare, some on moors, some amid clumps of firs, and some are to be traced in cultivated fields, among the corn crops. Although it is creditable to the men of the north that they have been less influenced by the spirit of levelling than the inhabitants of some districts of the south, time and change have not overlooked these sacred monuments. In general, the circles are imperfect, the stones having been overturned and covered by the soil, detached, or entirely removed; so that, of the many temples at one time perfect not more than one or two are worthy of a visit. Perhaps the most entire is that near Leys Castle, on a detached part of the estate of Raigmore, and which, though in the parish of Croy, is not more than two and a half miles from Inverness. From the Moray Firth, the land rises up with a gradual ascent southerly—now divided into fields luxuriant with crops; now broken into small ravines, through which hill-streams find a passage; and here and there dotted with clumps and belts of wood. Half a mile eastward from Leys Castle there is a round gravel mount, rising from twenty to thirty feet above the level of the fields, and the temple is placed on the top of it. Two concentric circles are all but perfect. The outer consists of large stones placed apart, of which sixteen occupy their proper places. The line of the inner circle is from eight to ten feet within the outer. It is formed of smaller, though still large, stones set on edge, and close together, with a vacant space or entrance on the western side of the altar. With the exception of a few stones wanting in the southern bend, the circle is quite perfect, twenty-nine still remaining. The diameter of the inner circle may be roughly estimated at about twenty-four feet, and in the centre a large slap is placed on its edge. Near it, on the east, a large stone lies flat; and on the right hand, from the entrance, betwixt the centre stone and the inner circle, another minor circle may be clearly traced. In a line west from the altar to the entrance, and a few feet beyond the outer circle, an immense mass of conglomerate stands upright, overtopping the circles. It is about ten feet high, from the surface of the ground, and it has been ascertained that it is embedded to an equal depth. The stone is nearly flat on the top, and its square is about twenty feet. How such an immense mass was elevated to its position is matter of wonder. It shows that the Druids understood not a few of the mysteries of mechanics.

About twenty years ago a very rare relic of the ancient priesthood was found at this place—an instrument of gold, supposed to be that with which the Arch-druid cut the sacred mistletoe. In length it measured about twenty inches. In the centre it was three-sided, with sharp edges; towards the ends it was twisted round and round, and each end terminated in a crook like that of a shepherd's staff. The relic was perfect in every respect. It fell into the hands of a goldsmith in Inverness, a zealous and intelligent collector of all such curiosities. He experienced considerable trouble, however, from the Barons of Exchequer, by whom the relic was claimed. After having it in their possession for some time, it was returned, and passed into the hands of a Yorkshire lady, in whose keeping it probably still remains. The following is a sketch of one half of it:—

When the rites of the ancient faith were performed in this temple, it is to be presumed that not only the mound on which it stands, but all the plain, was shaded by the dark leaves of acorn-dropping oaks. Now the face of nature has undergone a change, like all things not eternal. But, standing where the devotees have stood, and gazing between the branches of the bordering larches, it can scarcely be imagined that the scene, in its mutation, has lost anything of its grandeur. How well does the vast panorama of plain and wood, hill and mountain, lakes, river and sea, shining in all the green and golden beauty of a summer noon, speak of the great hand of heaven; awaken irresistibly that impression of the reality of Deity which seems to have been the chief "end and aim" of Druid faith! Behind, the land rises up and up, green crop and pasture field, until the eye dwells on the distant hills above Stratherrick. West, far over the woods, in the deep valley, lies Loch Ness, with the blue, dome-like summit of Meallfourvonie marked against the sky. Through an open and lovely glen the river flows northward to the firth; the glen bounded by the green slopes of the Dunearn ridge, crowned with a range of vetuſtified forts, and terminating in the round and wooded Craig-Phadrig; while over it, like a dim head of clouds, rise the wild hills of Strathglass. To the east stretches out Drummossie moor; below it lies the Moray Firth, and far away, the coasts of Sutherland. Before us, over the steeples of the town, and the still waters of Loch Beaulf, appears the black Isle of Ross, and the massive shoulders of Ben Wyvis, now, for a brief day of freedom, divested of their snowy covering. The heavens are sunny above, the earth all bloom below—the Great Creator's presence is over all! Surrounding the circle itself, I have said, is a belt of larch. Amongst the larch, a few common and weeping birches give sweet odour to the cold altars; and a young plantation of oaks, rising rapidly, promises to supplant the less glorious trees. In a few years the oak will again wave over the sacred temple.

BURNES, OR BURNS?—THE POET.

ALLAN CUNINGHAME, in his life of Burns, states that the family name was Burness, and that the poet continued to call himself so till 1786. He says, alluding to that period,—

"Burns now openly took upon himself the name of Poet; he not only wrote it in his books, but wrought it in his rhymes, and began to entertain hopes of distinction in the realms of song. But nothing, perhaps, marks the character of the man more than the alteration which he made in his own name. He had little relish for bygone things; [?] there are few gazings back at periods of honour or of woes in all his strains. The name he had hitherto borne was of old standing, the Poet sat in judgment upon it, concluded that it had a barbarous sound, and threw away Burness—a name two syllables long, and adopted that of Burns in its stead. Had his father been alive, this might not have happened. On the 20th of March 1786, he says to one of his correspondents:—'I hope, some time before we hear the gowk, to have the pleasure of seeing you at Kilmarnock, when I intend having a gill between us in a mutchkin stoup, which will be a great comfort and consolation to, dear sir, your humble servant, Robert Burness.' This is the latest time that I find his original name in his own hand-writing."*

There is something unaccountable in this. We should think that spelling his name Burness was a crotchet of the poet, unsanctioned by the pronunciation of the district, and the practice of the family. We have proof of this in the session records of the parish of Ayr, where the birth and baptism of our national bard is thus entered:—

"Robert Burns, son law: to William Burns, in Alloway, and Agnes Brown, his spouse, was born Jan^y 25th 1759. Bapt. 26th, By Mr Wm. Dalrymple—Witnesses, John Tennant† and James Young."

We find entered in the same way:—"Gilbert Burns, son to William Burns, gairdener, and Agnes Brown," born March 2, 1762. In short, the births of the whole family—Agnes, Annabella, William, John, and Isobel—are all similarly recorded in the session books. It would thus appear that, whatever the origin of the name, it was pronounced simply Burns by the father of the poet himself: for, if the stern adherent to rule he is represented, it is not at all probable that he would have tolerated so great a deviation from the patronymic of his fathers, as appears in the session books.

Many of our readers may not be aware that the name Burns, not Burness, if not common, was at least not rare in Ayrshire long before the settlement of the poet's father at Alloway. For example, we meet with the following entry in the parish records:—"John Burnes, son of John Burnes, in Burrowfield, and Agnes McMillan his spouse, born 12th Feb. 1666."

* This is a mistake; he signs himself Burness in a letter to Mr Aitken, dated "Mosgiel, 3d April 1786."

† John Tennant was a blacksmith in Alloway, where his descendants still carry on the same business. Their smithy is in the same range of buildings with Burns' cottage.

This person's name was simply Burns—the silent e, as in Browne, or Paterson, being frequently added to names ending with a consonant in these days. There are a number of other entries of the same name, written indiscriminately, and sometimes applying to the same parties, Burnes and Burns, but never Burness. In a note in Bohn's Edition of *Burns it is remarked:—"The family aver that, in the Montrose archives, the name is sometimes written Burnes, but this seems not to affect the pronunciation, which was always Burness, till the Bard of Ayr deprived it of a syllable." We know not how the name was or is pronounced in Montrose, but we have shown that Burnes was simply Burns in Ayrshire; and had been so long before "the Bard of Ayr deprived it of a syllable."

REMARKABLE WARLIKE INVENTION BY A "SCOTCH SHOEMAKER."

GREAT improvements have no doubt been effected of late years in the ordnance department of the service of the country, and new modes of throwing destructive projectiles have been discovered. Some of these inventions, however, are still imperfect, and it is questionable if ever they will prove efficient in practice. A short time since, the newspaper press teemed with discussions as to the merits of Warner's mysterious agency, by which he could destroy whole batteries in an instant, and blow up vessels at six miles distance. All are familiar with the alleged power and rapidity of Perkin's steam-gun; and it is but recently that the Earl of Dundonald—better known as Lord Cochrane—claimed the discovery of some similarly potent means to that of Warner, by which any amount of opposing force could be almost instantaneously annihilated. His Lordship stated that he was induced by the government, during the late war—to several members of whom he divulged his invention—not to make it known, in "pity to mankind;" and he has religiously kept his word. Even when estranged, by bad usage, from Britain, and fighting the battles of another country—when he might have pocketed uncountable gold by divulging the secret, he kept it, and still keeps it inviolate. The world is amazed at the immense pretensions of these projectile machines; but, in reality, they seem to be only a revival of the principle—an improvement of the wonderful contrivance of the "Scotch Shoemaker," brought to light upwards of eighty years ago. And why not a shoemaker? Sir John Clerk of Penny-cuik, who knew as little about a ship as an Esquimaux knows about a telescope, actually planned, with the corks of his claret bottles after dinner, the system of naval tactics, which Rodney first put in force at Dogger Bank, in 1782, and which has given to our fleet so much superiority ever since. Then why not a shoemaker construct an engine, by which the use of large and expensive armies might be done away with? The Caledonian Mercury, of 1764, records, with all seriousness, that "a Scotch Shoemaker" had contrived a machine, by which six persons could do as much as a whole regiment! It could discharge 44,000 balls in two minutes!! In case of being overwhelmed by a large force, it could be knocked to pieces in a moment—rendering it useless to the enemy—and again, on being recovered, restored to efficient use in a minute and a half!!! To resist a charge, by simply turning a spring, the six men could present a whole "harvest of bayonets" against the advancing host!!! Why such a formidable machine has not been adopted in the army, we cannot say. Perhaps it was discouraged, like the Earl of Dundonald's discovery, lest it should injure "Othello's occupation," and play the deuce with commissions—six men doing the work of a whole regiment! Or, perhaps, like Warner's long range, it did not, upon trial, quite come up to the pretensions of its ingenious contriver. It is to be wished that the Mercury had recorded the name of the worthy son of Crispin. Some of our readers, however, may know something of him. If so, we shall hope to be favoured with a few notes about him.

STRANGE PHENOMENON.—"On Christmas morning, about 8 o'clock, the bed of the river of Air was perceived to be quite dry, from near the ships to the Dam-back, which is a large half-mile. Several gentlemen walked backward and forward in the channel where the water used to run, and the boys caught the fishes on dry ground. When the tide began to make, the river returned to its usual bigness, and has continued so ever since."—Scot's Magazine, Dec. 1764.

AGRICULTURAL IMPROVEMENT.—Before the formation of the Highland Society of Scotland, in 1784, a considerable stimulus had been given to agriculture by an association called "The Edinburgh Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Sciences," &c. They frequently gave premiums for improving the breed of horses and cattle. This association seems to have been the precursor of the now flourishing and very useful Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland. The Caledonian Mercury, of 1764, contains several advertisements of premiums by the Edinburgh Society.

THE BIBLE OF JOHN KNOX.—We had lately the great satisfaction of inspecting and examining a relic of ancient times, that merits a high place in the esteem of Scotchmen, not only from its intrinsic excellence, but from the circumstance of its having once appertained to one whose name Scotland, we trust, will never fail to cherish, as the most glorious in her nomenclature of fame. This was the Bible of John Knox. In writing it contains a signature of John Knox, the ink and handwriting of which correspond with copious notes, written in a cipher, on the margin, in which hand the Pauls are divided into morning and evening portions. The following affidavit is also inscribed:—"This book was printed by a gentleman named Richard Cameron, in the year of our Lord 1560, and was presented to the famous John Knox, our Scottish Reformer, in the year of our Lord 1590, for his family Bible, which he kept till his death, which happened at Edinburgh, in the year of our Lord 1592, being twelve years in his possession. It next fell into the hands of his successor, Mr Carson, where it continued till his death, and passed into the hands of his widow, whose name was Page, where it continued till the present year of our Lord 1638.—(Signed) THOS. PAGE." This Bible was transferred from the name of Page to the name of Houston, on account of marriage, and continued in the hands of the Houstens till it was transferred by Margaret Houston to the name of Elder; and at his decease, upon the 20th of February 1807, it came into the hands of his son, Hugh Elder, now residing in Edinburgh. This Bible was purchased from Hugh Elder by Mr William Glennie, Edinburgh; and at his decease, in the year 1844, was sold by Mrs Glennie to the Hon. Roger Rollo, and is now in possession of his son, John B. Rollo, Esq.—Irvine News Letter.

LADY GLENCAIRN AND MILLER SAMSON.

THE following story, under the title of "Miller Samson," appeared in several newspapers a few weeks ago. It forms a note appended to the memoir of the late Mr Coutts of Brechin, in the volume of his sermons which has just appeared. The memoir, including the note, is from the pen of the Rev. Thomas Guthrie:—

"Such a one was Lady Glencairn; and, though not directly connected with Mr Coutts' history, the following incident, with which her honoured name was associated, will perhaps afford the best of all illustrations of the state of matters at that time in Scotland. We may observe that Lady Glencairn was a singular child both of providence and grace. Her birth-place was the village of Ochiltree. In that village, side by side, there lived a weaver who had three daughters, and a widow who had an only son. The son left his widowed mother to enlist in the army, and go abroad as a common soldier. Time passed on—the infirmities of years came on the lone widow, amid which her humble neighbour showed her much kindness. Her boy far away and never heard of—he was a son to her; and, when at length she died, he laid her head in the grave. Years passed on, and, when the grass had grown green on the widow's grave, and her son had been long forgotten, the news rang through Ochiltree that the widow's son had come back again—he that was lost was found. From round to round, from step to step, the soldier boy had risen, till he returned to his fatherland Governor of the Leeward Islands, and the possessor of an immense fortune. On inquiring into the circumstances of his mother's latter years and death, his eye was filled and his heart was melted with the story of her humble neighbour's kindness. The weaver had proved a son to the soldier's mother; the soldier would be a father to the weaver's daughters; and so settling on them his noble fortune, he educated and reared them in a style becoming their future rank. Two of them were afterwards highly married in England. The third wore the honours of the house of Glencairn; and, when lady of the lands on which, when a little barefooted, sun-browned, gleesome child, she used to feed her father's cow, she was wont to say that the herd lassie was as happy singing on the lea as now when she was lady of all these lands. Now this child of providence was also a daughter of grace, and used all the influence which her noble rank and high character gave in favour of evangelical truth. This singular history, with the circumstance we have referred to, and are now about to relate, we learned in making some inquiries about a former inhabitant of Ochiltree. In passing through that village, our curiosity was awakened by reading this strange inscription on one of its houses:—

"INSCRIPTION.—This is Samson's Square; the property of John Samson, farmer in cooperhill; consisting of 1 acre, 5 roods, and 31 falls—on which he has built 13 houses, 9 of them in 15 months. Long may he live to do good, and die in the fear of the Lord. 1808."

"Sure that the builder of this house must have been a character, we were curious to know something of his history, and found that in him Providence had employed an instrument to preserve a pure gospel among the people of Ochiltree. The death of a pious and worthy minister had left the pulpit vacant. The farmers, affected by the Socinianism of the neighbouring parishes, had resolved to have no more fanatics in Ochiltree; and, in compact with the ungodly ministers around, they fixed on their man—a cold, lifeless preacher. This settled, and counting all secure, three of them agreed to ride next day to Edinburgh where Lady Glencairn resided, from whom, as the representative of the people, they expected to get a promise in favour of their nominee.

"Some bird of the air carried the news of this well-laid plot to Miller Samson. Like a wise man he kept the secret to himself. It was the summer time. Samson was up at the peep of day, and the sun rose on our friend breasting the hills between Ochiltree and Edinburgh. The well-mounted farmers, little dreaming who was ahead of them, took it easily. By the time Samson had come in sight of Edinburgh, he heard the tramp of horsemen behind him. It went to Samson's heart; for he saw that, though he had the strength of his namesake, they would outstrip him in the race. However, the sun by this time was high down; and it instantly occurred to him that the farmers, having themselves and horses to bait, would postpone till to-morrow their visit to Lady Glencairn, unless the sight of him would awaken their alarm; and so, if he could conceal himself, he might steal a march on them in the morning, and be the first, after all, to get her Ladyship's ear. Samson, in a moment, clears the ditch, and lies safe in the bosom of a broom bush. The farmers jog merrily on, little thinking who listens and lies beneath the broom. So soon as Samson, cautiously peeping out, finds that the foe are out of sight, he issues forth; and in the hope the farmers would be con-tant for that night to enjoy the comforts of the Harrow Inn, he passes on to Edinburgh, where he immures himself in some obscure lodging. He is up next morning with the dawn, and away to Coates House, where her Ladyship lived. So soon as Samson counts that the servants are awake as well as he, his strong arm is thundering at the door. On demanding, at that untimely hour, to see her Ladyship, he is rebuffed by her lackey, and very summarily told to go about his business, for nobody could or would see her Ladyship at such an hour. Samson, however, stands to his point—tells the servant ‘he maun see Lady Glencairn,’ and bids him go and tell her Ladyship that ‘Miller Samson from Ochiltree maun see her Ladyship on business that winna wait.’ He makes good his entre—unravels the plot to her Ladyship—and leaves her with the assurance that the nominees of the farmers should not be presented, and, what was then sufficient security to the pious people of Scotland, that she would be guided by Dr Erskine in filling up the charge. Samson, making his best bow, walks forth with a buoyant step. As Samson is going out the farmers are coming in. The sight of the strong man of old never filled the Philistines with more dismay. The truth flashed upon the farmers, and, as he walked forth with an air, and cast on them a look, which very plainly said, ‘You are a day behind the fair,’ one of the farmers was heard to say, ‘There goes Miller Samson—our meal’s a’ daigh!’ The farmers found the matter settled; and thus, through the piety, the energy and generalship of an humble man, the parish of Ochiltree was speedily blessed with an efficient and evangelical minister.*

Of the story of “Miller Samson” we know nothing;† but certain manuscript jottings in our possession enable us to throw some light on the romantic circumstance alluded to in reference to Lady Glencairn. Her Ladyship was the daughter or grand-daughter of Hew M’Quyre, “violer,” or musician in Ayr.† M’Quyre was kind to a destitute orphan boy, of the name of Macrae, who endeavoured to gain a livelihood by running messages for halfpence. He put him to the schools for several years. Macrae went to sea—fortune favoured him, and he rose from one step to another, until he attained the governorship of Madras. After amassing a large fortune in India, he came home and purchased several estates in the west of Scotland. This must have occurred before 1733, in which year, August 1, he was admitted a burgess of Ayr. He is styled in the record “James Macrae, late Governor of Madras.”‡ In 1734, he presented the city of Glasgow with a metallic statue of King William III., which stands at the cross;|| and in 1745, 17th December, he lent the burgh £1500 sterling, at 4½ per cent., to make up the sum levied by Prince Charles Edward. In Weir’s “History of Greenock,” published in 1829, it is said—“A little above Cartburn—[Crawfurds of Cartburn]—stood a cottage that gave birth to the celebrated donor of the equestrian statue of King William to the city of Glasgow, James M’Rae, who was long herd to the tenant of Hillend, the great-grandfather of the late H. Crawford.* Tradition says that M’Rae offered to place the statue in Cartsdyke; but the then Laird of Cartburn (a very godly man) rejected it, wishing, in preference, that the influence of Mr M’Rae might be exercised to have Cartsdyke erected into a parish. This Mr M’Rae became the ancestor of the families of Glencairn, Orangefield, Houstoun, and Don.† He lies interred in the churchyard at Monkton.” It is possible that Macrae may have been born at Cartburn, but from the misstatements of the writer, in reference to the Glencairn and other families, no great reliance is to be placed on his information. It is evident, at all events, that a considerable part of his early years had been passed in Ayrshire. If a native of Cartburn, it is rather curious that he should have been interred at Monkton. In the Memorandum Book of John Dickie, farmer in Loans, from 1715 to 1750, it is stated that “the monument was built at the Whiteside, above the Monkton, for the deceased Governor M’Crae, in 1748, by John Swan, and fell, being near compleat, on 13 August 1749. Rebuilt again by John Swan, 1750.” This monument still exists, and, being situated on a rising ground, is a prominent object in the vicinity. The lands on which it is built, were formerly part of the Orangefield estate, anciently called Prestwick. Evidence of his early connection with Ayrshire is supplied in the following anecdote: One day, when riding near Ochiltree, in company with a party of gentlemen, on coming to an old thorn tree, he desired them to proceed, at the same time alighting himself. After waiting a considerable time at some distance, the gentlemen returned, and found him sitting with his back to the thorn. He said he remembered having often sat there, “picking poovlies” from his person!—a remark which strikingly illustrates the lowliness of his condition. What a crowd of reflections must have passed through his mind as he sat under the thorn, and contrasted the poverty of his early days with the nabob-like affluence of his circumstances then. A poor herd boy, in the parish of Ochiltree, Governor of one of the richest presidencies in British India! Fancy could scarcely conceive a more romantic turn of fortune’s wheel.

But for the kindness of M’Quyre, the violer, who gave the orphan boy education, Macrae never could have attained to such distinction and wealth, and it is creditable to his memory that he remembered this with gratitude. On his return to Scotland, he sought out the family of his benefactor, and showered his riches upon them. Whether old M'Quyre was dead we know not; but the probability is, that he had previously "paid the debt of nature." In 1749, 20th December, we find "Hugh M'Queir of Drumdow" admitted a Burgess of Ayr; and in 1753, "Charles Dalrymple of Orangefield, son-in-law to Hugh M'Queir of Drumdow," also admitted a Burgess. This Hugh M'Quyre of Drumdow must have been a son of the violer, not the violer himself, who could scarcely be supposed to have so long survived his distinguished protegy. Drumdow we should suppose to have been a small property, now a farm, in the parish of Stair, near Ayr.* It was no doubt acquired through the munificence of Governor Macrae, who, himself a bachelor, bequeathed all his property and money to the family of the old violer. Hugh M'Quyre of Drumdow had, besides a son, three daughters, who were esteemed handsome. They were well educated by Macrae, and all of them had ample doweries—the gift of the Indian Governor. The hand of the eldest, Elizabeth, was sought by no less a personage than William, thirteenth Earl of Glencairn. The Governor is said to have felt a deep interest in the match. Shortly before the marriage took place, he was seized with a severe illness, which was thought to be his last. He inquired at the physician who attended him—Dr Campbell of Ayr—whether he could preserve him for a few days to witness the ceremony. Campbell declared his regret that he could not promise to do so. Then exclaimed the gruff old Governor, "D—n you and all your drugs!" It would appear, however, that he did survive long enough; for the marriage took place in 1744, and Macrae, as we have seen, from his lending money to the city of Glasgow, was not dead in 1749. The second daughter, Margaret, married James Erskine of Barjarg, who was one of the Barons of Exchequer in 1754; and elevated to the bench, as one of the Lords of Session, in 1761. He changed his title from Lord Barjarg to Lord Alva. The third daughter married Hew Dalrymple of Orangefield, near Monkton. It was the son of this marriage, Charles Dalrymple of Orangefield, who subscribed for ten copies of Burns' poems, and introduced the poet to his cousin James, fourteenth Earl of Glencairn, upon whose death, in 1791, Burns wrote the well known "Lament."

* Some notice was taken of this story in the Ayr Observer, 3d August 1847, from which it appears that Miller Samson was very opposite to a singular Christian.

It is probable that the Earl of Glencairn stooped to woo the grand-daughter of the violer chiefly on account of her wealth, without entertaining much esteem for her personally. It is said, at all events, that they did not live happily. If she was "a singular child both of Providence and grace," as Mr Guthrie states, his lordship did not give her much credit for her virtues. He taught his young son to entertain little respect for her. She had the reputation of being very hard to the tenants of Finlayston,† and, if report speaks truly, would hardly allow her sister Margaret, who lived with her for some time at Finlayston before her marriage, the use of a light to her bed-room. The statement, however, may be overcharged; and it is probable that her habits of economy arose from a desire to restore the sinking fortunes of the house of Glencairn, which, for some time back, had been in a waning condition.* The Earl was occasionally twitted about his marriage. He and the Earl of Cassillis, it is said, were at Ayr on a public occasion, when Cassillis, being elated with wine, jeeringly remarked to Glencairn, on the subject of music, that he believed his lady's grandfather was the "best bow in this country." Glencairn promptly replied "Yes, especially when he used to play his master-piece, Johnnie Faa and the Countess o' Cassillis." All the sons of the Countess of Glencairn died without issue. Her only surviving daughter, Lady Henrietta, was married to Sir Alexander Don of Newton.

The eldest son of Hugh M'Quyre of Drumdow, James, was left the great estate of the barony of Houston, comprehending a whole parish, by Governor Macrae, on condition that he assumed the name of Macrae. This property belonged to Sir John Houston, who had no male heirs. His daughter carried it in marriage to Sir John Schaw of Greenock, about 1730 or 1740. Schaw sold the barony to Sir James Campbell, whose heirs sold it again† "to — Macrae, Governor of —, in the East Indies, who died without issue; but left the estate to James M'Quire, eldest son of Hugh M'Quire of Drumdow, Esq., in Ayrshire, who afterwards was to bear his name and arms. The said James M'Quire, afterwards James Macrae, was succeeded by his eldest son, James Macrae, who demolished the manor, or castle of Houston, in 1780–1, except one square, and applied the stones thereof to the building of a new town which he had lately feued off.

"The foresaid manor, so late as the year 1777, was one of the strongest, elegantest, and ancientest structures of any in the country; the fabric being five squares (I am sorry to repeat again, that only one of the squares remain) and a court within, having only one entry thereto, where was hung a great iron-gate, which was ready to let down upon occasion, which, being down, secured the whole castle, as having no windows on the outside of the house, till above 12 feet high. In former times, a high tower was on the west side thereof, part of which was taken down about thirty or forty years ago.

"The whole barony belonged to the said James Macrae in 1780, except one house in the town of Houston. In 1781, he caused a survey, and planned off a piece of ground, a little farther up the rivulet (or burn) than the old town, and feued off 38 or 40 steadings for building upon, having regular broad and straight streets across each other at proper distances, conveniently lying on said burn, where there is a common bleaching field for the town's use: only the main street, called Milliken Street, is made, which is about 40 feet wide. In April 1782, he alienated the barony of Houston to Alexander Speirs of Ellerslie, Esq. Fowler, in his "Sketches of the Towns of Renfrewshire," says—

* There was, in the summons of Lord Eglinton in 1734, "Hugh Crawford, now of Drumdow, the 4 merk land of Wrightshills and Drumdow, parish of Ochiltree." There appear to be several properties of that name in Ayrshire.

† Residence of the Earls of Glencairn in Renfrewshire.

* Lady Glencairn's money, as report states, was laid out in purchasing the Kilmarnock estate.

† We quote from Sample's Continuation of Crawford's Renfrewshire, published in 1782.

"This James Macrae was a Goth, and committed a most barbarous deed, to demolish the great and splendid castle in 1780, and apply the stones to the building of a new village for lappet weavers."

James Macrae, afterwards styled of Holemains, was better known in the fashionable world as Captain Macrae. In Chambers' Traditions of Edinburgh, we have the following notice of him:—

"The Misses Ramsay had their shop at the east side of the old Lyon Close, north side of the High Street, opposite the upper end of the City Guard-House. They made a fortune in business, and built, towards the end of their lives, Marion Ville, a splendid villa near Restalrig. People called it Lappet Ha', in contempt of their profession. Here, about thirty-seven years ago,* lived Captain Macrae, celebrated for having killed Sir George Ramsay, in a duel fought upon Musselburgh Links, which took place in consequence of an insult which Captain Macrae thought he had received from Sir George's servant at the door of the theatre. Captain Macrae was very fond of theatricals, and had a private theatre fitted up in his house. After the duel he escaped abroad."

The real facts of the case are related in the "Life of Peter Burnet, a negro."† Peter was a lunkie in Edinburgh at the time. Sir George Ramsay and his lady were at the theatre, and had ordered the valet to provide a chair for the lady at the close of the performance. The servant had, accordingly, the chair in readiness at the time appointed. Captain Macrae came out of the theatre and wanted the chair. To this Sir George's servant would not submit; and the Captain knocked him down. The servant prosecuted for the assault; and, to get quit of it, Macrae wrote to Sir George, almost ordering him to dismiss his servant. Sir George refused to do so, on the ground that the servant had done nothing but his duty. The consequence was a duel between the parties, fought on a challenge from Macrae, and Ramsay fell at the first shot. Macrae fled, and never appeared in this country again.

A great sensation was created over Scotland at the time, Macrae being a bully and a professed duellist, and Ramsay a quiet country gentleman.

In "Kay's Edinburgh Portraits," the Captain is represented as practising, with pistol, at a barber's block, and, in the accompanying letter-press, some additional particulars are given of the parties engaged in the unfortunate affair:—

James Macrae of Holemains, Esq., had the misfortune to obtain a celebrity, by no means enviable, as a duellist. He was a capital shot, and, it was said, obtained his excellency by firing at a barber's block, provided by him for that purpose. In April 1790, the event occurred which had the effect of exiling him from his native land. On Wednesday, 7th April, Captain Macrae, thinking himself insulted by a footman of Lady Ramsay at the theatre, beat him severely. Macrae, the next day, met Sir George Ramsay in the street, when he told him he was sorry to have been obliged to correct a servant of his last night at the play-house. Sir George answered, that the servant had been a short time with him, was Lady Ramsay's footman, and that he did not consider himself to have any concern in the matter. Macrae then said he would go and make an apology to Lady Ramsay, which he did. On Monday, 12th, the footman commenced an action against him. Macrae wrote to Sir George, requesting him to turn off his servant, which he refused to do. A great many notes passed between them. At last Captain Macrae challenged Sir George. The duel took place at Musselburgh. Sir George was killed. There can be little doubt that Macrae, in this unfortunate affair, was highly blameable. He fled to France. He was cited upon criminal letters, dated 26th May 1790, to take his trial for murder on the 26th of July following. Sentence of outlawry was pronounced against him. Previous to his outlawry, he took the precaution to convey his estate to trustees, who subsequently executed an entail of it. The servant had given a good deal of abusive language to Captain Macrae, yet their lordships were of opinion that no abusive language whatever could justify the act of beating a man to the effusion of his blood. Sir George Ramsay, although married, left no issue, and was succeeded by his brother William. The indictment runs in name of Dame Eleanor Fraser, relict of the deceased Sir George Ramsay of Banff, Bart., and Sir William Ramsay of Banff, Bart., his brother-german. Before his exile, Macrae married Miss Maria Cecilia le Maistre, by whom he had a son and a daughter. He died abroad on the 10th January 1820.

A story is told of Captain Macrae, which is strictly in conformity with his character. One of his servants having done something in a manner that did not please him, he struck him, whereupon the man muttered that "he durst not strike him so, if he were one of his fellow-servants in the hall." "Oh!" said the Captain, "if you are for a boxing-match, I shall give you a fair chance for it; only you must not strike me in the face." This being agreed upon, down stairs they went and fought till the Captain owned he had got enough, adding, "You are a bit of good stuff, sirrah; there are five guineas for you." The servant remarked, he would be content to be thrashed for as much every day.

Captain Macrae was a strange character. To those of his own class he was a tyrant and a bully; whilst his conduct to those below him was kind and obliging.

BORTHWICK CASTLE.

THE magnificent old Castle of Borthwick is situated in the parish of the same name, about eleven miles from Edinburgh, and within one and a half miles of the Gore-Bridge station of the Edinburgh and Hawick Railway. It occupies a rising ground above the small river Gore, a tributary of the Esk, and forms a striking and most picturesque object in the valley in which it is situated. Borthwick Castle is of very considerable antiquity, having been erected in 1430, by Sir William de Borthwick,*

* Sir William Borthwick, of Borthwick, was a person of consequence in the time of King James I. He is repeatedly mentioned by Rymers, in particular in the year 1421, when he was one of the hostages for who, contrary to the usual baronial custom, conferred his own name upon the edifice, in place of deriving his title from it. The castle has long been uninhabited; but, although little or no care was bestowed upon it for many years, in consequence of a frequent change of proprietors, it still remains in very excellent preservation, and might be rendered habitable at a comparatively trifling outlay. The castle is situated on an eminence of no great height, at the bottom of which flows the Gore. It has been surrounded by an outer court, occupying the entire summit of the eminence, enclosed and fortified by a strong wall with flanking towers at the angles, one of which only, that at what appears to have been the principal entrance, remains tolerably entire. Borthwick Castle is of greater dimensions than the generality of coeval baronial towers; it measures seventy-four feet in the king's ransom and liberation. In 1430, he obtained a license from King James I. to build the castle of Borthwick, and soon after this he was created a peer of parliament. He was s. by his son,

William Borthwick, second Lord Borthwick, who was s. by William Borthwick, third lord, who sat in parliament, 1467, as Lord Borthwick, and in a number of other parliaments, down to 1505. He was slain at Flodden in 1513. He m. Maryota de Hepe Pringle, and had (with several daughters) two sons, viz.,

William, his successor.

Alexander, of Nenthorn, whose descendant and heir male,

Henry Borthwick, was adjudged by the House of Lords, in 1772, to be tenth Lord Borthwick.

He was s. by his elder son,

William Borthwick, fourth Lord Borthwick; from whom the dignity passed, uninterrupted, in succession to

John Borthwick, ninth Lord Borthwick; who d. s. p. in 1672, and from that period until 1762 the title lay dormant, when it was adjudged by the House of Lords to Henry, the descendant and heir male of Alexander Borthwick, of Nenthorn, who consequently became Meary Borthwick, tenth Lord Borthwick; who m. at Edinburgh, 5th March, 1770, Margaret, daughter of George Drummond, of Broich, co. Stirling; but d. without issue, at Newcastle, on his way to London, 6th September, 1772, when the title became again dormant, and so continues.

NOTE.—At the time of Lord Borthwick's death, his heir male, Archibald Borthwick, was in Norway. In 1807, that gentleman presented a petition to the king, claiming the dignity of Lord Borthwick, which was referred to the House of Lords, and opposed by John Borthwick, Esq. of Crookston, when there was laid before the House of Lords, the "Case of John Borthwick, Esq. of Crookston, objecting to the claim of Mr Archibald Borthwick;" according to which

Sir William Borthwick, created first Lord Borthwick, died before 1458, leaving William, second lord; and

John de Borthwick, who acquired the estate of Crookston in 1446, and from whom the objector, Mr Borthwick of Crookston, is descended, through ten generations, in a direct male line. Various proceedings have taken place before the Lords, but as yet there has been no decision.

length; sixty-eight feet in breadth, and, to the top of the battlements, is ninety feet in height. It is built of hewn stone, without and within; and, so excellent are the materials, that even the angles of the tower are almost as sharp as when the stones passed from the hands of the workmen. The walls are of extraordinary thickness, decreasing from thirteen feet near the foundation to about six feet at the top of the edifice. The great hall and some of the other principal apartments are strongly arched, and are consequently in nearly as good preservation as when they were the scene of Lord Borthwick's princely hospitality. From the other apartments, however, the joists and flooring have been removed, to be converted, it is said, to base purposes, in order to gratify the avarice of a temporary proprietor; and, in consequence, these portions of the interior present a much more ruinous appearance. In the great hall there is a large ornamented chimney, some of the stones belonging to which appear to have been only recently displaced, and unless these be speedily restored, it is evident that many more will shortly follow. At the opposite end of the hall is a niche, with a richly carved canopy, and traces of painting are still perfectly distinct on the arched roof. In its high and palmy days this must have been a splendid apartment, both from its great loftiness and the splendour of its decoration. The upper apartments were reached by three staircases of stone, the principal of which, a circular one of considerable width, is quite ruinous, but the others are in such good order, that the most timid may easily reach the battlements.

In reference to the peculiar position of Borthwick Castle, Sir Walter Scott says, that "like many other baronial residences in Scotland, Sir William de Borthwick built this magnificent pile upon the very verge of his own property. The usual reason for choosing such a situation was hinted by a northern baron, to whom a friend objected this circumstance as a defect, or at least an inconvenience: 'We'll brizz yont' (Anglice, press forward), was the baron's answer; which expressed the policy of the powerful in settling their residence upon the extremity of their domains, as giving pretext and opportunity for making acquisitions at the expense of their neighbours. William de Hay, from whom Sir William Borthwick had acquired a part of Locherworth, is said to have looked with envy upon the splendid castle of his neighbour, and to have vented his spleen by building a mill upon the lands of Little Lockerworth, immediately beneath the knoll on which the fortress was situated, declaring that the Lord of Borthwick, in all his pride, should still hear the clack of his neighbour's mill in his hall." Although it is difficult to account for the Lord of Borthwick submitting tamely to this insult, it is nevertheless true, that the mill continued to perform its humble, but needful office, long after the brighter glories of the castle had waned. After it ceased to be used as a mill, it was allowed to become roofless, and go to ruin, until about nine months ago, when a new roof was placed upon the tottering walls, and it is now occupied as a store for the supply of clothes and provisions to the navies employed on the Hawick Railway. The dwelling which was attached to the mill, but which is of more modern erection, is tenanted by a female, whose ancestors, for a period of three hundred years, filled the post of miller.

Borthwick Castle appears to have been frequently visited by Queen Mary; and in 1567 she took shelter there when her unfortunate connection with Bothwell had estranged both peers and people. Referring to this period, the following entries occur in Cecil's diary:—

"October 7, 1566. My Lord Bothwell was hurt in Lyddisdale, and the queen raid to Borthwick."

"June 7, 1567. He (Bothwell) purposed and raid against the Lord Houme and Fernherst, and so passed to Melros, and she to Borthwick."

"June 11, 1567. The lords came suddenly to Borthwick. Bothwell fled to Dunbar, and the lordis retired to Edinburgh, she followed Bothwell to Dunbar disguised."

The lords appear at first to have entertained no design against the person of the queen, but their success having exceeded their expectations, they seem to have changed their intentions; and the knowledge of this having reached Mary, she resolved on instant flight, "dressed in men's clothes, booted and spurred." A small arched apartment, on the second story of the castle, is traditionally pointed out as the bed-room occupied by Mary and Bothwell on this occasion. Singularly enough this is the only castle mixed up with the history of the ill-starred Mary, that we have chanced to visit, without being shown a thorn which, in some way, was connected with her career, either as planted by her on some specific occasion, or having been the scene of an incident in her life. A thorny path was hers, and such memorials are fitting emblems of her harassed existence.

A less gentle visitor of Borthwick Castle was Oliver Cromwell, who, after the unfortunate battle of Dunbar, set about reducing the various fortresses near the metropolis which still held out for the king. The garrison of Borthwick appears to have been particularly active, and, on this account, it speedily attracted the attention of Cromwell. On the 18th November 1650, he dispatched a summons to the Governor, who is generally supposed to have been Lord Borthwick himself, in the following terms:—

"For the Governor of Borthwick Castle, These.

"Sir,—I thought fitt to send this trumpett to you, to lett you know that, if you please to walk away with your company, and deliver the house to such as I shall send to receive it, you shall have libertie to carry off your armes and goods, and such other necessaries as you have. You harboured such parties in your house as have basely, unhumanely, murdered our men; if you necessitate me to bend my cannon against you, you must expect what I doubt you will not be pleased with. I expect your present answer, and rest your servant, O. CROMWELL."

Notwithstanding this threat, and with the full knowledge that it was likely to be made good, the castle was not surrendered until Cromwell's cannon had been actually "bent" against it, and destroyed a considerable portion of the facing on the eastern side, immediately underneath the battlements. Oliver, however, acknowledged the bravery of the defenders, by granting them a very honourable capitulation. The effect of this "mark" of Cromwell is certainly very striking, all the other portions of the castle being in such excellent preservation. The facing of hewn stone is entirely removed from the spot against which the battery was directed, and the rough making-up of the walls being laid bare, has a honey-combed or worm-eaten appearance, which contrasts strongly with the portions of the building immediately surrounding, and which suffered nothing from the republican cannon. Various unsuccessful attempts are said to have been made to repair this part of the castle, but no evidence of any such are visible, and we are rather inclined to think that these reports are apocryphal. We were, however, gratified to learn that, at the time of our visit, estimates were in course of being taken for the necessary repairs at this point. Indeed, no time is to be lost, as additional stones are frequently falling, and unless measures be taken to arrest the dilapidation, it is evident that, at no distant date, the general appearance of the structure will become greatly impaired. In connection with this, we may remark that various shrubs have taken root on the summit of the castle, and are rapidly shooting up into trees. These, from the height of the building, are much exposed to the wind, and the roots being entwined amongst the stones, must exert a leverage upon them which will ultimately displace them, exposing the joints to the effects of the weather, and thus weaken the structure. The shrubbery in such a position may, perhaps, by some, be considered to heighten the picturesque effect, but even at the risk of slightly marring this effect, we would counsel its removal.

The view from the summit of Borthwick Castle is varied and extensive. About a mile and a half to the eastward, may be seen the top of Crichton Castle, another interesting ruin, to which we purpose directing the attention of the reader in a subsequent article; while a richly diversified tract of country sweeps away in the opposite direction. In the foreground is the line of the Hawick Railway, adding to the landscape a new element—the commercial picturesque, if we may be allowed to coin a phrase. The huts of the navies, which straggle along the sides of the rising ground, do not, in any way, detract from the general effect, as seen from the top of the castle. Indeed, they rather tend otherwise, as serving, in some degree, to assist the imagination in forming a picture of the castle in its former days, when the dwellings of the numerous retainers of the feudal baron were scattered around the lordly pile which was at once their protection, and the attraction of the spoiler. Immediately beneath the castle is the metamorphosed little mill, surrounded by a few straggling houses, a perfect picture of rural retirement, save at those times when bands of hardy navies make their periodical irruptions in search of a supply of "tiger and tommy loaf," the names which they are pleased to bestow on ham and bread.

In the arrangements of his castle, Lord Borthwick by no means overlooked the kitchen accommodation. The fire-place is of huge dimensions, and the chimney, which is carried up through the centre of the building, rivals in size the cone of an ordinary glasshouse. Through a crevice in the wall, on the south side, ashes can be drawn out, mixed up with the bones of various kinds of game, which, as the party who called our attention to the circumstance, naively remarked, may have formed part of the last dinner of the last Lord Borthwick. It is difficult to determine whether the lower apartments of the castle were used as guard-rooms or dungeons, but from the peculiar construction of some of them, we think that at least a portion were appropriated to the latter purpose. In a low roofed, dark room, leading from one of these apartments, there is a well, now choked up with rubbish. The sides are composed of hollowed stone, as far down as we could reach. The castle is wholly devoid of external ornament. There are no dates any where visible, and the only sculpture is the figure of a bishop above the door leading to the drawbridge on the north side; but it has been cut from a much softer material than that of which the other parts of the building are composed, as it is nearly worn away by the action of the weather.

The present proprietor of the castle is Borthwick of Crookston, a descendant, we believe, of the founder, who displays a laudable anxiety for the preservation of this noble edifice. The key of the castle is to be found at a house near the end of the bridge, a little to the west, and the worthy proprietor is desirous that visitors should have every facility for examining the castle, and enjoying the delightful view from the top. Now that railway communication is extended to within such a short distance of Borthwick Castle, we have no doubt that lovers of the picturesque will liberally avail themselves of the facilities afforded for the examination of this "ancient and stately tower" and surrounding scenery.

"CHRONICLES OF THE CANONGATE."

No. II.

UNDER the auspices of the richly endowed Abbey of Holyrood, the Canongate, it may be presumed, gradually extended itself, and grew into importance. There is no record, however, of its early progress—no facts beyond what may be gleaned from general and local history. It is said that the burgh registers, and other documents, were either carried away or destroyed by the troops of Cromwell—a party of whom occupied the council buildings. This is very probable, as it is well known that most of the national papers were removed under the Protectorate. Many of the paintings in the Palace of Holyrood were defaced by the Puritan soldiers, and a great part of the building destroyed by fire. The earliest of the register-books preserved in the archives of the Canongate commences in 1561. This is of course nearly a hundred years before the usurpation of Cromwell—but the volume, which comes down to 1588, was only recently restored to the burgh. It seems to have been in private keeping. A considerable portion of it is printed in the Maitland Miscellany for 1840. No account is given of the custody into which it had fallen. Before 1561, consequently, there is no burghal "Chronicles of the Canongate." It is impossible, therefore, to form any adequate idea of the more early condition of the burgh.

The oldest map of Edinburgh known to exist, is dated 1544. The Canongate seems then to have occupied nearly as much ground as it does now—though not so densely crowded with buildings. None of the houses, however, in existence, of a private nature, are older than 1565.

Unlike Edinburgh, the Canongate had no walls of defence—its gates and enclosures being for civic purposes only. If it relied on the sanctity of its monastic superiors as a protection, it leant upon a broken reed on two notable occasions at least. In 1380, Richard II. of England, who led an army through the Lothians, gave Edinburgh (together, of course, with the Canongate) and Holyrood, to the flames. Again, in 1544, the Earl of Hertford, at the head of a large body of the forces of Henry VIII., committed a similar ravage. The choir and cross of the church were destroyed—the body only being left standing. Maitland, on the authority of Camden, relates that the brazen font was carried away by Sir Richard Lea, Knight, captain of the English pioneers, who presented it to the church of St Alban's, in Hertfordshire, after he had caused the following haughty and imperious inscription to be engraved thereon.*

"When Leith, a town of good account in Scotland, and Edinburgh, the principal city of that nation were on fire, Sir Richard Lea, Knight, saved me out of the flames, and brought me into England. In gratitude to him for his kindness, I who heretofore served only at the baptism of the children of kings, do now most willingly offer the same service even to the meanest of the English nation—Lea the conqueror hath so commanded. Adieu. A.D. 1543 in the thirty-sixth year of Henry VIII."

In the civil wars—during the reign of Charles I., the font was appropriated by the parliamentary army, and converted into money. The Canongate suffered severely from the barbarity of the English force at this time—so much so, that scarcely a house was left standing.

In Scottish history, Holyrood and the Canongate, of course, occupy a prominent place. In 1326-7, Robert the Bruce held his fourteenth parliament in Holyrood. In 1370-1, David II. was buried before the great altar. Amongst the more distinguished personages who have sought the protection of the monastery, may be mentioned the Duke of Lancaster, driven from England by civil war, in 1381. In 1325, Alexander, Lord of the Isles, who had long refused allegiance to the crown, submitted himself to James I., before the high altar of Holyrood, in the presence of the queen and nobles. In 1436-7, the youthful James II. was crowned in the church of Holyrood. In 1469, in the same place, the marriage of James III. and Margaret of Denmark was celebrated with great splendour. So was the union of James IV. and Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. In 1534, Norman Gourlay and David Stratan were tried and condemned for heresy, and executed. They were amongst the earliest of the Scottish martyrs. In 1542, James V. was buried in the east vault of Holyrood.

It is stated by the historians of Edinburgh, and generally believed, that the first palace at Holyrood was built by this monarch. He may have built the more ancient portion of the present palace, but it is evident that there was a royal residence at Holyrood long before. James I. frequently lived there. So did James II.; and, in the account by Young the herald, of the marriage of James IV. and Margaret of England, in 1503, the palace, apart from the church, is distinctly mentioned. He says—"After all reverences done at the church, in order as before, the king transported himself to the pallais, thorough the clostre,* haldynge allwayes the quene by the body, and hys hed bare, till he had brought her within her chammer."† This marriage was regarded as a happy event at the time, and great rejoicings took place on the occasion. Dunbar, one of the best of our earlier poets, celebrated the event in a poem entitled "The Thrissil and the Rois":—

"Than callit scho‡ all flouris that grew on feild,
Discirnyng all thair fassionis and effeiris:
Upone the awfull Thrissil scho beheld,
And saw him kepit with a busche of speiris;
Considering so able for the weiris,
A radius croun of rubeis scho him gaif,
And said, In feild go furth, and fend the laif:

Than to the Rois scho turnit hir visage,
And said, O lusty dochtir most benyng,
Abolf the lilly, illustare of lynnage,
Fro the stok ryell rysing fresche and ying,
Bot ony spot or macull doing spring:
Come blowme of joy with jemis to be cround,
For our e the laif thy bewty is renouwd.

To see this court; bot all wer went away;
Then up I lenyt, halffingis in affray,
Callit to my muse, and for my subject chois,
To sing the royal Thrissil and the Rois."

The following is Young the herald's account of the rejoicings:—The Lady Margaret, after spending some joyous days at Dalkeith Castle, on the 7th August 1503, departed for Edinburgh, "nobly accompanied, and in fayr array, in her litere,§ very rychly enorned."|| A myle from Dalkeith, the kynge sent to the quene a great tame hart, for to have a corse: The kynge caused the said hart to be losed, and put a grayhond after hym, that maid a fayr course; but the said hart wanne the town, and went to his repayre.—Half of the way, the kynge came to mett her, monted upon a bay horse, renning as he wold renne after the hayre, accompanied of many gentylmen.—At the commyng towards the quene, he made hyr very humble obeyssaunce, in lepyng downe of hys horse, and kyssed hyr in hyr litere. This doon, he monted ageyn, and ychon¶ being put in ordre as before, a gentylman husscher bare the swerde before hym. The Erle of Bothwell bare the swerde, at the entreing the towne of Edenburgh, and had on a long gowne of blak velvett, fourred with marten.

The towne of Edenburgh was in many places haunged with tapisserie, the howses and wyndowes war full of lordes, ladyes, gentylwomen, and gentylmen, and in the streyts war soe gret multitude of people without nombre, that it was a fayre thyng to se: The wiche people war verey glad of the commyng of the said quene: And in the churches of the sayd towne bells range for myrthe.—Then the noble company passed out of the said towne to the church of the Holycrosse; out of which cam the archbishop of Saunt Andrew, brother to the said kynge, his crosse borne before hym, accompanied with many bishops and abbots in their pontificals, with the religious richly revested. After this doon, ychon lept off his horse, and in fayr ordre went after the processyon to the church; and in the entreing of that sam, the kynge and the quene light downe, and after led her to the grett awter, wher was a place ordonned for them to knele upon two cushyons of cloth of gold: Bot the kynge wolde never knell down furst, bot both togeder."

Such were the bridal ceremonies of the chivalrous but unfortunate James IV.

Maitland states that "James V., about the year 1528, erected a house (to reside in at his coming to Edinburgh)* near the south-western corner of the church, with a circular turret at each angle; which is the present tower at the north-western corner of the palace; to which was added, by King Charles II. in 1674, all the other parts of the present magnificent royal mansion.

"The said King James, to accommodate himself with a park, enclosed a large quantity of ground in this neighbourhood, with a stonern wall, about three miles in circumference, which probably is nowhere to be paralleled; for, instead of trees and thickets for cover, which other parks abound with, I could not, after the strictest search, discover one tree therein; in lieu whereof it is supplied with huge rocks and vast declivities, which furnish the Edinburghers with the best of stones to pave their streets withal; as do the other parts of the said park yield good pasture and meadow grounds, with considerable spots of arable land; and, as to those excellent stones, I think it will not be amiss to observe, that were they squared and sent to London, where they are in great want of good stones to pave the foot-paths, or sides of the streets withal, I am persuaded they would turn to a good account: for the rag-stones employed in that service are so very bad, that they wear out in a short time; whereas, those of this place are equal in duration to flint, and last for a number of years, even in a common street, incessantly used by the most ponderous carriages.

"This park, consisting chiefly of one hill, arises into three tops, the south-westernmost whereof is denominated Arthur's Seat, but that it should be so called from Arthur, a British or Cumrian king, I cannot give into; for the Right Reverend (Geoffrey of Monmouth) Bishop of St Asaph's account of him is stuffed with such monstrous fables and absurdities, that it has given reason, to men of great eminence and learning, to think there never was such a person in Britain as King Arthur; much more reason I think have they, who take the appellation of Arthur's Seat to be a corruption of the Gaelick Ard-na Said, which implies the height of arrows; than which nothing can be more probable: for no spot of ground is fitter for the exercise of archery, either at Butts or Rovers, than this; wherefore Ard-na Said, by an easy transition, might well be changed to Arthur's Seat.

MOCK PRINCE.—In June 1745, a native of Fife, David Gillies, assumed the name and character of Charles Stuart, Prince of Wales. He went about privately, and, by conferring honours and places, obtained a good deal of money from weak people. Warrants having been issued for his apprehension, he fled, but was caught at Selkirk. The justices of the county, after consulting the crown lawyers, sentenced the mock prince and his court, consisting of two men and two women, to be banished the shire by truck of drum, attended by the hangman, as vagrants; which was accordingly executed on the fourth of July.

* Maitland proceeds upon the idea that no palace had previously existed at Holyrood. We have seen, however, that there was a "pallais" there in 1503, and probably long before. In Marjoribanks' Annals, it is stated that the existing northwest tower was founded by the Duke of Albany during his regency. From the Treasurer's accounts it appears, at all events, that the building was in progress in 1515-16.

THE LAST EARL OF KILMARNOCK.

WILLIAM, fourth Earl of Kilmarnock, was beheaded on Tower Hill, London, on the 18th of August, 1746, "for being," as the English tracts of the day had it, "in the Scotch rebellion." The above portrait of his Lordship is from a print engraved before, or immediately subsequent to his execution, and we conceive it to be a good likeness. Considering the early education of Lord Kilmarnock, having been brought up in strict Presbyterian principles, and with the jealous adherence of his father to the Hanoverian line as an example before him, the participation of his Lordship in the perilous adventure of the young Chevalier, in 1745, created much surprise. His father, William, third Earl of Kilmarnock, took his seat as a member of the Scottish Parliament, on the 6th July 1705, and was a steady supporter of the treaty of union. It is well known that a strong feeling prevailed throughout the country against that measure at the time and for many years afterwards. On the death of Queen Anne, in 1714, a very general expectation prevailed that an effort would be made to restore the Stuart line. Indeed, the attempt of Mar, the following year, to place them on the throne of their fathers, by force of arms, was an ill-conducted out-burst of the spirit which existed. The activity of the Earl of Kilmarnock, in keeping alive the opposite principles of the revolution in the west, was truly conspicuous, and his services in behalf of George I. deserved particular notice. When that monarch was proclaimed, on the death of Queen Anne, the ceremony was performed in Kilmarnock with great enthusiasm, as the following minute from the burgh records attests:—

"10th Aug. 1714.

"The said day King George was proclaimed in a most solemn manner. The Earl of Kilmarnock, his bailies, and the gentlemen above named* being present, and the hail inhabitants standing in array at the cross. The council-house* stair-head covered with carpet, a large bonfire at the cross, and ringing of the bells, all the royal healths drank, and several other loyal healths; and the night concluded with the greatest demonstration of joy, and advertisement put in the gazett thereof. Bailie James Thomson read the proclamation to Robt. Paterson, clerk, who proclaimed it."

When the Earl of Mar unfurled the banner of the Chevalier, St George, at Braemar, about a twelvemonth afterwards, on the 6th September 1715, the Earl of Kilmarnock appeared at Irvine, the general rendezvous of the fencible men of Cuninghame, on the 22d August following, "at the head of 500 of his own men, well appointed and expert at the exercise of arms." They are said to have made the best figure there. His son, Lord Boyd, the unfortunate "last Earl of Kilmarnock," whose portrait heads this article, though only eleven years of age, appeared in arms. Such was the enthusiasm of the father. From Irvine the fencibles marched to Glasgow, whence, by order of the Duke of Argyle, the Earl was despatched with 500 of the Ayrshire volunteers, to guard the passages of the Forth.

The Earl died in September 1717, so that the subject of our notice succeeded to the title and estates of Kilmarnock when a minor, being in his thirteenth year. His appearance in arms on the Hanoverian side in 1715 cannot be held as compromising his after convictions, being then too young to form a decided opinion in political matters; but his conduct subsequently, until within a brief period of his espousal of the desperate cause of Prince Charles Edward, showed no change of sentiment. The burgh records of Kilmarnock bear that, on the death of George I., who died during a visit to Germany, 11th June 1727, he sent an express announcing the event:

"June 27, 1727.

"Express sent by the Earl of Kilmarnock of the death of George the First. The town's trainbands to be in readiness to proclaim the Prince of Wales."

The Earl of Kilmarnock was probably in London at the time. In these days of slow communication, it thus had taken, by express, sixteen days to carry intelligence from Hanover to Kilmarnock. The Earl seems to have been steady in his loyalty to the house of Brunswick at this period.

Various reasons have been assigned for his embracing the cause of the Stuart dynasty; some alleging that pecuniary difficulties drove him to the desperate cast; others, that he was influenced by his lady, whose Jacobite predilections were no secret. The Countess of Kilmarnock, Anne Livingston, was the only daughter and sole heiress of James, fifth Earl of Linlithgow and Callendar, by Lady Margaret Hay, second daughter of John, twelfth Earl of Errol. Though the Kilmarnock estates were considerably circumscribed by the political fall of the family in 1469, still this was much more than made up by the broad possessions brought to him by the heiress of Linlithgow. It appears from the Kilmarnock records that his lordship paid a rather protracted visit to France in 1732. In that year he empowers his countess, by a mandate, dated Paris, 6th September, to manage his estate in his absence. The authorities of Kilmarnock, who were annually appointed to office by his lordship, from a list presented to him, demurred to this arrangement, and firmly resisted the appointment of her ladyship. At length they agreed, through respect to the family, not to carry their opposition to extremes, protesting, at the same time, against her ladyship's acting in this instance forming a precedent. The Earl was two years absent, during which period it is possible he may have been brought into contact with the friends of the exiled house. The statement of his lordship himself, however, in his speech at his trial, is decidedly opposed to any such conjecture. He says:—

"Tho' the situation I am now in, and the folly and rashness which has exposed me to this disgrace, cover me with confusion, when I reflect upon the unsullied honour of my ancestors; yet I cannot help mentioning their unshaken fidelity, and steady loyalty to the crown as a proper subject to excite that compassion which I am now soliciting. My father was an early and steady friend to the Revolution, and was very active in promoting every measure that tended to settle and secure the protestant succession in these kingdoms. He not only, in his public capacity, promoted these events, but in his private, supported them; and brought me up, and endeavoured to instil into my early years, those revolution principles which had always been the rule of his actions.

* * * * * I believe, upon the strictest inquiry it will appear, that the whole tenor of my life, from my first entering into the world, to the unhappy minute in which I was seduced to join in this rebellion, has been agreeable to my duty and allegiance, and consistent with the strictest loyalty."

We are bound to believe the Earl in this statement—for his repentance evidently was sincere. Indeed, the records of the burgh of Kilmarnock bear evidence of the patriotic propriety of his conduct. He seems to have taken a deep interest in the welfare of the locality, and to have been anxious to promote its trading and social improvement. For example:

"26 July 1726.—In presence of the Earl of Kilmarnock [the council] agree to alter the days of the fair, in consequence of their frequently falling on a Saturday. To be held as follows: The fair formerly held on the 15th and 16th July, shall be kept on the 3d Wednesday and Thursday of the said month; and the fair formerly held on the 25th and 26th days of October to be kept up the 3d Wednesday and Thursday of the said month."

About this period the stocking and other manufactures of the burgh had suffered a considerable decline, and several causes, amongst others, the use of inferior material, were assigned for the decay. Various laws were accordingly enacted by the council to promote a revival. 18th Sept. 1729. —On a petition from the incorporation of glovers, of certain masters, journeymen, and apprentices having sold leather breeches without being stamped, the Earl, baillies and council pass a stringent law against all who either sell or buy leather breeches unstamped. In 1731, when it was proposed to build "a new and additional church"—(the present High Church of Kilmarnock)—the Earl of Kilmarnock and Mr Orr of Grougar subscribed 1000 marks towards its erection.—23d June 1737, the Earl present in council, new regulations were made for the serge manufactory, which, notwithstanding all their previous exertions, were "not conform to act of parliament."—31st October 1737—the Earl and council agree to an act of the head court of the burgh, giving £30 sterling yearly for an assistant to Mr Hall out of the vacant stipends and customs in malt. The Rev. Mr Hall was the first minister of the new kirk. Mr Robert Dow was appointed his assistant—but he speedily afterwards demitted his charge, having been called to Ardrossan. The Earl having left the appointment of assistant in the hands of the council, "they made choice of Mr William Boyd in place of Mr Dow."

* The old Tolbooth, where the council-house was, stood at the corner of Cheapside, where Mr Mather's book-shop now is. It had an outside stair, like Irvine jail and council-house. The building was bounded by the water of Kilmarnock on the north.

The temperance or teetotal movement has made much noise in our own day, and it is to be hoped that no small benefit has flowed from it. It will perhaps surprise our readers to be informed that the Earl of Kilmarnock, more than a hundred years ago, was a temperance reformer. The fact stands thus recorded in the town books of Kilmarnock:—

"19th May 1744.—We, the Earl of Kilmarnock, the baillies, Treasurer and members of the town-council of Kilmarnock above-named and subscribing, all convened in council—Being deeply sensible of the pernicious consequences of the immoderate use of French wines and spirits in public houses, drinking of Tea thro' the kingdom, Especially amongst the people of lower ranks, which is carried to so extravagant an excess, To the great injury of this nation, By the exportation of their specie, Discouragement of the national producer, and detriment to the constitution of the people, By all which the nation is reduced to the last Ebb, and is upon the brink of Destruction, Do therefore Resolve and promise, That from and after the first day of July next to come, we and each of us will moderate and discourage the drinking of tea in our severall families; That we will not drink in any publick house, or Drink or use any way in our private houses any French brandy or other French spirits, and as much as lyes in our power Discourage the drinking and Importation of French wines; That we will encourage and assist the officers of the revenue In preventing the clandestine Importing of French wines and spirits, and of tea, and suppressing the smuggling and vending of them In the country by wholesale and retail, and bringing to punishment all persons guilty thereof, By publicly Inforcing and putting the laws in Execution against them; and that we will exhort the community as well as our own tenants, cottars, and servants, to do their duty on the same accounts. That we will encourage all publick houses who do retail strong ale and spirits made from malt and other grain, and will discourage all those who sell and retail French Brandy and other spirits."

To this document is attached the name of the Earl—Kilmarnock. It is written in a large, bold hand. At this period, smuggling, one of the consequences of the union, prevailed to an alarming extent—and it was no doubt to discourage the consumption of foreign exciseable commodities, while they strengthened the hands of government, as well as to promote temperance amongst the people, that induced Lord Kilmarnock and the council to enter into the foregoing agreement. It was then a general, and not yet wholly exploded opinion in Scotland, that the use of tea was injurious to health.

The Earl of Kilmarnock states, in his speech in the House of Lords, that he did not join the Pretender's army till after the battle of Preston, which battle was fought on the 21st September 1744. This was not only true, but we find his lordship present at the council meetings of Kilmarnock down to the end of August immediately previous, busily interesting himself, apparently, in the affairs of the burgh. On the 11th of April 1745, the Earl and council agreed to petition parliament "next session" for the privilege of imposing two pennies Scots on the pint of ale publicly vended in the town, as funds were wanted to make various improvements "commensurate with the increased importance of manufactures;" and, so late as the 20th of August 1745, his lordship and the council heard the petition read, praying for the privilege of imposing two pennies on ale, &c. Tradition affirms that the Earl endeavoured to raise his vassals of Kilmarnock in favour of Prince Charles Edward, and that the assembled burghers declared their readiness rather to shoot himself than join the standard of the Prince; but this is opposed to his lordship's avowal at the bar of the House of Peers. "I was," he says, "so far from approving their (the rebels') measures, or showing the least proneness to promote their unnatural scheme, that, by my interest in Kilmarnock and places adjacent, I prevented numbers from joining them, and encouraged the country, as much as possible, to continue firm to their allegiance." The records bear no evidence of the Earl's having tampered with the loyalty of the people, but rather bespeak, as we have seen, an opposite course. The story, therefore, we should consider to be unfounded.

The Earl of Kilmarnock himself says, that he "did not buy up any arms, nor raise a single man" for the service of the Chevalier, and, as already stated, he did not join the standard "till after the battle of Preston." Indeed, it would appear that he did not do so till immediately before the battle of Falkirk. The Earl and Countess were then living at Callendar House; and it is stated, in Kay's Edinburgh Portraits, on the authority of a domestic of the family who died at an advanced age, "that on the 17th of January 1746 (the day on which the battle of Falkirk was fought), General Hawley was entertained at dinner by the Earl and Countess of Kilmarnock; and that the Earl, leaving the dining-room on some slight excuse, put on his military dress, and, mounting his horse, left the Countess to do the honours of the table. The female, upon whose authority this circumstance is related, described the panic which seized her when she saw the Earl put on his waistcoat of bull's hide, and grasp his sword. He left Callendar wood by the white yett, whence a gallop of a few hundred yards placed him on the field of battle." If this is true—and we see no reason to doubt it—it may be inferred that the Earl had not previously joined the forces of the Pretender—for it is not probable that General Hawley would have so far forgot himself as to dine with an open opponent of his sovereign. The story of the domestic is corroborative of the Earl's statement—that he was "far from being a person of any consequence amongst them," (the rebels)—not having bought up any arms, or raised a single man in their service. He went singly and alone, as interestingly described, by the white yett, to take part in the battle about to be fought, leaving the General of the king's forces at dinner with his lady, who is said to have been distinguished for her conversational powers. That the Countess resided at Callendar House at the time is certain; for, in a letter written by the Duke of Cumberland from Stirling to the Lord Justice-Clerk, soon after the affair at Falkirk,* he says, in describing the adverse circumstances of the Chevalier's army, there is "one circumstance in particular, that Lady Kilmarnock, who till last night had always staid at Callendar House, went off with them."

The subsequent career of the unhappy Earl is well known. At the disastrous battle of Culloden he fell into the hands of the king's forces. By some accounts, he mistook, in the drift which prevailed, the pursuers for a body of the pursued, and was captured. But his lordship himself positively says that, having seen the error he had committed, he determined to leave the Prince's army and submit to his Majesty's clemency, as soon as he should find an opportunity. "For this," he continues, "I separated myself from my corps at the battle of Culloden, and staid to surrender myself a prisoner; though I had frequent opportunities, and might have escaped with great ease. For the truth of which I appeal to the noble person to whom I surrendered."

The Earl was confined for some time in prison at Inverness, and from thence sent along with other prisoners to the tower in London. Every exertion was made both by himself and his friends to obtain pardon, but without effect. Much as there was to bind his lordship's affections to earth—his age, being only about middle life—his countess—his family and his estates—the contrition he expressed was do doubt sincere, uninfluenced by personal considerations; and he had certainly good reason, from "the unsullied honour of his ancestors," as he remarked, and the service of his father in supporting and securing the Protestant succession, to expect forgiveness. Indeed, it seems like studied cruelty in the government of the time, to take the life of one who had so many claims upon the clemency of the crown. The Earl, to the last, entertained strong hopes of pardon. Notwithstanding, he received the intelligence of his doom with manly fortitude. From the account published by Foster of his latter moments, it would appear that the Earl was a plain, conscientious, and, withal, a religious man. He did not affect to meet death with indifference; and, having repented of his bearing arms in opposition to those revolution principles and that government which his father had so strenuously exerted himself to establish—with a reverence for which he had himself been from infancy brought up—he had none of that chivalry of Jacobitism which carried his fellow-sufferer, Lord Balmarino, above every worldly consideration. He met death with philosophic calmness—in his last moments affirming the sincerity of his repentance. A plate on his coffin, which stood on the platform beside the instruments of death, contained this inscription: "Gulielmus Comes de Kilmarnock, decollatus 18 Augusti, 1746, ætat suæ 42." An earl's coronet surmounted the six handles.

It is difficult to assign a reason for the Earl's temporary disloyalty. He speaks himself of having been seduced from his allegiance, but gives not the slightest hint of the nature of his seduction. All circumstances considered, it seems not unlikely that the Jacobitical bias of his Countess had been the syren that won him from his duty. Her ladyship was no doubt deeply grieved by his fate; so much so, that she died at Kilmarnock, on the 16th September 1747, only two years afterwards. She resided in Kilmarnock House, a large mansion, built, but never finished, by the Earl—the original seat of the family, Dean Castle, having been destroyed by fire about 1735. The Earl's eldest son, James, Lord Kilmarnock, who bore a commission in the King's service at Culloden, and thus fought against his father, succeeded, through his mother, to the title and estates of Errol.

The chamberlain of the Earl at the time, Charles Dalrymple of Langlands, was also town clerk of Kilmarnock. He was in possession, it appears, in his official capacity, of the charter chests of the Earl. They remained in his hands after the execution and forfeiture of his Lordship, and, having been stowed away in the garret of the old town buildings, were lost sight of until the fabric was taken down about thirty years ago. They were removed to the new buildings, where they still continue. The chests, two in number, contain a great many interesting family papers. Amongst the charters there is one from Robert the Bruce, in the tenth year of his reign, 1316, granting to "Sir Robert Boyd, one of his first associates in attempting to restore the liberties of Scotland," the lands of Kilmarnock, &c.

RENFREWSHIRE MEMORIALS OF '45.

In this county, as every where, the rebellion of 1745 created great uneasiness—which was vastly increased by the near vicinity of the army of Prince Charles while at Glasgow. A party of Highlanders actually penetrated as far as Blackstoun House, in the parish of Kilbarchan, for the purpose of exacting a levy of provisions. The laird of Blackstoun, Alexander Napier, had rendered himself somewhat prominent on the Hanoverian side. He had purchased a captaincy in a cavalry regiment about 1730; and in 1745, commanded a body of militia, raised for the purpose of opposing the "young Chevalier." Prince Charles ordered a contribution of 45 bolls of corn, and 1000 stones of hay to be exacted from his lands. The lady, in his absence, however, contrived to satisfy the party with one-half the quantity of corn. The following memorandum, by John Cochran of Clipping, near Blackstoun, has been preserved of this affair :—

"There was sevin score Hoghländmaen and there comandars belowing [belonging] to the Pretender came from Glasgow one a Sabbath Night to the hows of Blaxton being the twenty Nint of Decer 1745 and Demanded of the Leady a Thow-sand Stane of Hay and 45 Bols of Corn which she and them agried for 25 bow [bolls] Corn & a Thow-sand Stane Hay and it was said y^t that they mead [made] a bow mil [boll meal, or grinded a boll into meal,] in this parish to ye cowmen [common] men and thay went af abowt tow [two] of the morneng and mrt [marched] to Glasgow."

The Highlandmen were ferried over the water of Cart at Blackstoun by one Peter Fleming, ferryman, who had formerly been a farmer in Kilallan parish. No bridge existed at Blackstoun then. Semple, the continuator of Crawford's genealogical account of Renfrewshire, says "about the year 1766, he [Blackstoun] built a good stone-bridg, with one arch, over the river Black Cart, adjacent to the mision of Blackstoun, for his own private use, being under lock and key." Peter Fleming was compelled to ferry the Highlandmen in 1745. He was a descendant of the house of Barrochan, though remotely. A crazy person of this branch of the Flemings, who, notwithstanding, was possessed of a great mass of pedigree-facts—being a sort of seanchie—used to say "four dogs sould dee afore Peter wad step in to the bruiking of the family."

Mrs Campbell of the Bourthills, parish of Lochwinnoch, who was 98½ years of age on the 25th December 1831, remembered the commotion and alarm of "the Forty-five." The farmers of the Leichlands* drove all their horses and cattle to the Mistilaw, as a place of safety, at the time Blackstoun was attacked. When the drove passed the Mercathill, near Castlesempill, the wife of John Affan† of that mailling, mistaking the trampling of the horses for that of the rebels, became much alarmed, crying, "The Hieland rabiatorst cum we're a ruint and ravisht." The women buried their rings and "sillar harts among the peit ause." The Sempill of Beltrees, who resided then at the Thridpairt, concealed their plate and jewels in the soil of the Barbowie, a farm opposite Thridpairt, on the other side of the water of Black Cart. Colonel McDowall of Castlesempill was a Whig; but his lady, formerly Miss Wallace of Woolnet, was a Jacobite, and a keen favourer of Prince Charles; when the Lochwinnoch militia passed Castlesempill House, on their way to Glasgow, she "swarfit" or fainted.

The Chevalier's army never visited Greenock, in consequence of war-vessels being moored at intervals from about the old battery to above Port Glasgow. It is said that about 18 or 24 came to see the land, and reached as far as the Clune Brac; but, on hearing the fire from the ships of war, returned immediately to the head quarters at Greenock.

"In the year 1745, a regiment of militia was organized at Glasgow, under the Earl of Home, as Colonel, of which about 500 were Glasgow men, and the remainder chiefly from Paisley. This regiment was present at the disgraceful route of Falkirk, and displayed more courage than the troops of the line; for it remained formed after the dragoons and part of the foot had given way. The result was a severe loss to the volunteers. Shortly before the battle, Prince Charles levied from the inhabitants of Paisley the sum of £500 sterling, by way of loan. The sum was borrowed in name of the town from different persons in the place as they could furnish it, and the council agreed to relieve the Treasurer as soon as a proper hand can be found to advance the whole sum upon the town's security.

"This 'proper hand' was soon found in the person of a gallant and loyal gentleman in the neighbourhood, Colonel William McDowall of Castlesempill, to whom in return a bond for £500 was granted.

"Some years afterwards, the council applied to government for relief, on the ground that they had been subjected to the exaction on account of their loyalty, but this application was unsuccessful. The corporation of Glasgow was more fortunate, having succeeded, after three years' unremitting application, in wringing from government no less than £10,000 sterling, as a compensation for money and goods extorted from them by the rebels.

"Why relief should have been granted in this case, and not in the other, it is not easy to discover."*

Robert Brodie of Calderhauch, in 1745, made his will to his nephew, John Caldwell, in the lands of Calderhauch, Johnshill, Fulwoodhead, &c., as follows:—"I, Robert Brodie, son of umquhyle Mr Robert Braedine of Calderhauch, &c., whereas I, being resolved to serve a volunteer in the militia, raised for the defence of our libertys and religion against the rebellion raised by a popish Pretender and his adherents, And that being resolved to settle and order my affairs, That in case of my decease without issue, my heritage may belong in manner following, viz., In the favours of John Caldwell, son of John Caldwell of Lochsyde, and Barbara Brodie, my sister."—PRIVATE LATTER WILL.

"JOHN TAMSON'S MAN."

"JOHN TAMSON'S MAN" is a very common saying in Scotland; but, like many other familiar expressions, the meaning of it is by no means generally understood. Thanks to DUNBAR, one of the most distinguished of our ancient makaris, or poets, little doubt can be entertained of its import, though we may be still in the dark as to its origin.

"TO THE KING.

"The burden of this humorous address, which is preserved in Sir R. Maitland's MS., is a proverbial expression of a man ruled by his wife, in common phrase, a hen-pecked husband. Thus, in the collection of Scottish Proverbs by David Fergusson, under the head 'Of effeminate persons,' one is 'He is John Thomsons's man, couthching carle.'—sign. c. 4. edit. Edinb. 1641, 4to. 'I have little doubt (says Mr Pinkerton) but the original proverb was Joan Thomson's man: man in Scotland signifies either husband or servant, and he quotes the following lines from Sam. Colville's Scottish Hudibras, first printed in 1681:

We read in greatest warriors' lives
They oft were ruled by their wives.
The world's conqueror, Alexander,
Obey'd a lady, his commander:
And Antonie, that drunkard keen,
Was rul'd by his lascivious Queen. . . .
So the imperious Roxalan
Made the great Turk John Thomson's man.

"The intent of the prayer therefore is, That the King were ruled by the Queen. Margaret, Queen of James IV., had, in all likelihood, promised Dunbar her assistance in procuring him a benefice; but he found that her influence with the King was not very strong, and wrote this poem in consequence.

"Line 11. In Bartane.] That is, in Britain; and syn in this line stands for sen, since.

"Line 19. That ye had vowit to the Swan.] The stanza, containing this line, is quoted from our MS. by Mr Tyrwhitt in his excellent glossary to Chaucer; who there adduces a singular instance of this vow from Matthew of Westminster. When Edward I. was setting out on his last expedition to Scotland, 1306, a festival was held, at which, 'Allati sunt in pompaticâ gloria duo CYGNI vel

OLORES ante Regem, phalerati retibus aureis vel fistulis deauratis, desiderabile spectaculum intuentibus. Quibus visis, REX VOTUM VOVIT DEO CYGLI ET CYGNIS se proficisci in Scotiam, mortem Johannis Comyn et fidem lassam Scottorum vivus sive mortuus vindicaturus,' &c.—PINKERTON. 'In the days of chivalry, it was customary for the knights to make vows to God over a roasted swan, peacock, pheasant, heron, or other bird; and these vows were held to be inviolable. The bird was afterwards carried to the table.'—SIBBALD. In the metrical romance of Alexander, translated from the French in 1438, and printed at Edinburgh by Arbuthnot about 1680, one of the books or parts 'the Avowis of Alexander,' (in the French MS. entitled 'Li Veu du Peon,') refers entirely to this singular custom of the knights and ladies taking solemn vows upon themselves when 'the poun' or peacock is set before them. Martin, also, in his Description of the Western Islands, says, 'When the natives kill a swan, it is common for the eaters of it to make a negative vow (i. e. they swear never to do something that is in itself impracticable) before they taste of the fowl.'—p. 71. (Dunbar's Poems, collected by David Laing.)

We are not at all satisfied with Pinkerton's suggestion, that "the original proverb was Joan Thomson's man." Joan is a name, we should say, wholly unknown in Scotland. It does not occur in any family or other writing with which we are acquainted. Besides it is not necessary, to the origin of the saying, that man should be understood as husband. The servant of "John Thomsons" may have been so ruled by his better half as to render him a by-word.

In London, a social club exists, or lately existed, amongst Scotsmen, called "John Tamson's Bairsns"—meaning, of course, that its members were friendly, as brothers of one family. "We're a John Tamson's bairsns" is an expression of mutual good fellowship very frequently heard in Scotland. Thus, whether John Thomson himself, or his man, was the victim of a shrewish wife, it appears he is destined, in all time coming, to stand forward as the prototype of hen-pecked husbands.

"ANTI-JACOBITE MELODIES."

THE Scottish "Jacobite Melodies" have been so much and justly admired, and our sympathies have so chimed in with the chivalrous attempt of "the young Chevalier" to regain the throne of his ancestors in 1745-6, that we have lost sight of the means resorted to by the Hanoverian party, to excite opposition to "the Pretender," as Prince Charles Edward was called. The muse, which had done good service in favour of the Prince, was also besought in the cause of the King. But her efforts for the Hanoverian interest were comparatively stunted and powerless. They were chiefly the offspring of the southern side of the border—and cannot compare with the glowing sentiment, pathos, and rich humour of the Jacobite muse of "the north countrie." Still they may be regarded as curious, though possessing little poetic merit.

Such was the power attributed to song, that the King's anthem was altered by authority, and sung at the theatres in London, in the month of Nov. 1745, as follows:—

God save our valiant king,
Long live our noble king,
God save the king;

Send him victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save the king.

George is magnanimous,
Subjects unanimous,
Peace to us bring;
His fame is glorious,
Reign meritorious,
Let him rule over us,
God save the king.

From France and Pretender,
Great Britain defend her,
Foes let them fall;
From foreign slavery,
Priests, and their knavery,
And Popish reverie,
God save us all.

The bold volunteers of London were encouraged to shoulder their arms in the regular John Bull style:—

A SONG MADE FOR THE LONDON VOLUNTEERS.

Stand round, my brave boys, with heart and with voice,
And all in full chorus agree;
We'll fight for our king, and as loyally sing,
And let the world know we'll be free,
And let the world know we'll be free.

The rebels will fly, as with shouts we draw nigh,
And echo shall victory ring;
Then safe from alarms, we'll rest on our arms,
And chorus it, long live the king,
Long live the king,
Long live the king,
Long live the king,
And chorus it, long live the king.

With hearts firm and stout, we'll repel the bold rout,
And follow fair Liberty's call;
We'll rush on the foe, and deal death in each blow,
Till conquest and honour crown all.
The rebels, &c.

Then commerce once more shall bring wealth to our shore,
And plenty and peace bless the isle;
The peasant shall quaff off his bowl with a laugh,
And reap the sweet fruits of his toil.
The rebels, &c.

Kind love shall repay the fatigues of the day,
And melt us to softer alarms;
Coy Phillis shall burn, at her soldier's return,
And bless the brave youth in her arms.
The rebels, &c.

One of the best productions of the Anti-Jacobite muse of England, is

"A SONG TO THE TUNE OF LILLIBULERO," a well known air of the "Derrydown" school. It is as follows:—

O brother Sawney, hear you the news?
Twang 'em, we'll bang 'em, and hang 'em up all;
An army's just coming without any shoes;
Twang 'em, we'll bang 'em, and hang 'em up all:

To arms, to arms,
Brave boys, to arms!

A true English cause for your courage doth call,
Court, country, and city,
Against a banditti;

Twang 'em, we'll bang 'em, and hang 'em up all.

The Pope sends us over a bonny brisk lad;
Twang 'em, &c.

Who, to court English favour, wears a Scotch plaid;
Twang 'em, &c.
To arms, &c.

A Protestant church from Rome doth advance;
Twang 'em, &c.
And, what is more rare, he brings freedom from France;
Twang 'em, &c.
To arms, &c.

If this should surprise you, there is news, stranger, yet;
Twang 'em, &c.
He brings Highland money to pay England's debt;
Twang 'em, &c.
To arms, &c.

You must take it in coin which the country affords;
Twang 'em, &c.
Instead of broad pieces, he pays with broad swords;
Twang 'em, &c.
To arms, &c.

And sure this is paying you in the best ore;
Twang 'em, &c.
For who once is thus paid will never want more;
Twang 'em, &c.
To arms, &c.

There are one or two rather good hits here. The palm, however, is decidedly in favour of the Scottish muse, even when Anti-Jacobitical—as for example
the

MANIFESTO."

Tune—Clout the Caldron.

Have you any laws to mend?
Or have you any grievance?
I am a hero to my trade,
And truly a most leal prince.
Would you have war, would you have peace,
Would you be free of taxes,
Come chapping to my father's door,
You need not doubt of access.

Religion, laws, and liberty,
Ye ken, are bouny words, sirs;
They shall be a' made sure to you,
If you'll fecht wi' your swords, sirs.
The nation's debt we soon shall pay,
If ye'll support our right, boys;
No sooner we are brought in play
Then all things shall be tight, boys.

Ye ken that, by an union base,
Your ancient kingdom's undone,
That a' your ladies, lords, and lairds,
Gang up and live at London.
Nae langer that we will allow,
For, crack—it goes asunder—
What took sic time and pains to do;
And let the world wonder.

I'm sure, for seven years and mair,
Ye've heard o' sad oppression;
And this is all the good ye get,
By the Hanover succession.
For absolute power and popery,
Ye ken its a' but nonsense:
I here swear to secure to you
Your liberty of conscience.

And, for your mair encouragement,
Ye shall be pardoned by-gones;
Nae mair fight on the Continent,
And leave behind your dry-banes.
Then come away, and dinna stay:
What gars ye look sae landart?
I'd have ye run, and not delay
To join my father's standard!

These verses are to be found in Robert Chambers'
Collection of Scottish Songs, and were written by Mrs Cockburn, respecting whom the late Sir Walter Scott furnished the following particulars:—

"Mrs Catherine Cockburn, authoress of those verses to the tune of the Flowers of the Forest, which beguile,"

'I've seen the smiling of fortune beguiling.'

was daughter to — Rutherford, Esq., of Fairnalee in Selkirkshire. A turret in the old house of Fairnalee is still shown as the place where the poem was written. The occasion was a calamitous period in Selkirkshire, or Ettrick Forest, when no fewer than seven lairds or proprietors, men of ancient family and inheritance, having been engaged in some imprudent speculations, became insolvent in one year.

"Miss C. Rutherford was married to — Cockburn, son of Cockburn of Ormiston, Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland. Mr Cockburn acted as Commissioner for the Duke of Hamilton of that day; and being, as might be expected from his family, a sincere friend to the Revolution and Protestant succession, he used his interest with his principal to prevent him from joining in the intrigues which preceded the insurrection of 1745, to which his Grace is supposed to have had a strong inclination.

"Mrs Cockburn was herself a keen Whig. I remember having heard repeated a parody on Prince Charles's proclamation, in burlesque verse, to the tune of 'Clout the Caldron.' In the midst of the siege or blockade of the castle of Edinburgh, the carriage in which Mrs Cockburn was returning from a visit to Ravelstone, was stopped by the Highland guard at the West Port; and, as she had a copy of the parody about her person, she was not a little alarmed at the consequences; especially as the officer talked of searching the carriage for letters and correspondence with the Whigs in the city. Fortunately the arms on the coach were recognised as belonging to a gentleman favourable to the cause of the Adventurer, so that Mrs Cockburn escaped, with the caution not to carry political squibs about her person in future."

THE ANTIQUE.—There is in the shop of Mr Sharpe, watchmaker, High Street of this town, a curious old clock, which tradition says belonged to the Annandale family, and long divided time in the ancient hall of Lochwood. The curious in mechanical contrivance and the antiquity of inventions will find this relic well worthy of inspection. It is simply a piece of clock work, supported by four brass pillars, which are surmounted by a dome of bell-metal, upon which the hours are struck by a hammer, somewhat after the manner of the modern clock. The twelve hours are marked upon a circular index of brass, and affixed to a plate of the same metal, upon which the maker's name, Leadenhall, and the date 1507, are legibly inscribed. The motive power is weights, cords, and pulleys, the movement controlled by a pendulum and escapement, and the hours only are indicated by a single pointer. What is most worthy of remark in regard to this manifestly antique piece of mechanism, is that, assuming the date, 1507, upon the dial to be that of its actual manufacture, it furnishes very strange testimony to the antiquity of pendulum clocks, an invention which has been always accorded to the seventeenth century, and the honour of the discovery ascribed to Galileo; and it is asserted by Beckman in the history of inventions, that the oldest public clock in England is that of Hampton Court, date, fifteen hundred and something, driven originally by weights, but not regulated by a pendulum. Leaving this to antiquarian argument, it were interesting to speculate upon the preservation which maintained this relic in a family so often subjected to foray and feud, and against the destroying fury of the incendiary fire, kindled with savage glee by Maxwell of Nithsdale, on the towers of Lochwood—when, in the absence of her Lord, he swore to give "Lady Ann light to dress her saracen hood" and for which such signal vengeance was taken upon Dryfe Sands. At present the clock is much out of order; but resuscitated under the hands of Sharpe, an ingenious workman, it might form an interesting object in some hall of curiosities, or museum, such as that of the Dumfries Observatory.—Dumfries Courier.

BERKELEY CHURCHYARD.—I walked about the churchyard for full ten minutes. I never before was in such a poetical place, at least as far as the tombstones are an evidence of the public taste: every grave has a headstone, and every headstone has nearly half-a-dozen lines of hard-earned rhyme upon it. Nearly all Pope's epitaphs are to be found here, but chipped and chopped about a good deal, so as to suit person and purpose: and as the poorest party scorns to rest in peace without a heap of poetry above his head, on the principle, I suppose, of "Placantur carmine manes," the original import being some time expended, many have copied, picked, and plagiarized from their neighbours. On a white stone to the west of the tower were the words—

Attend to me as you pass by,
As you are now, so once was I;
As I am now, so you may be,
Therefore prepare to follow me.

Under this, some wag, who could crack his jokes even beneath Death's head and cross bones, has written in a bold hand, with a black-lead pencil—

To follow you I'm not content,
Unless I know which way you went.

Nearly in the centre of the churchyard is a neat free-stone altar-tomb, erected over the remains of the Earl of Suffolk's fool, with an inscription, I think (though I may be mistaken) by Swift—

Here lies the Earl of Suffolk's fool;
Some call him Dickey Pierce;
His folly served to make men laugh,
When wit and mirth were scarce.
But now, alas! he's dead and gone,
What signifies to cry,
For fools enough are still behind,
To laugh at by-and-bye.

Owing to my eyes not being so young as they once were, I could not make out the date: the incident in itself, however, had sufficient interest for me when I reflected that there was interred one of a race formerly found in every Baronial Hall, but long extinct.—The Church Goer.

INTRODUCTION OF WOOLLEN MANUFACTURES.—King Edward III. was the first to promote woollen manufactures in England. He brought over seventy families of Walloons, for the purpose, in 1331. In 1337 laws were enacted for the encouragement of the manufacture.

THE EARLY LAWS OF SCOTLAND.

No. I.

CONSIDERABLE difference of opinion has prevailed, and, we believe, still exists, amongst antiquaries, as to the early laws of Scotland—some maintaining that our earliest written code was simply a transcript, or, at all events, borrowed in substance from that of England.

It must be admitted, however, that there was a common law anterior to any known statutory enactments, and that this common law was in operation while the government of the country continued purely Celtic. At the convocation of the clergy held by Malcolm Canmore in 1074, these instructors of the people could only speak Gaelic. The king himself had to act as interpreter between them and his queen—Margaret of England. It is thus evident that Gaelic was the common language over all Scotland at this period, and the laws were no doubt Celtic also. It is supposed that there was a shade of difference between the laws of the Scots and Picts, both, however, having the same origin. The law of tanistry, by which the succession to the crown was regulated, existed amongst the Picts as well as the Scots. "Bede casually informs us," says a recent writer, "that it was a rule with the Picts, when the succession came to be disputed, that the preference should be given to the nearest claimant by the female side. It was this law which placed Kenneth on the throne, in opposition to the other competitor, Bred;" and we may add that the same law is recognisable in the claims of Bruce and Baliol to the Scottish throne, in the reign of Edward I. of England, which led to such protracted and destructive wars.

It is certain that what is called the feudal law—the right of "pit and gallows"—was unknown in Scotland before the accession of Malcolm Canmore. The government, in all its ramifications, was patriarchal—a system peculiar to the Celtic nations of Europe. It differed materially from the feudal, which is believed to have been the growth of the invasions and conquests of the Goths and Vandals. Under the patriarchal system the respective districts were governed by the chiefs and ceann-tighes—i.e. heads of families. The former constituted the executive—the latter the judges and juries of the respective clans. The chief presided at the Moot,* and executed the judgment pronounced there by the patriarchs, or ceann-tighes; which judgment was ruled by the deachdadh, or common law. No capital punishments were permitted by this law—all offences or crimes being expiable by a fine, payable to the injured party, or the nearest of kin, by the criminal. This principle of the common law continued to prevail in fact long after the feudal system and statutory enactments had become general.

But neither the chiefs nor ceann-tighes were "lairds" in the sense in which that term is now understood. The country of the clan, as it was called, belonged to the dan collectively, and not exclusively to the chiefs and ceann-tighes. In other words, the people had a right of property in the "country" or district. The chiefs and heads of houses had such portions of lands allotted to them—exclusively, no doubt—as accorded with their position and the importance of their establishments. They had no tenants or vassals under them, and no power to remove any one from his common holding, or to exact an increase of *calpa—for it was not rent the people paid, but merely a contribution, in cane, to support and sustain the dignity of their chief and representative.

The feudal system is generally understood to have been introduced by Malcolm Canmore. It differed essentially from the patriarchal. By it the king was the fountain of all honour and power—the rightful owner and inheritor of the land, and the guardian of all heiresses in the state. The power of the crown being thus greatly exalted and consolidated, the kings of Scotland, from Malcolm Canmore downwards, exerted themselves to establish the feudal, and put down the patriarchal system. Charters were at first chiefly given to foreigners; but the system soon found many favourers among the chiefs and ceann-tighes, who, with charters of the lands of the clan, and the power of pit and gallows conferred upon them, were enabled to act the part of petty sovereigns in their respective districts, and frequently to set the crown itself at defiance.

The introduction of the feudal system, however, met with strong and long continued opposition on the part of the people, and the less intriguing of the chiefs and ceann-tighes—and to this may be traced most of the civil broils, especially in the Highlands, which marked the reigns of the Scottish sovereigns. Charters were freely offered to such as were in a position to assume and make good their titles. From the difficulty of putting them in force, however, they were in many instances allowed to lie dormant—the people of the district included in these grants continuing for ages to enjoy their lands, and pay their calpa to their hereditary chiefs, under whose banner they still fought in war. Even in the Lowlands, the patriarchal system was in partial operation down to a comparatively recent period. In the second parliament of James IV., held in 1489, the following acts were passed, with the view “of undoing of Caupes in Galloway” and Carrick :—

“Item, Because it was meaned and complained be our Sovereine Lordis lieges dwelland in the boundes of Galloway, that certaine Gentlemen, heads of kin in Galloway hes used to take Caupes, of the quihlk tacke there, and exaction thereof, our SOVERAINE LORD, and his three Estaites knew na perfite nor reasonable cause, for the quihlk his Ilienes be advise of the last Parliament, assigned, warned and charged all the persones that claimed or alleaged to take, raise, or intromet with ony sik action of Caupes, to cum to the nixt Parliament, and there ostend and schaw quhat richt they have to the taking of the samin. And now in this present Parliament, the saidis persones making the said claimes, hes bene oft times in called for the ostension and schawing of their richt, as said is, and nane hes compeired nor schawin na richt, nor title of richtes, to raise and take the said Caupes. Herefore our Sovereine Lord, willing and being of intention, to seclude and put away all sik abusiones, evill use and extortiones put on his people and lieges, but reasonable cause. Be authoritie of his Parliament hes ordained to be abused, and left the taking of the said Caupes in all times to cum: And na man to take them of the Kingis lieges, under the paine to be punished as for riefse, and ay in time to cum to be a poynt of ditty in the Justice aire.

“Item, As touching the Caupes in Carrick the Kingis Iliness and his Estaites foresaidis, thinkis expedient and conclusid, that all they quihlkis claimes Caupes, be warned be open Proclamation to compeir in the nixt Parliament, bringand with them sik evidents and richtes, as they will use for the taking of the said Caupes, with certification and they do not, that our Sovereine Lorde, with advise of his three Estaites will annull all sik thing, and will ordain all sik Caupes to be not taken in time to cum.”

Ultimately “the charter-made lords, lairds, and barons” gained ground in the estimation of the people, and their power became firmly rooted. The improper exaction of “caupes” by the “heads of kin” tended latterly, in no small degree, to bring about this consummation. In defining the meaning of caupe, Jamieson adds, that the exaction “was generally the best horse or cow the retainer had in his possession.” From these remains of the system, however abused it might be, we can form a pretty accurate conception of so much at least of the common law in early times.

The patriarchal government seems to have been founded on a mild and equitable principle; but adapted only to a particular state of society. The feudal system, by which it was supplanted, suited another, and perhaps more advanced. Now both have given way to a third, which is but yet adjusting itself to the demands and requirements of society.

DERIVATION OF HOGMANAY, TROLLOLAY.

Hogmanay, Trollolay,

Give us of your white bread, and none of your grey!

THIS well known cry of our juveniles on the last day of the year has given rise to no small inquiry amongst the learned; and still its derivation seems a matter of doubt. Jamieson, in his “Scottish Dictionary,” quotes an article from the Caledonian Mercury of 1792, in which it is stated that Hogmanay is a Druid usage, a change of name only having been given to it on the introduction of Christianity. The origin of it the writer endeavours to trace in the language of the Galls. About the middle of the sixteenth century, he says, great complaints were made to the Gallic Synods of companies of both sexes running about during the Fete de Fous [Scotice, the “daft days,”] with Christmas boxes, calling out as they entered places of worship as well as houses, “Au gui menez, Rollet Follet, au gui menez, tiri liri mainte du blanc et point du bis.” A stop was put to their entering churches in 1598. From the similarity of sound, as well as meaning, between the cry of the French and our Hogmanay, Trollolay, it is inferred that we have derived it from the former. The writer quotes the authority of Bishop Angres, for the opinion that the Fete du Fous was derived from the Druids. He, however, puts forward another conjecture. As our Gothic ancestors worshipped the sun under the name of Thor, and gave the name of Oel to their feasts, particularly to that of the new year, it is possible that the cry may be a “call to the celebration of the festival of their great god.” Minne, or Minni, simply denotes remembrance—hence, “Hogg! Minne! Thorud! Oel!” That is, “Remember your sacrifices; the feast of Thor! the feast!”

In reference to Trollolay, Jamieson observes, “we find a similar phrase in old English; but whether originally, the same is uncertain—

And then satten some, and Song at the nale,
And holpen erie his halfe acre,
With hey trolly lolly.”

Robert Chambers, in his “Popular Rhymes of Scotland,” says, “a suggestion of the late Professor Robinson seems the best, that the word Hogmanay was derived from au gui menez—(to the mistletoe go)—which nummers formerly cried in France at Christmas. At the same time it was customary for these persons to rush unceremoniously into houses, playing antic tricks, and bullying the inmates for money and choice victuals, crying, ‘Tire-lire [referring to a small money-box they carried,] maint du blanc, et point du bis.’ Are we to suppose that Professor Robinson was the author of the article in the Caledonian Mercury, copied by Jamieson, or has Chambers, in attributing the “suggestion” to Professor Robinson, overlooked the prior suggestion, which is precisely the same, of the anonymous writer.—It is possible that this may have been the origin of the Scottish cry of Hogmanay—still it is curious how our ancestors came to imitate the French so unmeaningly in the first part of it, and to translate so closely the second—maint du blanc, et du point bis—“Give us of your white bread, and none of your grey." Why not have rendered the whole cry into English or Scottish?

A still more ingenious attempt to trace the origin of "Hogmanay, Trolloley," was made by John Callander, Esq. of Craigforth, whose essay on the subject appears in the Transactions of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, printed in 1818. He alludes to the supposition that Hogmanay is derived from Sancta Luna, or the holy month, it being generally believed that our Saviour was born about that season of the year—but he finds no term in the rubrics of the Roman church bearing the slightest resemblance to it. Others, he says, have sought for it in the French, alluding to the birth of Christ, and the subsequent adoration paid to him by the three wise men of the east ; but no such song, it would appear, is in use among the French at Christmas. Conceiving the observances of Christmas to be purely of Scandinavian origin, the author at once sets himself to the task of discovering it in that quarter. All the northern tribes, says Mr Callander, paid religious veneration to the night rather than the day. Cæsar and Tacitus have both remarked this. Our Saxon ancestors, who brought their customs with them into Britain, began their computations of time from the night. In the laws of King Ina we read :—"Cild binnan thriftigum nighta,"—let a child be baptised within thirty nights. After their conversion they substituted the festival of Christmas for the rites of Paganism, used in this mother night, from which they commenced their computations. This change, however, occasioned no alteration in the name of the month, which continued to be called Heligmonat, the sacred month. The Saxons had their names and festivals from their Scandinavian ancestors—those tribes who first peopled Denmark, Sweden, Norway and Iceland. The festival of the new year was celebrated from time immemorial by these people, with sacrifices and other religious rites, in the month of December—hence, called Hogmonat and Blothmonat, signifying the month of immolation, or sacrifices. Blath, in the Icelandic, means a sacrifice. This winter feast was also called Haukunott, or Hokanot, the etymology of which has not been defined. As it was always celebrated at the winter solstice, it was called Iol, (yol) whence we formed the word yule, or yule. Hence, December was called yiuli : by Saxons, Gaol and geoldon, signifying to return. From this also comes goal.

"L' Homme est né, Trois rois la ;"

From these facts the author contends that Hogmanay is only a corruption of the Icelandic Hogmonat and Hokanot, the original names of the Christmas festival. The term, he says, is yet to be found in Normandy, carried there by the Scandinavians, who conquered that province under Rolf or Rollo, during the reign of Charles the Simple. The ingenious Gebelin, in his Monde Primitif, says that Haguineter, or Hogingnetes, is the name of those gifts which are offered by friends on the last day of the year. These, adds Gebelin, were always demanded in song—

Si vous veinez à là dépense,
A là dépense de chez nous,

Vous mangeriez de bons chous,
On vous servirait du sort,
Hoguino.^{*}

Menage has preserved another of them, which was sung in his time in the city of Rouen :—

Donnez mois mes Haguignetes,
Dans un panier que voici,
J'ai l'acheta i samedi,
D'un bon homme de dehors.
Mais il est encore a payer, Haguinelo.

The learned Gebelin has observed that Haguinelo was derived from the ancient cry of the Druids, a gui, the new year ; but if he had remembered the Scandinavian Hogmonot, he would have found the etymology nearer home, as well as nearer the meaning of the word used in Normandy.

Respecting the word Trolloley, Mr Callander finds plain traces in it of the Icelandic Trolldr, denotive of evil genii, who devoured unlucky mortals who went near their haunts. Thus Trollolay would signify—"away ye evil genii, be ye far from our solemn meetings." The ancient historical monuments and Runic poems are full of accounts of these spectres. Mallet gives the following description of them :—"This monstrous race is said to have subsisted for a long time in the mountains and forests of Norway, where they continued down to the ninth century ; that they fled from the open day, living only with those of their own species in solitude and clefts of the rocks ; that they fed on human flesh, and were so skilled in magic as to be able to fascinate the eyes of men. In process of time they mingled with women of our species, and produced demi-giants, who, approaching nearer to the human race, at length became mere men." Their skill in magic was reputed so great that Troll is used to signify magic. In the Icelandic Bible, witch is called Trollkona. But Troll or Trull is commonly used to signify one of those spectres we are treating of. The Vandals called the whole Gothic nation Troll. Many places in Scandinavia retain the name of these Trolldr.

These evil genii appeared most frequently at the festival of Iul or Yule, during the long nights of December. Thus, in one of the ancient Runic monuments quoted by Torfaeus—"Hedin, Helgii frater, cum festi Jolenis tempore, solus ex sylva domum viet, abiram habet foeminam giganteam. Haec lupo insidebat, et serpentes habenarum loco habuit."

Such is the substance of the essay on Hogmanay by Mr Callander. It certainly is ingenious, and, to our fancy, approaches much nearer the origin of the cry than any of the suggestions hitherto put forward. The editor of the "Transactions" thinks it probable, from a passage in Torfaeus, overlooked by Mr Callander, that Trollolay was an invocation to Trollhaena to defend those liable to be attacked by the Trolldr. Haena may have been originally Haegna, a Scandinavian word, meaning to defend, or inclose. Hence, Trollhaena, "The Defender from the evil genii."

* In Gebelin the word is Hoguino.

THE BETRAYAL OF SIR CHRISTOPHER DE SETON—LOCH DOON CASTLE.

SIR CHRISTOPHER DE SETON—an ancestor of the noble family afterwards distinguished as the Earls of Winton, which title, as the world is aware, has recently been assumed by the Earl of Eglinton, the nearest lineal descendant—is known to have been an early and warm supporter of the Bruce in his claim to the Scottish throne.* We have no precise account of his participation in those plans which led to the assertion of Bruce's rights; but from his intimate family connection—being married to Lady Christian, sister of the future king—there can be little doubt that he was privy to all the secret proceedings by which the eventful crisis was brought about. He was present when Bruce struck down the Red Comyn in the convent of the Minorite Friars in Dumfries, and among the few who afterwards rallied round the standard of the King, when he was crowned at Scone, on the 27th of March, 1306. In the disastrous battle of Methven which followed, Sir Christopher bore a conspicuous part. The Scots relying, in the chivalrous spirit of the times, on the statement of the Earl of Pembroke, that the day being too far spent he would not be ready to join battle until the morrow, neglected to plant proper outposts round their camp; so that they were set upon during the night, and nearly cut to pieces before they could offer any effectual resistance. Bruce and the few leaders who were with him had scarcely time to arm, and though they performed prodigies of valour, it was impossible, taken at such disadvantage, to resist an overwhelming force. The King was three times unhorsed; and, according to Barbour, Sir Philip de Mowbray had so nearly taken him prisoner, that the knight cried aloud—"I have the new-made King!" The ready hand of Sir Christopher Seton, however, at that moment dealt Sir Philip a well-aimed blow, which felled him to the earth, and rescued Bruce from his perilous situation. The result of the battle of Methven proved disastrous to the hopes of Bruce for a time. He and all his party who escaped the fray were compelled to seek safety in the fastnesses of the country. While the King and a few of his adherents directed their course towards the Highlands, Sir Christopher Seton sought refuge in the Castle of Loch Doon,† which, from its situation—being surrounded by the lake—must, prior to the invention of gunpowder, have been almost impregnable. From the ruins still existing, it seems to have been capable of holding a considerable number of retainers. It is octagonal in form and consists of a single tower, with high walls, enclosing a pretty extensive area, in the interior of which accommodation for the garrison was no doubt provided by a range of buildings erected against the walls, leaving an open space in the centre. The main entrance—which is arched in the Gothic style—with its portcullis aperture, is still entire; as are also the sallyport and the greater portion of the tower. At what period the Castle was built is unknown; but as it formed a stronghold of the Lords of Carrick, it is likely to be as old as the eleventh or twelfth century. It is an interesting object to visitors. The well prepared ashler stones, of which the outward facing of the building is composed, are entirely different from the rocky strata in the vicinity. Hence, it has been a subject of conjecture where they were obtained, and how conveyed to so remote and inaccessible a spot. About sixty years ago, a person well skilled in geology, and who felt an antiquarian enthusiasm in the question, discovered a quarry about two miles from Dalmellington, the stone of which corresponds exactly with the quality of those of the Castle. He farther traced a route by which they might have been conveyed on sledges to the bottom of the Loch. His supposition, therefore, was, that the stones, having been prepared at the quarry, were floated to the Castle on rafts. This opinion was partly confirmed some time ago, on the Loch being partially drained, by the discovery of several oak beams or joists—in a squared state—which had probably dropped by accident from the rafts employed in floating materials to the building. If this conjecture is correct, the stones must have been carried a distance—between land and water—of not less than eight or ten miles. But, by whatever means constructed, the Castle was justly deemed a place of importance in the war of independence, not only because of its strength, but from its being one of the strongholds on the paternal property of Bruce. When Sir Christopher Seton sought safety within its walls in 1306, it was under the hereditary governorship of Sir Gilbert de Carrick. As is well known, Edward I. vowed the deepest revenge against Bruce, and all his supporters, for the slaughter of Comyn, and their subsequent appearance in arms against his authority. Sir Christopher was, in consequence, hotly pursued; and the Castle invested by a strong body of English troops. The Governor made a very impotent defence, and the Castle, along with the gallant knight, fell into the hands of the enemy. Tytler, in his newly-published history of Scotland, states, on the authority of documents which he quotes, that the Castle "is said to have been pusillanimously given up;" and it farther appears from the evidence, under a commission of the Great Seal, appointed to inquire into the circumstance, that "the delivery of Sir Christopher de Seton to the English was imputed to Sir Gilbert de Carrick." The learned historian, however, is not altogether satisfied on the subject, as the charge cannot be established; and he seems to be even in doubt whether Sir Christopher had taken refuge in the Castle of Loch Doon or in that of Loch Urr, as conjectured in the Statistical Account. The remission, he at the same time admits, fully proves the delivery of the Castle into the hands of the English, at the period alluded to, by Sir Gilbert de Carrick—which is an important fact, strongly corroborative of the capture of

* Sir Christopher was of Norman descent. His ancestors, Secher de Say, obtained lands from David I., in East Lothian, which were denominated Sayton—hence the patronymic Seton.

† Loch Doon was anciently called Loch Balloch. How the name came to be changed is unknown. Mr Hetherick, of Dalmellington, to whom we are chiefly indebted for the local information contained in this article, is of opinion that as Dun, in Celtic, signifies a fort, it may have been called Loch Dun, or the Loch of the Fort, after the erection of the Castle.

Sir Christopher de Seton at Loch Doon—if not of the imputation against its keeper. The circumstance is not without suspicion. Barbour, indeed, in his Life of Bruce, boldly affirms what the historian appears to have overlooked, that Sir Christopher was actually betrayed; and that by a person of the name of MacNab. After describing the disasters which befel the Monarch in his flight from Methven, he goes on to detail the cruelties exercised by Edward upon such of his coadjutors as fell into his power:—

“ In Rauchryne leave we now the King
In rest for owtyn barganyng
And of his fayis a quhile speke we
That throw their mycht and thar powste
Maid sic a persecucioune

Thus gate endyt his worthynes
And off Crauford als Schyr Ranauld wes
And Schyr Bruce (Bryce) als the Blar

This account of the betrayal of Sir Christopher de Seton is confirmed by a tradition preserved in the neighbourhood of Loch Doon. A portion of the farm at the lower end of the Loch, called the Booch, is yet known by the name of Macnabston, which is said to have been given to the “fals tratour,” as the price of his treachery. The ruins of Macnabston house, we believe, are still visible. Macnab is represented by Barbour as one of the domestics of Sir Christopher. He

Hence, in the opinion of the poet, the blacker die of the “tratoury.” Though Barbour is thus supported by tradition, it may be argued that the character of the hereditary keeper is in no respect affected by it. Perhaps not; but his pusillanimous defence of the fort, coupled with the imputation or belief that he had delivered up Sir Christopher, are rather convincing proofs that he was not sakesless in the matter. MacNab may have been the mere tool of Sir Gilbert de Carrick, who, thinking the cause of Bruce hopeless, might be anxious to propitiate Edward; and, aware of the price set upon the brave Seton's head, he could not have hit on a more effectual mode of doing so. But be this as it may, the tradition gives the highest countenance to the fact, that Sir Christopher de Seton took refuge at Loch Doon, and not in the Castle of Urr. In whatever manner the betrayal was accomplished, it is clear that MacNab could only have held the lands awarded to him through the medium of the hereditary keeper, as any direct grant from the English would have been cancelled on their expulsion from the country. In the appendix to the “History of Galloway,” lately published, another version of the tradition about Macnabston is given. It runs thus:—

“When the English, in 1319, besieged the Castle of Loch Doon, being unable to take it by storm, they raised an embankment of earth and stone, lined with raw hides, to prevent the water from oozing through the rampart, across the place where the lake discharges itself; hoping thereby to inundate the castle. The work was finished; and the water rising rapidly, one of the soldiers, named M'Nab, volunteered to destroy the caul; and, being a good swimmer, he took the water at midnight, with a large bonnet sword folded in his cap, with which he succeeded in cutting several large holes in the hides, through which the water rushed with such force, sweeping away every thing in its course, that he was carried down in the current, and consequently lost his life in saving his companions; but, in gratitude for the service he had rendered his country, a grant of land was conferred on his son, which bears the name of Macnabston to this day.”

This improbable story is countenanced by tradition only in so far that it is said the castle was upon one occasion—though assuredly not by the English in 1319, for they were not then in the country—attempted to be taken, by damming back the lake; but the project failed, some of the lanes or feeders being lower than the level of the castle. The fiction, however, challenges itself. If the embankment had been composed of such solid materials as “earth and stone,” faced with raw hides, how could a few thrusts of a bonnet sword produce such an avalanche as to carry all before it, more especially as the swimmer by whom it was handled must have previously swam, or partially walked, picking his way amongst enemies, at least six miles—the castle being that distance from the foot of the Loch! As described by Barbour, Sir Christopher Seton was cruelly put to death by his captors, not in London, but at Dumfries. The charge against him was not only rebellion, according to the definition of Edward, but of murder and desecration, having been present in the convent of Minorite Friars when Comyn was struck down by Bruce. He is alleged, by an English historian, to have slain a brother of Comyn; but this charge is not corroborated by any other writer. The character and prowess of Sir Christopher was so much esteemed by Bruce, that “he afterwards erected, on the spot where he was executed, a little chapel, where mass was said for his soul." The Castle of Loch Doon is supposed to have been destroyed by fire in the reign of James V.—about the same period that Kenmore, and other strongholds of the nobility in Galloway, were reduced—the policy of the Monarch being to increase his own power by crippling that of the feudal barons. A portion of the roof, which seems to have been thrown over into the Loch, is visible in clear calm weather. So is the iron portcullis. In attempting to carry the latter away during frost, the ice broke down under the immense weight, and it sank to the bottom, to the no small disappointment of the parties, who had calculated on a valuable prize.

DEAN CASTLE.

THE ruins of Dean Castle, once the seat of the noble, but unfortunate family of Boyd, are situated within a mile and a half of Kilmarnock. They stand on a gentle rising ground on the banks of the Kilmarnock, formerly called, according to tradition, the Carth Water—

"The Water of Carth rins by the Dean,
That ance was Lord Boyd's lodgin':
The lord wi' the loupden han',
He lost his title and his lan'."*

This rhyme, of course, refers to the last Earl of Kilmarnock, who forfeited his title and estates by taking part in the rebellion of 1745. The "loupden hand" is in allusion to the crest of the family, which is a dexter hand, couped at the wrist, erect, pointing with the thumb and two next fingers, the others turning down, with the motto, Confido. The castle originally consisted of a single, but strong, massive oblong tower; built, as Grose conjectures, about the beginning of the fifteenth century. It was, in all probability, however, built somewhat earlier. Sir Robert Boyd, who was a faithful supporter of the patriotic party in the struggle for independence, obtained the lands of Kilmarnock by a charter from Robert the Bruce, dated 3d May, in the tenth year of that monarch's reign (1316), which charter, as mentioned in our last, is still extant in the archives of the Boyd family. It is presumable, therefore, that the castle was built in the fourteenth century, soon after the lands had been thus acquired. The castle, including the more modern portion of it, forms two sides of a square—the other two having been enclosed by a high and strong wall. The addition was no doubt built by James, eighth Lord Boyd, who succeeded to the title and estates on the death of his nephew in 1640. The arms of the family, with his initials, and an inscription below, are still, though much defaced, distinguishable on the inner wall of it. The inscription, which cannot now be clearly made out, seems to have been readable in 1789, when Grose took his drawing of the ruins. He gives it as follows:—

"James Lord of Kilmarnock
Dame Katherine Creyk
Lady Boyd."

* Taken from the recitation of an old inhabitant of Kilmarnock, between 80 and 90 years of age.

This lady was daughter of John Craik, Esq., of the city of York. It is thus pretty evident that the modern part of the castle was built some time after 1640. But the fact is still rendered more certain by an enumeration of the plenishing of the castle at the death of Thomas, fifth Lord Boyd, in June 1611, which shows, from the extent and nature of the articles, that the square tower only was then in existence. This list occurs in a charge upon a decret obtained before the Lords of Council, at the instance of James Elphinstone of Wodsyde, "donatour of [a] gift of eschiet of vmgle. Thomas, Lord Boyd" against Dame Elizabeth Wallace, relict of the late Lord. This document, which bears to have been served on the 25th July, 1612, is amongst the Boyd papers. The list may be interesting to our readers, as illustrative of the furnishing of a nobleman's house in Ayrshire, 234 years ago. We shall therefore make no apology for copying it verbatim from the original:—

"Twa cowpis of siluer, every ane of thaim vechtain ten unce of siluer; ane lang carpet, half worsted half selk; ane schort carpet for the chalmier buird; ane lang greine buird claithe, the lenth of the hail buird; twa schort greine buird claitis for the chalmier buird; four cuschownis of tripe veluet;* four cuschownis of carpet ruche vark; thrie sehewit cuschownis of the forme of cowering vark; four cuschownis of ruishe vark; twa lang buird claitis of flandiris damais; saxeine seruietis† of damais; ane lang dornick; buird claithe; ane lang damais towel; ane cower buird claithe of small lynng; ane dusoun of dornick seruietis; ane braid dornick towel; twelf lang lynng buird claitis; four dosoun and ane half of lynng seruietis; fywe buird claitis of grit lynng; fywe dosoun of round lynng seruietis; aucht towellis of round hardine; four drinking claitis, twa thairof sewit with selk, and the vthur twa plaine; twa lynng drinking claitis; ane copbuird clait; ane down bed; aucht feddir beddis, with aucht bowsteris effering thairto; auchteine codis, pairtie filed with downis and pairt with fedderis; auchteine pair of dowbill blanketis; fywe coweringis of ruishe vark; ane fair rallow cadow; § sevin houshaild coweringis; saxeine pair of lynng scheittis; twa pair of heid scheittis of small lynng, sehewit with quhyet vork and perling; twa pair of heid scheittis, sehewit with black selk; ane pair of plaine heid scheittis; sax pair of heid scheittis; ten codwairis|| of small lynng, sehewit with black selk; sax codwairis of small lynne unschewit; ane stand of stampit crambasie¶|| vorset courteinis, with ane sehewit pand effering rto; ane stand of greine champit curteinis, with ane pand effering rto; ane vther stand of gray champit vorset courteinis, vth ane pand effering rto; ane stand of greine plaidine courtainis, with the pand effering rto; ane stand of quhyet sehewit courteinis; ane pair quhyet voven courteinis, with the pand effering rto; seventie pewdir plaitis; ane dusoun pewdir trunchoris; ten coweris of pewdir;

From this inventory may be traced the furniture peculiar to the various apartments in the tower, which consisted of four stories or flats. The first, vaulted, was no doubt used partly as the keep and partly as the kitchen, to which the "two grit iron chimnays," the "standard raxis," the "fywe lang speittis," and other culinary implements, belonged. The second, which is also vaulted, formed the large or grand hall. Judging of it even in its now ruinous state, it must have been a capacious and splendid apartment. It extended the whole length and width of the building. The roof is of great height. The large "burnest (burnished) chimney no doubt filled the fire-place. The two chairs of oak would also belong to it. It may seem rather curious that there should be only two chairs in a nobleman's castle; but the fact is easily accounted for, when it is known that seats of another description were used. The chairs, in all likelihood, were placed at the head of the "bairds" or tables, which, from the number of them—two long and one short—seem to have formed a double row: one of the long upon each side, and the short running across at the head of the hall. Stone seats, projecting from the walls on both sides, still remain; so that, with the three forms—mentioned in the list—placed parallel with the "bairds" in the centre of the floor, there would be a double row of seats to each set of tables. These, covered with Flander's damask; the stone seats, as well as the forms, laid over with cushions of velvet or carpet rush work; the walls, no doubt, covered with tapestry;* and the hall lighted up with five great brazen chandeliers, some idea may be formed of the splendour of the apartment on occasions of festivity, when the oaken chairs were filled by the noble host and hostess of the castle, and the cushioned seats with the fair and gallant of the land. On the third floor there seems to have been two principal chambers, besides smaller apartments, one only having a fire-place, as there is no more than one "chalmer chimnay" mentioned in the list. This apartment would contain one of the "two stand bedis of aick," with the down bed, the head sheets of fine linen "schewit with black selk and perling," the pillow-slips of fine linen sewn with black silk, and the curtains of crammery worsted. Add to this the carpet-covered "chalmer buird," three or four of the "sax buffet stuills," with the walls hung with tapestry, and we have, in all likelihood, a fair picture of the state bed-room of the Lords Boyd in the sixteenth and beginning of the seventeenth centuries. The other chamber would be furnished after a similar and not much inferior fashion. The fourth and highest story would be occupied with the other beds—there having been nine in all, "ane down bed" and "auchte feddir beddis." For these there were "auchteine pair of dowbill blanketis"—two pair of double blankets for each, besides coverings.

Such was the plenishing of Dean Castle in 1611. Save "ane meikle bybill" (Bible) it does not appear that there was a book within its walls. According to tradition, the castle was destroyed by fire, through the carelessness of a laundry-maid, in 1735, while the Earl of Kilmarnock was absent in France. We know, from the town books of Kilmarnock, that the Earl was in France in 1732-3—the Countess having been then empowered to manage his estates in his absence; so that the tradition is probably correct. It is said the first notice his lordship had of the event was in a London newspaper, on his arrival from France.

CATTLE-LIFTING IN THE OLDEN TIME.

WILLIAM BANE MACPHERSON, a Lochaber man, died seventy years ago, about the year 1777, at the great age of a hundred years. He was wont to relate that, when a boy of twelve years of age, being engaged as buachaille at the summering of Biallid, near Dalwhinnie, he had an opportunity of being an eyewitness to a creach and pursuit on a very large scale—probably the last on so great a scale which passed through Badenoch. At noon, on a fine autumnal day in 1689, his attention was drawn to a herd of black cattle, amounting to about six score, driven along by a dozen of wild Lochaber men, by the banks of Loch-Errach, in the direction of Dalunchart, in the forest of Ben Alder, now Ardverrick. Upon inquiry, he ascertained that these had been lifted in Aberdeenshire, distant more than a hundred miles, and that the party of rieviers had proceeded thus far with their booty, free from molestation and pursuit. Thus they held on their way among the wilds of this mountainous district, far from the haunts of the semi-civilised inhabitants, and within a day's journey of their home. Only a few hours had elapsed after the departure of those marauders, when a body of nearly fifty horsemen appeared, tolling amidst the rocks and marshes of this barbarous region, where not even a footpath helped to mark the intercourse of society, and following on the trail of the men and cattle which had preceded them. The troop was well mounted, and armed, and led by a person of gentlemanly appearance and courteous manners; while, attached to the party, was a number of horses carrying bags of meal and other provisions, intended not solely for their own support, but, as would seem from the sequel, as a ransom for the creach. Signaling William Bane to approach, the leader minutely questioned him about the movements of the Lochaber

* No mention is made of tapestry in the inventory; but it was then common in the houses of the nobility, and probably it might be regarded as a fixture. It was only to the moveables and a certain sum of money that the gift of escheat to Elphinstone extended.

men, their number, equipments, and the line of their route. Along the precipitous banks of Loch-Erroch, this large body of horsemen wended their way, accompanied by William Bane, who was anxious to see the result of the meeting. It bespoke spirit and resolution in those strangers to seek an encounter with the robbers in their native wilds, and on the borders of that country where a signal of alarm would have raised a numerous body of hardy Lochaber men, ready at all times to defend the crach and to punish the pursuers. Towards night-fall they drew near the encampment of the thieves at Dalunchart, and observed them busily occupied in roasting, before a large fire, one of the beeves, newly slaughtered.

A council of war was immediately called, and, on the suggestion of the leader, a flag of truce was forwarded to the Lochaber men, with an offer to each of a bag of meal and a pair of shoes, in ransom for the herd of cattle. This offer being viewed as a proof of cowardice and fear, was indignantly rejected, and a reply sent to the effect that the cattle, driven so far, and with so much trouble, would not be surrendered. Having gathered in the herd, both sides prepared for action. The overwhelming number of the pursuers soon mastered their opponents. Successive discharges of fire-arms brought the greater number of the Lochaber men to the ground, and in a brief period only three of them remained unhurt, and escaped to relate the sad tale to their countrymen.—Inverness Courier, Aug. 17, 1847.

VANDYKE'S PORTRAITS OF CHARLES I.

"CHARLES is known to have sat to him very often, and it is said that there exist, in different collections in England and on the Continent, as many as thirty-six portraits of the king by the hand of Vandyke. This is a great number; but many must be copies either by Lely or old Stone. The best are well known; and two are already mentioned. A third fine picture of the king is at the Duke of Marlborough's, at Blenheim. The king is in complete armour, on a cream-coloured horse, nearly in profile; at his side, and on foot, is Sir Thomas Morton, one of the equeries, holding the helmet of the king. This picture was sold at the sale of Charles I., and purchased by the great Duke of Marlborough at Munich. The horse is somewhat Flemish in its make, but the whole picture is full of actual life and Venetian colour. A fourth fine picture of the king forms one of the attractions of the Louvre, and has been gloriously engraved by Strange. The king (a most graceful figure), in white satin, with his hat on, is standing by his horse, attended by an equerry and a page. In Vandyke's account sent into the king, and still preserved in the State Paper Office, he describes this picture as 'Le Roi alla classe,' and placed £200 against it; but this the king has scored out with his own hand, and put instead '£100'—just half the price. This was done in 1637, when his 'troubles' were beginning, his exchequer low, and his accounts in arrear. The Duke of Grafton has a duplicate quite as fine, it is said, as the Louvre original. Other pictures remain to be noticed, without seeking for the whole of the suspicious thirty-six. At Blenheim, is a half-length of the king, very elegantly executed in a tender, silvery tone; at Wilton, a three-quarter picture, in armour—a genuine, carefully executed, elegant picture; the king with a truncheon in his right hand, and his left upon a helmet, which, with the crown, lies upon a table; at St Petersburg (formerly at Houghton), a whole length, in armour, bought by Sir Robert Walpole, of the Wharton family, and described in Vandyke's account, sent in to the king, as 'Le Roy en Armes, donne au Baron Warro, £50,'—reduced by the king himself to £40; and, lastly, that fine picture of the king—'Three Heads, in three points of view—front, profile, and three-quarter,' painted about 1637, for the purpose of being sent to Rome, to Bernini the sculptor, who executed a marble bust from it, destroyed in the fire at Whitehall, in 1697. The picture (now at Windsor, and excellently engraved by William Sharp) remained in Bernini's possession, and was transmitted to his descendants, from whom it was purchased by Mr Irvine, and sent to England in 1803. In the year following it was bought by Mr Champenowe, for 450 guineas, from whose possession it passed into the hands of Walsh Porter, and, at his death, into the hands of Mr Wells, of Redleaf, in Kent, who, at the earnest solicitation of George IV. was induced to cede it to the crown for the price he had paid for it—1000 guineas.

"Of the queen, Vandyke is said to have painted five-and-twenty portraits. Some are well known, others may remain in obscurity, for it is utterly impossible that he could have painted with his own hand one-half as many. One of the finest was given to the Earl of Stafford, on the 12th October 1633, and is now at Wentworth House, in Yorkshire, the seat of the Earl Fitzwilliam. Vandyke received £40 for it. It is full length, in blue, exquisitely lady-like, and most beautiful in point of colour. Her majesty is attended by Jeffrey Hudson, the dwarf (in crimson), with an ape in his arms. A second full-length, and fine, is at Althorp; a third, in an orange silk dress, at Warwick Castle; a fourth, at Woburn; a fifth, at Lord Clarendon's, at the Grove (engraved in Lodge); a sixth, at Lord Ashburton's, in Piccadilly; the seventh (the Wharton and Houghton picture), at St Petersburg; and an eighth, in white satin, at Windsor Castle. Half-lengths are less common. There is one at Wilton, a companion to the king in armour, but not so good; another at Blenheim, very elegantly executed; and a third, in white satin, at Windsor Castle. 'Of the numerous portraits which Vandyke painted of her, this,' says Mrs Jameson, 'is the most attractive, and gives us a strong impression of the lively, elegant, wilful Frenchwoman, whose bright eyes and caprices so fascinated her husband.' The royal crown and a red rose are on the table near her: and the king thought so highly of the picture that it was hung in his bedroom. It would be easy to add to the list already mentioned; but two alone seem worthy to be added—the two described in Vandyke's account sent in to the king, as:—

'La Reyne pour Mons. Barnino, £20,
'La Reyne pour Mr Barnino, £20,'

the full face and profile, now at Windsor, and intended to have been sent to Bernini, the Italian sculptor, as studies for a bust. The full face is the least interesting, but there are still the eyes of Henrietta.

"The king, in his necessities, reduced the two to £15 each: now, they would sell for £500 a-piece; but let us trust that no such degradation awaits them, and that our children's children may look upon them in the same place, and in the same state, as we ourselves now see them."—Fraser's Mag. for Aug.

JENNY LIND.

HER SUPPOSED DESCENT FROM THE LYNNE OF THAT ILK.

ALL that is publicly known of the family history of this very celebrated artist is, that she was born at Stockholm of respectable parents. In the absence of ascertained facts to the contrary, it is not an improbable suggestion that she is descended from a Scottish family—the Lynnes of that Ilk.

The Lin or Lynne is a small property in the parish of Dalry, Ayrshire. The name is derived from a delightful cascade, or lin, on the water of Caaf, which runs through the lands. The manor-house of the family, a square tower, of which some remains are still traceable, overlooked this cascade. It is supposed that the well-known ballad, "The Heir of Linne," first brought to light by Bishop Percy, in 1756, refers to this locality.

"The bonnie heir, the weel-faur'd heir,
And the weary heir o' Linne,
Yonder he stands at his father's gate,
And naeboddy bids him come in."

Although it is only conjectural that Linne in Dalry is the Linne of the ballad, the circumstance of the family being of that Ilk—the chief of all who bore the name, accords with the remarks of Bishop Percy, in reference to the rank of the Laird of Linne.

The Lynnes of that Ilk, who had no doubt taken their patronymic from the cascade, were of old standing. Walter de Lynne is mentioned in the Ragman Roll of 1296, and though a regular genealogical account of the family, which is extinct, cannot now be made out, still their name is frequently to be met in charters and other documents. Passing from 1296 to 1452, we find that Andrew Linne of that ilk gave a sashine of the lands of Highlows, to the laird of Hunterston, dated the 4th of March in the latter year. "Jon. Lyn o yt. ilk" occurs in various testamentary papers from 1611 down till 1636, in which year he is mentioned in the latter will of "Jonet Jack, spous to John Craufuird in Robehilheid, Dalry."* This John Lyn appears to have been the last of the name who possessed the property. Soon afterwards it was acquired by the Kilmarnock family. Lord Kilmarnock was returned heir to a portion of the lands in 1641.

Besides the Lynnes of that ilk, there were the Lynnes of Over-Lynne, Bourtriehills, and Lynnes in Carrail—all branches, no doubt, of the main stock. The name has now entirely disappeared in Ayrshire. There was a David Lynne, depute-bailie of the regality of Kilwinning in 1680; and private papers show that several families of the same patronymic were burghers of Irvine during the early part of last century.

Irvine was the port of Glasgow till about 1670; and we know that considerable intercourse was maintained with the Baltic. The merchants and traders of Glasgow, for example, brought iron from Sweden in 1688. The communication thus opened between the two places must have been a great inducement for the early adventurers to emigrate to the Swedish capital; and we think it very likely that some of the merchant Lynnes from Irvine settled in Stockholm at that period, from whom Mademoiselle Jenny Lind§ may be lineally descended.

The surname, Jenny, countenances the conjecture. It is purely Scottish—and not so euphonious to foreign ears, or even English, as to have been preferred by her parents, unless handed down as a family name by her Scottish ancestors.

Should these pages meet the eye of Mademoiselle Jenny, it is probable she may feel curious to inquire into the descent of her family—and if so, may we hope that she will, at no distant period, confirm or repudiate our conjecture.

"CHRONICLES OF THE CANONGATE."

No. III.

THE register-books of the Canongate, as previously observed, date back to October 1561. It is probable that no record of the burghal proceedings was previously kept. At all events the book which commences with that year may be said to begin a new era. The monastical superiority over the community had been swept away by the Reformation, and an entirely new state of things prevailed. By the king's grant a commendator was introduced in the room of the abbot, who enjoyed some of his privileges, and held as a trustee, all his property,* while the temporal superiority of Canongate was conferred on the Earl of Roxburgh. "The abbey church of Holyrood continued to be used as the parish church of the Canongate, with appropriate ministers;† and it would appear that, in the scramble for church patronage and property which succeeded the fall of the papal regainers, the burgh of Canongate succeeded in obtaining a share. The following rental, which we copy from the register-book, under date 1561, may be considered curious:

The convent had also "pittance siluer or burrow dington, amounting to 29 mar. 1s. 10d.

The "rentall of vmqll. Mr Andro Logane benesessit be Sr. Johnne Scot, extending to ye sowme of 60 mar. 6s."

Such was the "pittance siluer" levied by the convent of Holyrood and the chapel of St Thomas in 1540.

The burgh of Canongate was governed in 1561 by 4 auld Baillies, 3 Deacons, 2 Treasurers, and 4 Councillors, "chosen and elected;" and, as enacted in 1567, the council met every eight days—on "fairsdays."

The first of the minutes of the register are taken up with lists of what are called "absentes," as for example, "Alexander Bruce of arth for his landis of arth" and other business details of little interest even to the antiquary. We shall give a few extracts from the subsequent entries, illustrative, as far as they go, of the state of the Canongate—its laws and manners:—

1561. The Tolbooth was then, as now, the council-room and court-house, as well as a place of punishment:—

DUGHALD MOR AND HIS NEPHEWS.

ALASTAIR MAC DHONNIL GHLAIS, the eleventh chief of the Macdonalds of Braelochaber, was a Colonel in the English army. He returned home with strong predilections in favour of the feudal system, and resolved to apply for a charter of the lands belonging to the clan, and to convert them into a free barony, as had been done by Argyle and Macintosh, and many other long-headed chiefs, who, by these means, surreptitiously stripped the people of their common heritage and patriarchal governments, and converted them, slowly and by degrees, into vassals and serfs, amenable to the laws of pit and gallows, so successfully administered by the feudal lords and barons, whom it was the pride and privilege of the kings of Scotland, who succeeded our Pictish dynasty, to appoint to rule over their people. He was accordingly jealously watched by the clan, who were determined, at all hazards, to maintain their patriarchal rights and privileges, for which they had previously fought many bloody battles against the Macintoshes, whose chief had obtained a charter of their lands. Macintosh, however, never was able to complete the conquest, or to reduce them even into the condition of a free tenantry, until the battle of Culloden. Until then Macintosh was paid the rents claimed by him of the Macdonalds of Lochaber, with the edge of Andrea Ferrara; but to return to our tradition:

It being clearly ascertained by the clan that it was the intention of their chief to accept a charter of the lands, Macintosh having been successfully resisted in every attempt to reduce them into a state of vassalage or serfage, his own uncles, Donul Gorm and Ailen Buidhe, along with the other ceann-tighes of the clan, held a meeting, which Iain Lom calls "the counsel of Friday," and signed a bond for the chief's destruction. From this crime, however, they were saved by the rashness of the chief, and of a bold, determined character, well known in Highland tradition, called Dughal Mor, or Big Dugald.

Big Dugald was of the Clanranald family, but had settled in Braelochaber in his younger days, and became a most extensive and successful cattle dealer,—a trade which, in those days, required not only a shrewd, but a daring character, at the head of a strong and well armed party of adherents. To this person, Macintosh, to whom his charter of Lochaber had hitherto been barren of all, except raids, battles, and their bloody consequences (in which he seldom came off otherwise than second best), with the Macdonalds of Braelochaber, and the Camerons, over whose lands he had also obtained one of those unrighteous charters, had granted a charter of the lands of Inverlair, belonging to the Macdonalds of Braelochaber, among whom he had been received as a friend.

Dugald Mor had carefully concealed his charter, as was usually done by such clansmen as were led by their greed and dishonesty to accept a surreptitious title to that which an imprescriptible right, of many centuries, had legalised in the possession of their native race; but being, as he believed, on the point of death, and hearing that Keppoch had resolved himself to accept a charter from Macintosh, he considered it his most prudent, if not his only chance of securing the benefit to his family, to send for him, and to place his charter and the guardianship of his children in his hands. When the chief arrived at Inverlair, he found Dugald Mor in bed, and, as was supposed, at the last stage of mortal existence. After some solemn conversation with the chief, befitting a dying man, he desired his wife to bring his son, who was a mere child, and all his papers, which she did with some reluctance. Dugald Mor introduced the boy, and delivered the papers to the chief, and entreated his protection for him and his family. The chief, however, the moment he got his eye on and clutched the charter, spurned the boy from him with his foot, and consigned it and all the other papers to the flames. Dugald Mor made an effort to spring from the bed, but only succeeded in raising himself on his elbow. Regarding the chief sternly for a moment in this position, he hissed these words, in the emphatic language of the Gael, through his almost clenched teeth, "If I live, it will need no god to avenge that deed," and then sunk exhausted on his pillow.

* Kobill, a place for steeping malt in.

Dugald Mor, contrary to all human probability, began rapidly to recover from that day; and not long thereafter, the chief and his two brothers, one of them a mere boy, were murdered in their house of Keppoch, at night, by himself and his friends. Such was the inveteracy of the clans against all chiefs or ceann-tighes suspected of designs to introduce the feudal system into the Highlands, that not even their proverbial attachment to their chief could rouse the Macdonalds to avenge this murder, although the celebrated bard, Iain Lom, used all the influence of his electrifying poetry among them for that purpose. Dugald Mor, with his seven brave and stalwart nephews, who formed his leine chrios, built a block-house on a high knoll, in the centre of a marsh, at Inverlair, where they dwelt openly, in the midst of the clan, for three years afterwards, with the murder of the chief unavenged and unrequited.

Iain Lom alone was inveterate in his determination and unceasing in his efforts to bring them to punishment. From a verse which he addresses to Donul Doun Bhohuintin, it would appear that some proceedings had been had recourse to in Edinburgh against the murderers. Donul Doun was a celebrated warrior, as well as a poet, and carried on a poetic warfare with Iain Lom, who, being the Celtic poet laureate, was in favour of all royal grants and commissions; while the former considered it a point of honour to levy black mail on every man who possessed a single inch of the lands belonging to his clan, in virtue of charters, which he considered as unconstitutional as they were inconsistent with equity and justice. This difference in opinion added a spice of acrimonious feeling to the poetic "fighting" of Iain Lom and Donul Doun. One line by the latter, in particular, which may be thus translated,

"The howling of that vagrant cur has stunned mine ears"— seemed so severely expressive of the busy-body, undignified, and, as it is believed, mendacious wanderings of the bard—that he never could compose a retort sufficiently bitter, to satisfy himself, in answer to it. His feelings were so irritated by this line, that, in his replies, he descended almost into mere scurrility. The following lines give but a faint idea of the severity and harshness of the original—

A vagrant, sayst? That frenzy I disown,
Bright is my fame, extensive my renown;
And not for daring robbery or theft,
Or slaughtering cattle, from their owners' reft.
The king avenged me on my deadly foes,
My joy he rose upon the fall of those,
Whilst thou wert stalking, like a greedy gled,
Around some fold, or well-stocked poultry shed.

In these lines he refers to the punishment of the race of Dugald Mor, and seems to countenance the belief that the proceedings had been instituted through his own influence with the king. But be that as it may, tradition is uniform in asserting that the expedition under Ciaran Mabach, the brother of Sir James Macdonald of the Isles, by whom the murder was avenged, had been the result of Iain Lom's determined hostility to the murderers, and great influence with that chief.

Iain Lom states that the lofty banner of Ciaran Mabach had been displayed on Wednesday over his band of "black-headed warriors," and that he set fire to the block-house, and took off the heads of Dugald Mor and his nephews on Sunday—thus performing his journey from Sleat to Inverlair, in the dead of winter, in three days—for he invested the block-house on Saturday night, and stormed it on Sunday morning. The heads were carried to Invergarry, where, after having been washed at Tobar-nan-cean, they were boiled in a cauldron and sent to Edinburgh. The monument at Tobar-nan-cean (which is called, in consequence of the inscriptions written upon it by the people of the district, Clach-nan-breug) was erected by the late Glengary (who, from his enthusiastic character, and ambition to be considered the chief of the whole clan Macdonald, was peculiarly liable to be imposed upon by mercenary retailers of tradition) to commemorate the above instance of feudal vengeance—for Sir James of the Isles, as well as his ancestors, from the days of Robert the Bruce, was not a patriarchal chief, but a feudal knight and baron—a distinction which is little known or attended to, but without a proper knowledge of which, no man need attempt to form any just idea of the character of the ancient clans of Scotland.

Dugald Mor and his nephews defended the block-house with great spirit and determination, so long as their bullets lasted; and the masculine and brave wife of the old man, when these began to fail, melted all her pewter plates and other dishes, which, at that period, constituted the delf (to speak an Irishism) of a Highland castle, and cast them in the camus to keep up the supplies. The ammunition being at length exhausted, the block-house was set on fire over their heads. The whole party then made a desperate sautie, under the cover of the smoke, but were soon surrounded and overpowered, when their heads were hewn from their bodies, as already mentioned. They had previously, however, left abundant evidence of their bravery and dexterity in the use of their weapons among their enemies, not fewer than sixteen of their number having been slain and wounded.

Dugald Mor had a daughter, who was remarkably handsome. He advised her to make her escape, before the block-house was completely invested, at daylight in the morning. She succeeded in getting away some distance before being discovered, but was speedily pursued and overtaken by one of the besiegers, when a struggle took place, and she was thrown down. This was seen by Dugald Mor and his wife, who, notwithstanding their own perilous position, stood watching her escape from a loophole. On seeing his daughter prostrated by a ruffian, Dugald instantly levelled at him with his long Spanish gun, when his wife remonstrated against his firing, lest he should kill his "own daughter." "Death before dishonour to the daughter of Dugald Mor," replied the stern warrior, and fired. The ravisher rolled over, and the daughter escaped uninjured.

The spot where the ruffian fell was pointed out to me, by the late Captain Macdonald of Inverlair, thirty years ago; and its distance from the block-house shows that there were good guns in Britain before Joe Manton was born.

In connection with this tradition, an anecdote may be mentioned of the late Dr Smith of Fort-William:—Dr Smith was a native of Edinburgh, and had a strong antipathy to every thing in the shape of Gaelic poetry and tradition, to which, while of course, in perfect ignorance of both, he denied the slightest merit or pretension to antiquity. He was especially opposed to all attempts at verifying the authenticity of Ossian's poems. In short, Dr Smith was imbued with the true spirit of imitative antiquarianism. He had great veneration for poetry and incidents, however poor or incredible, that had been committed to writing hundreds of years before he was born; but he thought nothing of such, however true or however touching, as had taken so strong a hold of the imaginations and the hearts of a whole people, as to be communicated by one generation to another, for many ages, before being written at all. Yet he was by no means an indiscriminate critic of the ancient history of his country, which he looked upon as little better, in point of verity, than that of Ossian's poems. His incredulity, as to Highland tradition and poetry, was the mere result of education. He received the adverse statements on trust, and swam with the tide, until the following accidental circumstance staggered his prejudices, and induced him to apply the powers of his strong and cultivated mind to the study and elucidation of the subject.

The Doctor and some other gentlemen happened to meet together to enjoy the genuine hospitality of Inverlair, when the above tradition was repeated to them by Captain Macdonald. "Come," exclaimed the Doctor, "I have at length found what I have long been in search of—a tradition which may be grappled with and directly refuted. You say that the bodies have been buried in yonder knoll, and the heads carried to Glengary, boiled in a cauldron, and sent to Edinburgh. Now, sir, if the headless trunks were buried in yonder knoll two hundred years ago, then the bones will be found quite entire (from the dryness of the soil) at this day. Get us picks, shovels, and a party of men this moment, and dig them up. I'll bet ten to one, that for every skeleton we shall find a skull."

The picks, shovels, and a party of labourers instantly set to work, under the immediate superintendence of the Doctor, who exercised the utmost vigilance, and perseverance in the examination of the bones as they were dug up, the size and thickness of which elicited from him several remarks confirmative of the tradition, as to the great size and strength of Dugald Mor and his nephew; but there was not a single skull to be found in the whole group. Nay, more, the Captain had mentioned that Dugald had broke his thigh, and that (the bone having been badly set) he was always lame, having a "bowed" leg in consequence. The bone of this thigh united laterally, and, with the joint thus formed, it was discovered and pointed out by the Captain to the Doctor, who, for a while, looked extremely disconcerted at so complete a discomfiture of his anticipated refutation of the tradition.

Dr Smith drew out an account of the circumstance, and, having a small hand-press, gave several copies of it away to some of the gentlemen of Fort-William. He afterwards studied the Gaelic language, bought Ossian's poems, of which he became passionately fond in the original (but he could not bear Macpherson's name or translation), and collected a great fund of interesting traditions.

THE AGED BARD'S DESIRE.

AN ANCIENT POEM.

Translated from the Gaelic.

[The scene of this ancient poem is in Drimalbin, the very centre of the Caledonian forest, where the traditional kings and heroes of Albyn had their hunting-grounds. "The beauteous lake of woody isles" is Lochlaggan, at the east end of which is the hunting-lodge of the Marquis of Abercorn, where our illustrious Queen and her royal consort are now residing. The lovely and sublime scene of the aged bard's desire is again associated with the history of the lineal and true representative of the royal Caledonian race; but, alas! where are we to find representatives of the chiefs and clans who were wont to pitch their standards at At na Meir-gie, where our ancient sovereigns enjoyed the princely sports of their Caledonian forest?]

Lay me by the streams that slowly move,
With mild and pleasing steps along the plain;
The fragrant shade my leaning head above,
Whilst thou, O Sun, look'st kindly o'er the plain.

Soft on a bank of daisies stretch my side,
Where Zephyr sweetly breathes and lightly plays;
My frail feet laving in the pleasing tide,
Whose graceful windings murmur as it strays.

Around my verdant bank, all bathed in dew,
Be the fair lily's modest form display'd,
The pale, soft primrose, of the loveliest hue,
The fragrant *elvm beauteously array'd.

Around the lofty borders of my glen,
Let bending boughs their azure robe display,
And aged rocks in echo breathe again,
The tale of love which tunes their minstrels' lay.

And since mine eyes have failed, ye winds, O say,
Where do the frail and mournful reeds reside,—
Still wailing sad—while trout among them play,
Nor feel the gale that curls the genial tide.

Then o'er the wood that crowns the mountain's brow,
Swan, from the land of waves, do thou arise,
Pouring thy pleasing tale of love and wo,
In melting music o'er the ambient skies.

And, through the ivy'd rocks of voice profound,
Let limpid springs with heavy murmurs break;
And ocean's waves, with ever-raging sound,
The tuneful voice of every echo wake.

Close by me let the calves their vigour ply,
In mimic conflicts and in feigned alarms,
And, tired of strife, the young kid guileless lie
On the smooth turf, encircled by mine arms.

* I do not know the English name of this flower.—
Translator.

Then, as the voice of rocks and mountains wild,
To the gay heifer joyously replies,
Pleased let me hear, by distance rendered mild,
The low of herds extending o'er the sky.

And streaming softly on the plaintive gale,
Let the fold's gentle bleat attract mine ear;
The parent race return their answering hail,
And, racing down, to meet their young, appear.

But let my soul yon peerless maid behold,
Beneath the oak, the king of every shade,
Her hand of snow, 'mid locks of flowing gold,
Harmoniously sustains her leaning head.

Her mild blue eyes, that softly, slowly move,
Bent on the youth, who, breathing by her side
The plaintive lay of fond and faithful love,
Dissolves her beating heart in music's tide.

The sound expires, and lo, her bosom grows
In virgin ardour, to his faithful breast;
Her lips, unsullied as the dewy rose,
In love's untainted zeal, to his are prest.

So, as love triumphs in their silent joy,
And lures their souls in his delightful maze,
A herd of deer, as o'er the hills they fly,
Struck by the magic sight, incline and gaze.

Eternal pleasure to the guileless pair,
Who waked a joy that may no more be mine,
And fair thee well, thou virgin, kind and fair,
Whose heavy locks in graceful ringlets twine.

Now let the hunter's steps approach mine ear,
The dogs and sound of darts, that whiz along,
That youth upon my cheek may re-appear,
And brace my nerves, by conquering age unstrung.

The very marrow in my bones shall start,
When dogs have stags at bay, and bow-strings sound,
And when the shout proclaims the fallen hart,
My feet like lightning o'er the hills shall bound.

Then shall my faithful dog again appear,
Whose steps still followed wheresoe'er I moved;
The hills we sought their frowning rocks uprear,
The woods we hunted and the glens we loved.

The hospitable cave I shall behold,
That oft rescued me from the lowering night;
Whose blazing faggots banished damp and cold,
Whose social cups still nourished our delight.

The branchy hart shall yield our smoking fare,
Trega our drink, our music her soft wave;
And though ghosts shriek, or groaning mountains glare,
Peace, gentle peace, shall smile within our cave.

Now o'er the lofty borders of the glen,
The tall scur-elt her blooming grove uprears,
There the sweet thrush pours forth her earliest strain,
And gentle spring in flowery robes appears.

And next her Gormal, of the loveliest hue,
In towering ease attracts the wondering sight;
Her thousand firs still growing on the view,
Her elks, her deer, her roe, so shy and tight.

The beauteous lake of woody isles I see,
Heaving young waves along the pebbly shore,
O'er which the forest waves, tall, stately, free,
With rowan wavy, and with hawthorn hoar.

Chief of a thousand hills! do I behold
Thee, Ardven, in thy glorious tints array'd;
Thy locks have been the dream of stags of old,
The bed of clouds is still thy lofty head.

* * * * *
Vision of bliss, ah, fail'st thou on my view!
Return once more, a moment's space return!
She hears me not—hills of my soul, adieu,
Lone in the dark, the bard is left to mourn.

Farewell, fond youth, and lovely maid, farewell,
My eyes no more behold your love divine!
May summer's joys long in your bosom swell,
Though winter and his thousand woes be mine.

Bring forth my tuneful harp and flowing shell,
And be they placed all quietly by my side;
The shield that saved my sires in battle's swell,
And oft rolled back th' invader in his pride.

Then on the harps of Ossian and of Daal,
Oh, let me hear a sadly-pleasing sound,
As opening wide is seen their airy hall,—
When evening comes the bard will not be found.

THE MARSHAL EARL OF STAIR.

THE following memorial relating to the above celebrated Statesman and WARRIOR, as he is popularly called in Wigtownshire, having fallen into our hands, we give it, as likely to be interesting to our Galloway readers, being connected with an important period in the public career of our great countryman.

It is matter of history, that the skilful arrangements of Marshal Stair led to the victory at Dettingen, and that the important advantages which should have followed, were, in a great measure, lost, in consequence of the Marshal's plans being thwarted by the interference of King George II., who joined the army only in time to check the Marshal's career of victory. It has been said, and was generally believed in Galloway, that the Marshal, seeing the serious consequences which would result from this interference, refused to obey his Majesty's orders, maintaining that a commander-in-chief must not be controlled in the hour of battle, even by his sovereign. Certain it is, he fearlessly urged upon the King the vast importance of following up the victory; and military men, and his countrymen generally, did justice to the wisdom of the plans which the General and his troops were ready and anxious to execute.

On the 4th Sept., 1743, to the regret of the whole English army, the Earl resigned his command.

The following memorial which he presented to the King, contains his reasons for taking that step:—

MEMORIAL OF FIELD-MARSHAL THE EARL OF STAIR.

"The march from Archhaffenberg was made entirely without my knowledge. I got into my coach in the morning, resolved to continue there during all the march, but being afterwards informed that the French were passing the Maine, and advancing to attack us, I immediately mounted on horseback, and made all the dispositions proper for the drawing up of our army in order of battle, which I executed without any confusion. Meeting Count Neuperg soon after, I informed him of the dispositions I had made, and he approved them entirely. This general was of opinion that the enemy's design was not to attack us. Your Majesty coming up afterwards, I had the honour to acquaint you with everything I had done, and you expressed, in strong terms, your approbation of all.

"I shall not take notice of what happened during the action. Your Majesty knows that my opinion was, that, without losing any time, we should make all the advantage we could of the victory we had gained.

"When the army arrived at Hanau, I proposed to seize on Hochot, and lay a bridge over the Maine to pass that river, and to post our army in such a manner as to hinder the enemy from getting back over the Rhine, which, from what had passed on this side the Danube, I judged would soon happen. I pressed the same advice with your Majesty by means of General Ligonier. I am utterly ignorant how it came to pass that it was not followed.

"I proposed afterwards to lay bridges over the Maine, on the side of Hanau, that thereby we might be in a condition to take all possible advantages of the enemy's conduct, in case they should think fit to quit that river.

"This being over, I told your Majesty there was still one only means left of maintaining your superiority over the French, viz., to embark all the foot to send them down the Rhine, and march them with all possible expedition towards Flanders. I cannot help still repeating the same advice.

"I have received several marks of contempt for my advices, even in the view of the whole army, particularly of the English troops. Posts of command that became vacant, and which used to be disposed of by the recommendation of the commander-in-chief, were given away without my knowledge, and some particular generals have been named to command at the head of the line, while I was there present.

"I have served under the two greatest generals of their time: their confidence and favour have procured me a knowledge of the plans and dispositions which they made for operations. At the late King's accession to the crown, I was sent ambassador to the court of France. My conduct at that court is sufficiently known.

"I had the misfortune not to please your Majesty's ministers, but this never in the least cooled my zeal for the advancement of your glory and the public good, as far as in my power.

"In 1734 I got a plan delivered to your Majesty, for forming an army upon the Mozelle, which would infallibly have made you arbiter of Europe. When M. Maillebois marched into Bohemia I formed another plan for assembling an army in Flanders, with which, had the plan been put in execution, it had been easy to penetrate as far as Paris.

"No ambition, nor any hopes of raising my fortune, could, at my age, have engaged me to quit my retirement. No other motive but the hopes of contributing to your glory, and of being useful to the public, could ever have drawn me from thence.

"I flatter myself that, with regard to what I have here represented to your Majesty, you'll be pleased to think the Lord Stair an honest man, though a stranger to art and cunning.

"I shall leave it to your Majesty, as my political testament, never to separate yourself from the house of Austria. If ever you do, France will treat you as she did Queen Anne, and all the courts that are guided by her counsel.

"I hope your Majesty will give me leave to retire to my plough, without any mark of your displeasure."

Lord Stair had several times before offered to resign his command, but, till he presented this memorial, all his offers were rejected.

From the memorial, it appears, that though it was reserved for modern times to assemble an army in Flanders, and "to penetrate as far as Paris," a similar plan was arranged by the military genius of a prior age, and would probably have been then carried through, if the weak counsels of the sovereign had not weighed against the comprehensive eagle-view, and sound manly judgment of his veteran general.—Galloway Paper.

THE CHURCH AT STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

"STRATFORD-UPON-AVON is on the south-western border of Warwickshire, on a gentle ascent from the banks of the Avon, which rises in a small spring at Naseby in Northamptonshire. It is eight miles south-west from Warwick, and ninety-four north-west from London.

"The church was originally a rectory, and was purchased in 1837 of Simon Montacute, Bishop of Worcester, by John de Stratford, Archbishop of Canterbury, and attached to the chantry he had founded in the chapel of St Thomas the martyr, adjoining the south aisle of the church. This chantry consisted of five priests. Eventually it acquired the title and privileges of a collegiate church, and on the dissolution was made a vicarage.

"Stratford church, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, is a spacious edifice in the early style of English architecture. It consists of a nave, and side aisles, a transept or cross aisle, and a chancel or choir, with a square embattled tower rising from the intersection, and surmounted by a lofty octagonal spire. It has been supposed to occupy the site of an ancient monastery, and to have been either built or rebuilt by Archbishop Stratford.

"In the transepts are several both ancient and modern monuments; and at the extremity of each is a large enriched window. Massive piers of clustered columns and lofty arches support the tower, and separate the nave from the chancel, 'which,' says Neale, 'is the most beautiful as well as the most perfect division of this church, and was erected between the years 1465 and 1491 by Thomas Balsall, D.D., who then held the office of dean.'

"There are many monuments in the chancel. Among them may be noticed that of Dean Balsall, on the north wall; and that also of the most distinguished native of Stratford, William Shakespeare, enclosing his bust. A slab very near covers the ashes of the poet, and is inscribed with the well known lines, said to be from his own pen:—

"Good frend, for Jevs' sake forbare
To digg the dvst enclosed heare:
Blest be ye man yt spares these stones,
And cvrst be he yt moves my bones."

"Shakespeare's wife and other members of his family also lie in Stratford church.

"The story goes, that the inscription just given, on the sepulchral slab, was prompted by the sight of the charnel-house, entered by an ornamented doorway just beyond the stalls, which was filled with skulls and bones, and that the poet apprehended his bones might one day be cast upon the heap. This charnel-house was taken down in 1800, and the bones arched over.

"An avenue of lime-trees, with their branches entwined, form a pleasing approach to the northern porch, over which is a room, originally lighted by a window, which is now blocked up by a tablet. This room was probably used as a record chamber."—New Monthly, Aug.

PROWESS OF SCOTTISH MATRONS IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.—The following extract is from an old volume, printed in 1682, entitled "Memorials of the English Affairs, or an Historical Account of what passed from the beginning of the reign of King Chas. the First, to King Charles the Second his happy Restauration:"—"June 25, 1652.—Kirk Tumult.—Letters of the Synod's meeting at Perth, and citing the Ministers and people who had expressed a dislike of their heavenly government, that the men being got out of the way, their wives resolved to answer for them. And on the day of appearance, 120 women, with good clubs in their hands, came and besieged the church where the Rev. Ministers sat. They sent one of their number to treat with the females, and he threatening excommunication, they basted him for his labour, and sent a party of sixty, who routed the rest of the clergy, bruised their bodies sorely, took all their baggage, and twelve horses. That one of the ministers, after a mile's running, taking all creatures for his foes, meeting a soldier, fell on his knees for quarter, who knowing nothing of the matter, asked the blackcoat what he meant? That these conquerors having laid hold on the Synod Clerk, beat him till he forswore his office. That thirteen of the ministers rallied about four miles from the place, and voted, that the village should never more have a Synod kept in it, but be accursed; and that although in the years 1638 and 39, the Godly Women were called up for stoning the Bishops, yet now the whole sex should be esteemed unlucky."

HIGHLAND SUPERSTITION.—Women who die in childhood are carried straight to heaven, whatever may have been their sins during life; such a death being an indemnity in full for all offences or omissions. The only allusion to this superstition that the writer can find is, not in any Gaelic tradition, but in one of the border ballads, that of Clerk Saunders. It is given both by Scott and Motherwell, in their collections of Border Minstrelsy, without any comment from either editor on the verses in question. Clerk Saunders having been slain by the brothers of his love, May Margaret, his ghost, comes by night to claim from the lady the restitution of his plighted troth, without which he could not sleep quietly in his grave. May Margaret, unable to resist the impulse of curiosity, and anxious to obtain some equivalent for the troth-plight she was required to give up, offers the following very fair bargain:—

"Thy faith and troth thou sall never get,
And our true love sall never twin,
Until you tell what comes of women,
I wot who die in strong travaillin'."

The ghost, though he has left the body but twenty-four hours, seems to have made good use of his faculties in the interval, for he promptly replies,—

"Their beds are made in the heavens so high,
Down at the foot of our good Lord's knee,
Weel set about wi' gilly flowers,
I wot, sweet company for to see."

This information, if not very explicit, at least implies that sufferers by that peculiar mode of dying were repaid by an honourable resting-place in the heavenly mansions. It is probable this idea was derived from the Roman Catholic religion, and that the Virgin was supposed to have some influence in the exemption from earthly penalties bestowed on the dead mother. The poem has, therefore, represented this as the feeling which dictated a superstition too full of tenderness to excite the sneer of the most sceptical despiser of the faith of old.—Book of Highland Minstrelsy.

ALICE PERRERS.—Of this celebrated woman, Barnes, in his history of the reign of King Edward III., states, "That being a person of extraordinary beauty, she was (48th Edward III.) made Lady of the Sun, and rode from the Tower of London through Cheapside, accompanied with many lords, knights, and ladies; every lady leading a lord or knight, by his horse's bridle, till they came into West Smithfield; where presently began solemn jousts, which held for seven days together. That she had been constantly misrepresented by most of our writers (one taking it from another), as being King Edward's concubine, but that it was improbable, from the reputation she had of being taken in marriage by so considerable a person as the Lord William Windsor; and that King Edward, who never else is said to have gone astray, even in the flower of his age, should, within five years of the queen's death, when he was very infirm, burn in flames. That the records wherein she is mentioned are not severe on her reputation, as appears from the charge against her, brought into parliament in the 1st Richard II., in these words:—"Dame Alice Perrers was introduced before the lords, and by Sir Richard le Scrope, Knt., steward of the king's household, charged for pursuing of matters, contrary to orders taken two years before; namely, that no woman should, for any advantage, present any cause in the King's Court, on pain of losing all they had, and being banished the realm for ever. That, particularly, she had procured Sir Nicholas Dagworth to be called from Ireland, whether he was sent; and that she also procured, from the king, restitution of lands and goods, to Richard Lyon, merchant of London, whereas the same lands, having been forfeited by him, had been given to the king's own sons. To all which the said Dame Alice replied, that she had not pursued any such thing for any advantage of her own. Whereupon divers officers, counsellors, and servants to King Edward III., being examined, proved that she made such pursuit; and that, in their conceits, for her own private gain. Then judgment was given by the lords against the said dame, that according to the order aforesaid, she should be banished, and forfeit all her goods and lands whatsoever." Sir Robert Cotton, in his Abridgement of Records, makes this remark on the above judgment: "To say truth of the devil is counted commendable, and therefore surely the record against the said lady, being very long, proves no such heinous matter against her; only it sheweth, that the same dame was in such credit with Edward III., as she sat at his bed's head, when all the council, and the privy chamber, stood waiting without doors; and that she moved those suits that they dared not; and these two suits, whereof she was condemned, seemed very honest; her mishap was, that she was friendly to many, but all were not so to her." The effect of this conviction was, however, subsequently removed.

THE SCOTTISH THISTLE.—This ancient emblem of Scots pugnacity, with its motto, "Nemo me impune lacessit," is represented on various species of royal bearings, coins, and coats of armour, so that there is some difficulty in saying which is the genuine original thistle. The origin of the national badge itself is thus handed down by tradition:—When the Danes invaded Scotland, it was deemed unwelcome to attack an enemy in the pitch darkness of night, instead of a pitched battle by day; but on one occasion the invaders resolved to avail themselves of this stratagem; and in order to prevent their tramp from being heard, they marched barefooted. They had thus neared the Scottish force unobserved, when a Dane unluckily stepped with his naked foot upon a superb prickly thistle, and instinctively uttered a cry of pain, which discovered the assault to the Scots, who ran to their arms, and defeated the foe with a terrible slaughter. The thistle was immediately adopted as the insignia of Scotland.

WILLIAM MARSHALL AND THE AUTHORS OF OUR NATIONAL MUSIC.

OUR progenitors have left us our national music as a legacy of almost equal value with our ballads and songs. Our ballads are not more distinguished by the beauty of their imagery, richness of language, and vigour of diction, than is our music for its originality of design, sweetness, and expression. To a Scottish ear it has a distinct character, seldom successfully imitated. The power that a full harmonious choir exerts over the mind is great; but those melodies which Burns placed above all "Italian trills" have a charm of their own, never without its influence. When and whence we derived the more ancient of our melodies are questions easier to ask than answer. Some of them, as "John Anderson," and "Scots wha hae," were originally chaunts belonging to the church, traces of the peculiarly rich singing of which may still be found in the psalmody of the Highlands. The number derived from this source must, however, be limited; and though amongst a people naturally musical new expressions of melody must always arise, still we are indebted to the professional minstrels of the olden time for the great body of our airs. But while their strains have been transmitted from age to age, the composers themselves have been forgotten. Our fields are marked with monumental stones, and tradition has preserved some dim remembrance of the sleepers; but the names of our minstrels have been inscribed upon less tangible monuments. We are ignorant of the older composers; and of those even in recent times we are little better informed. Something is known of the Gows; it is understood that Marshall, the author of many beautiful strathspeys, was butler to the Duke of Gordon; but not one of a thousand who appreciate the archness of the tune, "Jenny's Bawbee," know that it was the production of an Ayrshire musician, a blind man of the name of Riddell, the author of "The merry Lads o' Ayr," and many other well-known melodies. The tune, "Ayrshire Lasses," is widely known, but few are aware that it is the composition of a nobleman, the late Earl of Eglinton—an excellent performer on the violoncello and harp, and an enthusiast in music, though better remembered from his numerous and extensive improvements. In the Highlands, the professional musician held an important and honourable place in the establishment of his chief; war and victory, birth, marriage, and death, he celebrated each with its swell of triumph, of rejoicing, or sorrow. In the Lowlands, music held an equally prominent position; and, particularly in the west country, it is capable of proof that until a comparatively recent period every town and village of any note had its minstrel, as, indeed, many of them have to this day. The gentry, too, if they individually retained no musician, gave their support to some one of the best known. As late as the last century, Riddell—the blind composer already mentioned—had an annual salary, though of no great amount, from the higher gentry of Ayrshire. For this fee, it was his duty to visit the residences of his patrons, at intervals, as he found it convenient, or when sent for, to play to the family at their balls and assemblies. Riddell, however, never went alone; like others of the class, he carried with him his apprentices, regularly articulated, whose duty it was to attend their "master" at all times, to do his errands, and to officiate, probably, as body-servants, as well as assistants in the orchestra. One of Riddell's pupils is still alive in the "west country," who, speaking of his young days, has said—"In one week we passed twenty-six parish kirks, and returned to Ayr (the head quarters) on Friday, in time for a ball, never getting to bed till Saturday night, but snatching a moment's sleep when it could be got." Considering the rough mode of travelling, passing through so many parishes, was certainly no small feat. From these professional musicians, Highland and Lowland, our national music has been derived; and as they have passed to their graves, leaving few memorials, no signs by which their names may be connected with their works, we can only lament that their stories have been left unwritten.

A memoir of William Marshall, the composer of many of our favourite strathspeys, reels, and melodies, recently published, has made a valuable addition to our musical biographical knowledge, as we may call it. The memoir is tastefully written, and prefixed to a collection of Marshall's hitherto unpublished airs, brought out by the late Mr Robertson, music-seller, Edinburgh. Marshall was born in the old town of Fochabers, Banffshire, on the 27th December 1748, old style; a season, we might suppose, very unpropitious for the advent of a songster. His father's name was Francis Marshall, his mother's, Isabel Innes. William was the third son of a large family. Like many kindred geniuses, William must have given early indications of his future talent, for we learn that on account of those indications he became the favourite of his father. Six months at school, and a few extra lessons from a gentleman at Gordon Castle, completed his education. At twelve years of age he entered the service of the Duke of Gordon, and in a few years was elevated to the post of house-steward and butler. In this situation he remained for thirty years, accompanying the family wherever they went. Marshall also displayed a taste for architecture, astronomy, mathematics, and mechanics, and in all these sciences he made astonishing progress. Land-surveying was a favourite amusement; and in latter years he laid down meridian lines upon which he built the houses of Keithmore and Newfield. Of his mechanical skill he has left a wonderful evidence—a clock constructed by him and presented to the Duke of Gordon. It still remains at Gordon Castle, and is thus described:—

"This clock indicated the months and days of the year—the equation for each day, and the various differences of time, in minutes and seconds, between the sun and a clock, regulated to exact equational time—it showed the moon's revolution round the earth, and the number of divisions between the hour and the moon's indices—pointed out the moon's age, while the moon's index signs to the various places at which it is high water by the clock—an index pointed out the twelve constellations or signs of the zodiac, with the sun's place for each day in degrees and minutes, and the sun's declination, north or south of the equator, for every two days—it pointed out the time of the sun's rising, with the length of day and night, and the vernal and autumnal equinoxes, the longest and shortest day in the year—it showed the day of the week corresponding with each day and month of the year for ever, &c.; and required winding up once in four or five weeks."

Marshall was above the middle size, compactly built, and handsome in his youth. He was, as we may easily believe, an excellent dancer. He understood the craft of falconry, was an excellent angler, could throw the hammer, leap and run with a dexterity, agility, and speed, against which few could successfully cope; and, to add to his extraordinary doings in his age, he made roads, constructed bridges, and administered the law of the land. It is as a musician, however, that we have more immediately to deal with him. At Gordon Castle he employed his leisure in the practice of his favourite art, and among his earlier compositions were "The Duke of Gordon's Birth-day," "The Bog of Gight," "Miss Admiral Gordon," and "Johnnie Pringle." To the last, the facetious author of "John o' Badenyon" wrote the song, "Tune your Fiddles;" and to "Miss Admiral Gordon," Burns wrote the words "Of a' the airts the wind can blaw." The air is one of the sweetest in the whole range of Scottish melody; and it is united to one of the tenderest of lyrics: both became at once, and have ever continued, universal favourites. Marshall's airs were all the result of momentary whim or fitful inspiration. They cost him no labour; and when once he had mastered the rhythm, it is said he seldom retouched it. He did not trust wholly to his own partial judgment. At the age of twenty-five, he had married "a winsome wee thing," by name Jane Giles—who, although no musician, possessed a fine natural taste. That taste was the ordeal he chose for his airs. In the evening he would take his fiddle, and, while she listened, he would go over with a delicate hand the air he had composed during the day. If she disapproved of it, the piece was rejected—what she admired, he instantly committed to paper. In this way Marshall selected and preserved upwards of three hundred airs. Latterly, however, and when a very old man, we find him throwing off melodies so rapidly that we can scarcely think he was as fastidious as in his younger days. As a performer on the violin, Marshall was a master. His correctness of ear was extreme; his management of the bow perfect; his style at once precise and full; and his execution brilliant. As a performer he became even earlier known than as a composer. He was on one occasion dining with a party of friends, when a blind minstrel—probably more a lover than a master of his instrument—came under the dining-room windows and began to play. By way of a joke, one of the company told him that one of the party was a learner; and as he (the blind man) had delighted them, it was right that the "loon" should give him a bar in return, although it might neither be sweet nor tender. The old man handed up his instrument; Marshall good-naturedly took it, and played several strathspeys in his own perfect way. When asked what he thought of the learner's "quality," the old man earnestly replied—"Na, na! that's na a 'loon's' playing; I'll wager a groat that's Mr Marshall o' Keithmore, for there's naeboddy hereabouts that could play like that but him!" When Marshall played strathspeys, the inclination to dance was as irresistible as if the listener had been inoculated by the tarantula. In his compositions—no matter by whom performed—there was a charm almost equally powerful. Writing from India, in 1822, to Marshall, Mr John Stewart of Belladrum humorously remarked, that "though he thought his dancing days were over," yet, in the house of a lady, both he and Mrs Stewart had danced to some of his strathspeys "with the thermometer at 85°." Marshall left Gordon Castle in 1790 for a farm near Fochabers. Shortly afterwards, he removed to a larger, Keithmore, and was appointed factor by the Duke of Gordon, from whom the farm was held. The situation of factor he filled until 1817. From his earliest connection with the Gordon family, Marshall was held in the highest estimation. Similarity of taste led to an early friendship betwixt him and his Grace; and time, as it went, revealed so much and so varied talent, with such private worth, that Marshall advanced higher and higher in the esteem of his patron, the Duke. His personal merit procured him respect—his musical powers, constant admiration. At Gordon Castle, the fruits of his genius were always first displayed and appreciated; and from the hall they rapidly spread into every corner of the district, and latterly, over the land. With the extension of his works his popularity increased, until it reached London itself, where, in the Opera House, several tunes of his became favourites. It was no longer left to him to give the name of some imaginary gentle one, or fanciful title to his compositions. He ran no hazard in coupling with his strains the names of the noblest of the land ; for the fair sex of the higher classes paid the composer considerable attention, and were emulous of having their names united to his melodies. As his years increased so did his popularity, and in his later correspondence scarcely a tune is embodied for the name of which he had not been solicited long before. In the collection of his hitherto unpublished airs, for example, only three out of upwards of eighty tunes occur to which the name of some fair creature or noble personage is not attached. Frequently, and long after Marshall left Gordon Castle, his music was heard in its halls. The Duke still acknowledged the charm of his compositions ; and frequently Marshall's successor (Daniel Macdonald, also a composer and performer) and the musical retainers were called upon to perform his music to his Grace's guests. The Duke, of all Marshall's tunes, had one particular favourite, "The Marchioness of Cornwallis," and he showed his partiality for it on such occasions by calling specially for it as the wind-up of the entertainment. Marshall, although repeatedly urged by his Grace, had always declined to collect his compositions for publication. At length, when many of them had become known and admired, his reluctance was overcome by the Duchess, to whom all lovers of Scottish melody must feel indebted. The first volume appeared in 1822, and contained above 170 original airs. To this work there were 600 subscribers, many of whom put down their names for ten, fifteen, and twenty copies ; and among these the Gordons were thickly interspersed. The composer was now in his 74th year. From Keithmore he then retired to a cottage called Newfield, which he had built for himself, near Craigelachie Bridge. Having made an arrangement with Mr Robertson, the music publisher, Edinburgh for the publication of a supplement, or second volume, at some future period (now carried into effect), Marshall continued the pleasing task of composition, scattering his melodies in profusion. Often the old man thought of hanging his harp on the willows, but with the importunities of his fair admirers, or when his soul would fain have expression as before, the desire was as often overcome, and the old strings struck anew. Shortly after removing to Newfield, he wrote to Mr Robertson as follows :—"I enclose twelve or thirteen reels to help up your supplement ; but as I have no copies of the spare ones that I left with you, I cannot tell if I have encroached on any of them." So little of self-sufficiency was in the heart of the veteran, that he adds, "You will therefore examine them, and leave out what you think improper, or alter any passages that you may think by so doing can be improved." In the occasional excursions which he made at this period to Edinburgh, he seldom failed to attend the theatre, to revel in the fine strains of the band led by the late Mr Dewar, who was himself a composer, and had arranged many of Marshall's airs. Placed beside the leader, Marshall enjoyed the sweet performances of the finely-trained band, and Mr Dewar seldom failed to give one or two of the aged composer's own and favourite compositions. On one occasion he felt so delighted with the accompaniments to his air "Of a' the airts the wind can blaw," that it was repeated at his own request. No one who heard Mr

Dewar and his band perform such melodies as "The wind blew the bonnie lassie's plaidie awa," or "This is no my ain house," can doubt the effect which his own beautiful melody, executed with such care, taste, and power, would have on Marshall's delicate ear. The last letter he wrote respecting his new volume was in 1830, when he had reached his 82d year ; and three years afterwards, in his 85th, in the month of May, when all was harmonious around him, he ended the journey of life. He was buried beside his forefathers and his wife—who predeceased him in 1825, at the same age—in the churchyard of Bellie. Marshall had five sons and one daughter. Only one son—the third, who is now Colonel William Marshall, survives. The eldest son, Alexander, became a Major in the East India Company's service, and died at the age of 39, in 1807, at Keithmore, having returned home in bad health after the siege of Seringapatam. The second was a jeweller in London, but he too retired from bad health. The fourth, John, Captain in the 26th foot, died in 1829 at Madras ; the fifth, Lieutenant George, in Spain, in 1812. The only daughter married Mr Macinnes, Dandalieth, and in her family is a magnificent portrait of her father, painted by Moir at the command of the Duke of Gordon, and since presented to Mrs Macinnes by the Duke of Richmond. Marshall, as a musician, had no claim to the same rank as the Mozarts and Handels. He knew little of the effects of complicated harmony. He was thoroughly a native genius. His taste, his inspiration, the current of his thought, were all imbued with the spirit of the old Scottish minstrels—that spirit, which, borrowing no more than it lent, gave a character distinct and beautiful to the music of our country. His melodies were at once natural, original, and effective—for strathspeys, Burns called him "the finest composer of this age." With him sleeps the cunning of the craft—he was the last of the band of pure, enthusiastic, prolific Scottish composers.

THE EARLY LAWS OF SCOTLAND.

No. II.

THE great point at issue amongst those who have made the subject a matter of study, refers to the first written code of Scottish laws. We have seen that there was a common law in Celtic times—when the government was purely patriarchal. When that system began to be superseded by the feudal, in the reign of Malcolm Canmore, statutory enactments must have followed as a matter of course. The assumption of all power and right to the soil by the crown involved the necessity of supporting it by measures originating in, and directed by that assumption. It was, however beneficially it may have worked for the general weal, a palpable encroachment upon common right and common justice ; and, like all other infringements, required to be enforced by arbitrary means. We have thus a philosophical reason for believing that the written or statutory law of Scotland is at least coeval with the introduction of feudalism.

The earliest known collection of statutory law is the manuscript book, alluded to in a former article called Regiam Majestatem, said to have been compiled in the reign of David I. This has been disputed by various learned antiquaries on both sides of the Tweed. Robertson, in his "Introduction to the Ancient Records of Scotland,"* took up the subject in a masterly and interesting manner. After quoting from the catalogue of charters deposited at Berwick, he proceeds—

"These two entries prove indisputably, that in the year 1292, when the inventory in which they occur was drawn up, there existed among the Archives of Scotland Rolls of Scottish Statutes accounted ancient at the early period when those Rolls received their titles, which probably happened several, perhaps many years before 1292, the date of the inventory.

"Supposing the titles on those rolls to have been written no earlier than the reign of King Alexander III. it is not likely that the statutes contained in them were those of that King's father, or those of his grandfather King William, or even those of his grand-uncle King Malcolm, between whose death and the accession of King Alexander III. about eighty-four years only had intervened. For statutes of a date not more remote than a century prior to the time when those rolls received their titles, could with no propriety be denominated ancient.

"Under what King, then, or under what Kings were the statutes recorded in those rolls enacted? And do any traces of those statutes now remain?

"Undoubtedly there is in Scotland a collection of ancient laws known during the space of more than 370 years by the name of Regiam Majestatem, a name formed of the two first words of the book—that collection having been clearly and unequivocally recognised as a book of Scots law by a public statute in the year 1425.

"In the sequel, perhaps, we shall be able to show, that that collection, though under a different name, was, many years before 1425, regarded as a genuine collection of the laws of Scotland. But it is certain, that from that year at least, it has been regarded by the lawyers of Scotland, with very few exceptions, as a system of the more ancient law of that country.

"This code of law, if it may be called such, is attributed to King David I., who filled the throne of Scotland twenty-nine years, viz. from the year 1124 to the year 1153; a supposition which seems to derive support from the personal character of that King, from internal evidence in the book itself, and from a memorable edict of King Edward I. of England, of the most unquestionable authority.

"But that collection must not be considered as containing only the laws enacted by King David himself. Its great basis must have consisted of the statutes and usages of preceding times, collected under King David's authority, improved no doubt and enlarged by some statutes of his own.

"If we look into history, we shall perceive, that in point of personal character no king perhaps ever lived whose disposition was by nature better adapted to legislation.

"The book itself, without insisting on the words of its introductory chapter, contains direct evidence that King David was a legislator. For it presents us with several statutes expressly bearing to have been enacted by that King;—a circumstance which affords strong presumptive evidence, that the rest of the original collection was made under the authority of the same King David.

"In later times, however, in the course of the present century especially, the authenticity of Regiam Majestatem has been called in question by several writers, at the head of whom may be ranked the Lord Chief-Justice of England, Sir Matthew Hale. It has been by those writers held forth as little better than a servile transcript of a reputed digest of English law, said to have been written towards the end of the reign of King Henry II. when Ranulph de Glanville was Justiciary of England, by whose name that digest is generally called.

"The principal circumstance that seems to have induced those writers to form this general conclusion, is the similarity of the matter in the two books, which is stated to be so very strong, as could not have happened unless the one had been copied from the other, or both from some common original; and no such common original having been pointed out, a variety of topics are adduced to prove that Glanville (by which name the English work shall be called on this occasion) is the original, and Regiam Majestatem the copy.

"The similarity shall, for argument's sake, be admitted; for at present it is by no means intended to investigate all the minute particulars that have been advanced on this subject. At some other time, perhaps, such an investigation may be attempted; previously to which the two books must be collated with care, as in a question of this nature discrepancies that at a first glance might appear immaterial, may, when more deliberately considered, powerfully influence a final determination.

"Nor will it be then less necessary to inquire, Whether the English compilation was really digested when Glanville was justiciary of England?—Whether it actually contains the laws of England as they stood at that time?—and, Whether its authenticity was ever sanctioned by any English statute?

"These inquiries again will introduce several subordinate questions intimately connected with them.—What is the precise or the probable date of the most ancient manuscript of Glanville now to be found?—What is the most ancient book or manuscript in which Glanville is mentioned?—and, Does Glanville contain any reference to any law, or to any historical fact; relative either to England or Scotland, of a date later than the year 1189, when King Henry II. died?

"On the other hand, we know certainly, as observed before, that more than 370 years ago Regiam Majestatem is under that very name mentioned in a public statute of Scotland as a book of Scots law. It is impossible, therefore, to believe that it could have obtained that solemn parliamentary sanction, if it had not been deemed genuine and authentic for time-immemorial antecedent to that period. This consideration seems effectually to overthrow the opinion of some writers, who fix the introduction into Scotland of that supposed pilfered edition of Glanville to the reign of King David II. For that King having died only fifty-five years before the date of the act of parliament 1425, many persons were probably then alive who had been men before the conclusion of King David II.'s reign, and knew exactly the character of authenticity which Regiam Majestatem then bore. Hence again it seems necessarily to follow, that it bore the same character for time immemorial prior to that King's reign; and that therefore its introduction into Scotland, and its adoption there as a system of law, must have happened at a period more early by many years than that King's reign.

"But at whatever time that adoption took place, it must appear a very extraordinary event; for one of two consequences seems unavoidable, viz.

* Published in 1797.

"Either that the Scots then laboured under a total privation of municipal law; an idea as absurd in theory as it shall be shown to be false in fact:

"Or that the Scots at once abandoned all their former usages and laws, and substituted this English code in their place.

"In an abstract point of view, it is a violent supposition that any nation, however uncivilized, would at once adopt in the gross the juridical system of a different country. Laws are the gradual result of necessity and social experience. Even among a people but just emerging from barbarity, established customs, however rude, bend slowly and reluctantly to the milder institutions of a more refined state of society.

"Certainly at whatever time this adoption of Glanville's system can be supposed to have taken place in Scotland, the people of that country must have attained a state of civilization altogether incompatible with such an adoption. Between the accession of King Edgar in 1068, and the death of King Alexander III. in 1286, a period of nearly two centuries, that nation appears to have enjoyed, both externally and internally, a state of peace and quiet unprecedented in the history of any nation of Europe during the same period. On some few occasions indeed their kings were engaged in disputes with those of England. But those disputes were of very short duration, and could not have disturbed the general tranquillity in any material degree. In fact, the catalogue of Scottish records now before us, unaided by any other circumstances, affords demonstration, that the general polity of Scotland had, before the formation of that catalogue, reached a degree of perfection not inferior to that of any European state in the same age.

"Under such circumstances, it is incredible that the people of Scotland should at once have assumed for their juridical system the laws of a different kingdom; and those too, not as detailed by Bracton, a later and more perfect work than Glanville; not as contained in the still later and much more perfect system of King Edward I.; nor as exhibited in the public subsisting statutes of that kingdom; but as presented in the anonymous compilation of a private individual, which at the time of its supposed introduction into Scotland was in a great measure disused and antiquated in the kingdom from which it was borrowed.

"But the learned Lord Chief-Justice carries the matter much farther. He maintains, that the laws of Scotland in general were imported from England. Nay, he argues, contrary to every degree of probability, and to the judgment of the soundest antiquaries, that the laws of Normandy, as exhibited in the Grand Coutumes, were likewise borrowed from the laws of England.

"Here it may be observed, that if the feudal customs, instead of being gradually introduced into the different countries of Europe, as is most agreeable to the ordinary course of things, were at once adopted in the gross by any nation, it is most likely that they would be copied from the system esteemed at the time the best and the most complete.

"The learned Judge adduces various reasons for the general importation of the English laws into Scotland;—the contiguity of the two countries, and the intercourse between the inhabitants resulting from that contiguity;—the superiority and interest that the Kings of England obtained over the Crown and kingdom of Scotland;—and finally and chiefly, the policy of King Edward I.; on which last point the words of the Chief-Justice himself shall be afterwards stated.

"On the circumstance of the contiguity of the two kingdoms, more stress perhaps is laid than on deliberate reflection it may appear to be entitled to, or than the fact will justify. For that contiguity, by furnishing perpetual occasion for mutual injuries and encroachments, was more likely to produce animosity, discord, and hostility, than an adoption of each other's laws; a consequence too clearly proved by the histories of both countries.

"It is unnecessary here to enlarge on the trite subject of the Scottish dependence. Providentially it is now a subject totally inconsequential. It has become a point merely of curious investigation among antiquaries.

"But the policy of King Edward I. furnishes the principal argument to the learned Chief-Justice for the introduction and establishment of the English jurisprudence in Scotland.

"If, as Sir Matthew argues, the contiguity of the kingdoms, and the feudal dependence of Scotland on England, had naturally produced an introduction of the English laws into Scotland, what occasion was there for all this profound policy of King Edward?

"But overlooking this seeming defect in the deduction of Sir Matthew's argument, and supposing that King Edward, from those political motives, had really intended to establish the English jurisprudence in Scotland, why should he have preferred the antiquated system of Glanville, as transcribed in Regiam Majestatem, to the more perfect and later system of Bracton? or to his own system so much more improved than even that of Bracton?

"The reasoning of the learned Lord Chief-Justice on this point furnishes an instructive lesson to every reader, 'not rashly to assent to arguments merely theoretical, however ingenious and plausible.'

"For it shall here be shown, on the most unquestionable authority, viz. that of King Edward the English Justician himself,

"That when he intermeddled with the affairs of Scotland, the Scots nation had laws of their own; and

"That King Edward never intended to establish any system whatever of English law in place of those Scots laws.

"That the Scots had municipal laws of their own, and that they were particularly anxious that no innovation should be made in those laws by the interference of this same King Edward and his successors, Kings of England, is evident from the remarkable instrument before alluded to, printed in the Fœdera, vol. 2, p. 482 and 483.

"It will be recollected, that on the death of King Alexander III. without any other descendant of his body than an infant grand-daughter, the Maiden of Norway, King Edward employed all his influence to obtain her for wife to his eldest son, and by that means to effect an union of the two kingdoms. In this negotiation King Edward was successful. The marriage-articles were drawn up and engrossed in the instrument here referred to, dated 18th July 1290, in the form of a declaration by King Edward's plenipotentiaries.

"In different parts of the same instrument the leges et consuetudines Scotia are repeated: and special provision is made in it for the safe custody of the relics, charters, privileges, and other monuments touching the royal dignity and the kingdom at large.

"Can a more irrefragable proof be desired, that prior to the 1290 the Scots nation had a system of laws peculiar to themselves?

"To prove again that King Edward, after having apparently conquered Scotland by his victories at Berwick and Dunbar in the year 1296, after having obliged King John Balliol to execute in his favour a solemn resignation of his crown and kingdom, and after quelling several formidable insurrections of the Scots, by which Scotland seemed to be completely subjected to his authority, was far from entertaining the design imputed to his wisdom by the Chief-Justices, but on the contrary was determined to govern the Scots by their own laws, the words of King Edward himself shall be here laid before the reader. The words shall be taken from an edict issued by King Edward for the government of Scotland, 'pro stabilitate regni Scotiae,' printed in Prynn, vol. 3, page 1053, and in the Rotuli Parliamenti of England, vol. i. p. 267 and 268. It is dated in the year 1305, and contains this remarkable passage. 'Endroit de leis et usages pur le gouvernement de la terra d'Escoce, ordene est, que l'usage de Scot et de Bret* desordenroit soit defendu, se ques mes ne soit usez. Et ordene est ausint, que le Lieutenant le Roi, del houre qu'il serra venuz en la terre d'Escoce, face assembler les bones gentz de la terre, en aucun certyn lieu le quel il verra que a ce soit covenable, et que illoques, en la presence de lui et de gentz quil y serront assemblez, soient rehercez les leis que le roi David fist, et ausint les amendemens et les addicions q'ant este pais faictes par les Rois,'† &c.

"These words afford the most satisfactory evidence,

"That King Edward had no intention of introducing into Scotland the laws of England; and

"That King David I. was a legislator, and that his laws were regarded as the basis of Scottish jurisprudence: and it is humbly conceived, that those laws of King David, with the amendments and additions by succeeding Kings, convey so exact a description of the book called by the general name of Regiam Majestatem as can scarcely be mistaken.

"Thus, in a connected point of view, we see, that in the year 1292 there were among the archives of Scotland 'rolls of the ancient statutes of the kingdom of Scotland, of the laws and assizes of that kingdom, and of the laws and usages of its burrows.'

"That in the year 1305 King Edward directed 'the laws of King David, with the improvements and additions made in those laws by succeeding Kings,' to be publicly read in presence of the people of Scotland;

"And that in the year 1425 a public statute was enacted, appointing a committee, consisting of eighteen of the states of Parliament, to 'see and examine the bukis of law, yat is to say, Regiam Majestatem and Quoniam Attachiamenta and mend the lawis that neidis mendment.'

"Little doubt, therefore, it is humbly thought, can

* "The nature of this usage is now unknown; but it should seem to have been peculiar to Scotland.

† "In regard to laws and usages for the government of Scotland, it is ordained, that the usages of Scot and Brit be for the future prohibited, so that they may be no more used. And it is also ordained, that the King's Lieutenant, immediately on his arrival in Scotland, cause the good men of the country to assemble in any certain place that he shall see convenient for the purpose, and that there, in presence of him and of those who shall be there assembled, be rehearsed the laws which King David made, and also the amendments and additions which have since been made by the Kings," &c.

be entertained, that the Regiam Majestatem and Quoniam Attachiamenta mentioned in this statute, are the laws of King David, with the improvements and additions of succeeding Kings, mentioned in King Edward's edict just an hundred and twenty years before; and that the Rotuli de Antiquis Statutis Scotiae, &c., put into King Edward's hands in 1292 thirteen years before his edict, contained those laws of King David, and the subsequent improvements and additions, &c.; in other words, that those three different references denote precisely the same thing, viz. the Regiam Majestatem.

"No verbal or theoretical criticisms, however ingenious, can shake a weight of written evidence so firmly connected, and so direct."

Chalmers, the learned author of Caledonia, treats the Regiam Majestatem as a forgery; but he does not meet the arguments of Robertson; and, though great in facts, his judgment, or deduction, is not always to be depended upon. The compiler of the first volume of the Scottish Acts of Parliament, or rather of a portion of it, follows in the wake of Chalmers, but, in our humble opinion, without damaging, in the slightest, the strong position of Robertson.

BATTLE OF BANNOCKBURN—POSITION OF THE SCOTTISH ARMY.

BY DONALD CAMPBELL, LIEUT. H.P. 57TH REGIMENT.

THE Rev. Mr M'Gregor, in his Statistical Account of Stirlingshire, published a plan of the battle of Bannockburn, drawn by a military engineer, in which the left wing of the Scottish army is made to rest on a small brook at St Ninians, and the right below Grey-stael, on a small brook which runs into the Bannock. Mr Tytler, in his History of Scotland, represents the line as drawn in the same direction; but, as this would have been a bad position, in a military point of view, and as it does not agree with his own description of the field, I respectfully beg leave to submit to his consideration my objections to that position, and my reasons for believing that the Scottish army, at the battle of Bannockburn, was drawn up in a totally different direction.

1. The above position does not cover Stirling castle, the relief of which was the primary object of the English army.

2. The front of the above position is not "covered" by any "marshes."

3. Neither the small brook at St Ninians, the small brook at Grey-stael, nor even the river Bannock itself (any where above Milton), could have presented a serious obstacle to the passage of an army in the month of June. The front and flanks of the Scottish army would have been, therefore, wholly unprotected; so that the English army would not have been "confined by the nature of the ground; but, on the contrary, might have extended itself freely along the whole front of the Scottish line, and far beyond both its flanks.

4. The above position, instead of being unfavourable, would have every way have been favourable for the evolutions of cavalry; the whole ground in its front being hard and firm, and no where too steep for a charge. Indeed, the steep parts of the field are mere sloping banks, and would run not parallel with, and in front of, but at right angles to the line of battle.

5. The Coxe-hill and the Gillie's-hill are separated from one another by a deep syke,* and a narrow plain, which was intersected, until within these few years, with quagmire bogs, and rough with trees and underwood. This syke and plain would be at right angles to the right centre of the Scottish army, thus exposing it to the certainty of being attacked separately, and cut off from the main body; a military blunder of the most fatal tendency.

6. The bored stone which marks the station of the Bruce's standard, and the small holm on which De Bohun fell, are half a mile in front of any part of the above position. Would the Bruce fix his standard, and station himself, for the purpose of forming his line, half a mile in front of his line of battle?

Taking these objections into consideration, I feel satisfied that the above was not the position of the Scottish army at the battle of Bannockburn; but that, on the contrary, it was formed on the declivity which runs along the east side of the marshes of Halbert and Milton; with its left flank resting on the Bannock, at the bend east of Milton mill, and its right on the south end of the deep syke which winds round the west and north base of Coxe-hill. I am the more convinced of this, because the position agrees in every particular with the historical features of the field of battle as described by Mr Tytler in his History of Scotland.

1. The river Bannock, from the bend east of Milton mill, runs through a deep and rugged ravine, which could not be passed by the English in the face of the Scottish army. This ravine terminates at the carse below the village of Bannockburn, where Clifford is represented to have crossed the river with his plump of spears. But although a small party might have effected a passage over the river, with the assistance of the doors, &c., (which, if I recollect Barbour's statement, are said to have been furnished for that purpose the night before, by the governor of Stirling castle) yet it is not likely that large masses could have done so, otherwise the English columns might have marched over the carse and relieved the castle; thus terminating the truce before striking a blow at Bannockburn. There is no reason to doubt, therefore, that the carse was at that time a perfect marsh, altogether incapable of being traversed by an army. Hence, considering the character of the ravine (and supposing the carse, thence to the Forth, incapable of being marched over by the English columns), the left flank of the Scottish army, resting on that ravine at the bend east of Milton mill, could not be turned.

2. There was a deep syke and a narrow plain (the surface of which, until within these few years, was intersected with quagmire bogs, and rough with trees and underwood), running north between the Gillie and the Coxe-hills. Hence, the right flank of the Scottish army, supposing it to rest upon the south end of that syke, could not be turned.

3. The Gillie's-hill is divided by a deep hollow, which runs through the middle of it from east to west. Here the undisciplined or inferior clans were placed in ambush. The word Gillie, which is now understood to mean a half-grown boy, or a callan, was of old applied to every person subordinate to, or in attendance upon, a gentleman. An army subordinate to another army, might, in the more ancient sense of the word, be called the army of "Gillies." John Lom applies the word to a party of M'Donalds, who were employed to avenge the murder of Keppoch in the seventeenth century. He describes them as "a lofty banner of black-headed Gillies." In a state of society where all men carried arms, it may easily be conceived that 20,000 Gillies might have constituted a force of no small value in the hands of such a leader as Bruce. The right flank of the army of Gillies is represented as resting upon a perpendicular rock, which is separated by a ravine from the Campsie or Monteith range of hills; and its left flank is represented as resting upon a rock, which is now opened up as a quarry, and which rises from the west side of the quagmire plain already described. There is no part of the order of the battle which I consider more worthy of admiration than the disposition of the inferior clans, or Gillies. They appear to have been formed in such a position as would have enabled them, upon a given signal, to rush down upon the rear and left flank of the English army; and thus, by their sudden appearance, create such an effect as could not fail to check its advance or to precipitate its retreat. In short, the Bruce, strange to say, had evidently made the same use of his inferior troops at Bannockburn, as the Duke of Wellington generally made of his Spanish auxiliaries during the Peninsular war; thus anticipating, by five hundred years, a remarkable feature in the tactics of that illustrious leader. I cannot part with this feature of the Bruce's order of battle, without remarking upon the consideration and skill with which the position of the Gillies was chosen, not only with a view to their efficient co-operation with the main army, but also with strict regard to their own safe retreat, in the event of the defeat of both. The Campsie or Monteith range of hills, which is of easy access by the south side of the Gillie's-hill, would—in case of their descent upon, and defeat by, the left wing of the English army—lie within a few hundred paces in their rear; and there is no doubt, that the natural instinct of undisciplined mountaineers would lead every one of them, in the panic of a defeat, to fly to these fastnesses, where they would not only be perfectly inaccessible to pursuit, but where they might also rally and prove a most efficient check upon the advance of the English army, (by hovering upon its flanks along the ridge of these hills,) should the main body of the Scottish army find itself compelled to retire upon the ford of Frew, which would, no doubt, have been the direction of their retreat, had they lost the battle.

4. The old Torwood road (which, so far as I could learn, was of old the only road from the south to Stirling) crossed the Bannock by a ford, the traces of which are still visible, and thence over the hard ground between the marshes of Halbert and Milton, and by the bored stone on

* "A rill or rivulet, one that is usually dry in summer."—Jamieson.

Caldon hill. The face of that hill, between these marshes, may, therefore, be regarded as the key of the Bruce's position. According to the uniform and time-honoured tradition of the district, his standard was fixed on this part of the position; and he slew De Bohun in the centre of the little holm before it. The Bannock, from the south end of Milton marsh to a considerable distance above the ford, runs between two deep banks of earth, over a soft bottom. It is extremely probable, therefore, that the vanguard of the English army had found it necessary to halt upon the south bank of the river, while making the necessary dispositions for crossing the ford, and that De Bohun, in the interval, dashed over it and menaced the Bruce; who is described by Barbour as riding in front of his army, forming his line of battle. Barbour, I think, distinctly states that the Bruce "advanced" to meet him. Supposing the Bruce to have been in the front of the key of his position, between the marshes, and De Bohun to have been in the front of the English vanguard, on the north side of the ford, when the signal of defiance passed between them, each had a career of about two hundred paces to the spot where the latter fell. It appears, therefore, that this was an affair of pure chivalry, proceeding upon an open defiance, given and accepted, and ending in a regular tilt half-way between both armies. In my humble opinion, however, it may be charged upon the spirit of the age rather than the indiscretion of the Bruce. Had he shrunk from the offered encounter, it would have afforded a triumph to the enemy, and might have done violence to the feeling of romantic heroism cherished by his own army.

5. The continued treason of some of the Scottish nobility, and the bad faith not unfrequently exhibited by the leaders of the English army, were such, that I have no doubt a corps of observation was stationed on Coxe-hill, the moment the army was placed in position, for the purpose of protecting its rear against the incursions of any hostile clan, or any breach of the truce on the part of the governor of Stirling castle. Clifford, by sweeping round the hills on the south of the river Bannock, and crossing below the bank which bounds the carse on the west, appears to have escaped notice until he ascended the table land of St Ninians. It is evident, therefore, that no corps of infantry, withdrawn from any part of the Scottish line, could possibly be in time to intercept him, at the place marked out by the stone pillars as the scene of the conflict between himself and Randolph. The inference, that the corps by which he was intercepted had been stationed on the east side of the Coxe-hill, is, therefore, inevitable. Indeed, Barbour himself affords some countenance to this inference, by stating, that Randolph went "down" to intercept Clifford; there being no ground in the vicinity higher than the place upon which they fought, excepting Coxe-hill.

Note.—The banks of the deep syke, along the west base of Coxe-hill, were being levelled, and the marshes of Halbert and Milton drained, when my friend, Mr Archibald Leckie of Paisley, and myself visited the field. We had thus the gratifying opportunity of seeing the field before these prominent historical features were smoothed down or obliterated. We were also present while the drainers were throwing open the pits, mentioned by Barbour, at the west end of the Halbert marsh. I have no doubt that the whole space in front of the line, from that marsh to the syke, was covered with these pits; at least they were found to extend as far in that direction as the drains had then been carried. The whole front of the Scottish position was thus covered, and rendered inaccessible to a charge of cavalry by the Bannock, the marshes, and these ingeniously constructed pits. Indeed, I am also of opinion, that the front of the schiltrons were kept at such an exact distance behind the Bannock, the marshes, and the pits, as to render it necessary for the archers to be detached from the English masses, and to pass over to the Scottish side of these defences, before they could have produced any serious effect on the Scottish army; and that to this circumstance is to be ascribed the facility with which they had been swept from the field by the handful of cavalry employed in that service. Had they been on the same side of these defences as the English men-at-arms, their immediate and complete destruction, by so inadequate a force, would be incomprehensible. The pits consisted of circular holes about eighteen inches deep, very close to one another, with a sharp pointed stake in the centre of each. The stakes were in a state of decomposition, and offered no resistance to the spade; but the bark was sufficiently entire to enable us to see that they had been made chiefly of hazel. There were some swords, spear-heads, horse shoes, horse hair (the latter generally mixed with a whitish animal matter resembling tallow), found in them.—From the Appendix of the last edition of Tyler's "History of Scotland."

THE VICTORIES OF MONTROSE ACCOUNTED FOR.

THE Commissioners of the General Assembly, attributing the ill success of the Covenanters to the sins and backslidings of the ministers, drew up a list, dated 5th August 1645, only ten days before the signal victory obtained by Montrose at Kilsyth, of their short-comings, together with certain remedies, which they ordered to be engrossed in the books of the various presbyteries. This document is a curiosity in its way. It advances numerous grave charges against the clergy; and, as a whole, presents no very favourable picture of their character; albeit the period to which it refers is usually regarded as the golden age of Scottish presbyterianism. Besides worldliness, lightness of carriage in themselves and families, ambiguities, slander, silence of the public cause, and so on, they are charged with Sabbath profaneness, and "tipping and bearing companie in untymous drinking, in taverns and aill-houses, or any where else, whereby the ministrie is made vyle and contemptible." The "list of sins," as the document is called in the circular of the commissioners to the presbyteries, is as follows:—

"The enormities and corruptions in the ministers, and the remedies throf. recommendit to the severall presbyteries.

"1. The first and main sinne, reaching hott to our personal carriage and calling, we judge to be not studying God, to keep commands, and fellowship with God in Christ, but walking in a natural way, without employing Christ, and drawing virtue from him for sanctification, and preaching in spirit and power. And in our lives, first, frivolous conversing in company, and complying with the times of all sorts, nor behaving ourselves as becomes the men of God.

"2. Great worldliness is to be found amongst us—muzzling and speaking most about things of this life, being bussied about many things, forgetting the main.

"3. Slighting of God's worship in their families, and therefore no cordial trying of it upon others, quha altogether wanting it in some if it be credible.

"4. Want of gravitie in carriage and apperrell, dissoluteness in hairt, and shakings about the [] lightness in the apperrell of their wyves and children.

"5. Tippling and bearing companie in untymous drinking in tavernes and aillhouses, or any where else, whereby the ministrie is maid vyle and contemptible.

"6. Discourtenancing of the godlie, speaking ill of them, berand of some that are unanswerable to their profession.

"7. The Sabbath is not sanctified after sermon, whilk maketh the people think that the Sabbath is ended with the sermon.

"8. Their are also to be fund amongst us who use smaller and mised oaths.

"9. Some so great strangers to Scripture that, except in their public ministeries, although they read many things, yet they are little conversed in the Scripture and in the meditation thereof, a duty incumbent to all the people of God.

"1. Sist our callings. First, corrupt duties in former tymes, and following the course of desertion, though forsaken, yet never seriously repented, and also present entering into the ministerie, as to a way of living in the world, and not as to a spiritual calling.

"2. Helping in the holding in of insufficient and suspected men, who savour the things of this life, and keeping the door shuttied upon them whom God has solved. Whereupon them who has les obedience of the power of grace and holiness.

"3. Partialitie in favouring and speaking of the scandalous, whether ministers or other persons, teaching them how to shift and delay censure.

"4. Silence of the public cause, not labouring to cure the disaffection of people, nor urging them to constancie and patience in bearing publick burthens, nor to forwardness in the publick cause, whereby malignants are multiplied—yea, sum are so gross herein, that evin in publick fasts little or nothing is to be heard from them sounding this way.

"5. Some accompt it a poynt of wisdom to speak ambiguously. Some inclyne to justify the wicked cause, uttering words qlk savour of disaffection, and all through complaining of the times in such a way as may steal the hearts of people from lyking of good Instruments in the work, and, consequentlie, from God's cause. Yea, some reading publick orders, are ready to speak against them in their private conference.

"6. Idleness, or seldome in preaching, as once onlie on the Lord's day, or in preparation for publick duties, not being given to reading and meditation. Others have bot fittes of paines, not lyke other tradesmen continuallie at their work.

"7. Want of zeale and love to the conversion of soules, not weighted with the want of success in reclaiming of sinners, nor searching in themselves the cause of not profiting. Preaching, ex officio, not ex conscientia officii.

"8. Self-seeking in preaching, and a venting rather of their witt and skill than a shewing forth of the wisdom and power of God.

"9. Lyfelesnes in preaching, not studieing to be furnished by Christ with power—and so the ordinance of God reacheth not to the conscience, and hereto belong the not applying of the doctrine unto the auditorie and tymes.

"10. The indiscret curing of the indiscretion of pious people and ministers, whereby godlines has groun a deip wound, and profanitie lifted up the head, contrare to the wyse and gracious order sett furth by the great Assemblie at Edinburgh, in 1641.

"11. Little care to furnish our armie, either abroad or at home, with ministers, one of our grevous sinnes, and causes of our calamitie.

"12. Last, it is to be feared that ministers in secret are negligent to warstle in prayer for a blessing to be poured out upon their labours, contenting themselves with their publick performance."

SKELDON HAUGHS: OR, THE SOW IS FLITTED!

CRAUFURD O' KERSE sat in his ha,—
White war his locks as driftit snaw;
For stealin' change o' shriv'lin' Time
Had quencht the vigour o' his prime;
An' totterin' limbs puir service yield,
Whan rivals struggle in the field!
His shrunken airm refused its part,
Tho' warm the throbbin's at his heart—
For through his veins there flow'd the bluid
O' Auld SIR REGINALD* the gude!—
That bluid that roused the soul and might
O' SCOTLAND'S Hero, WALLACE wight!
In suith, he was a Baron bauld,
For tuilzies tough, in days o' auld;
A lion in the battle fray—
In deadly feud a deadly fae!
But now, a venerable Lord,
He, mirthfu' cheer'd the festive buird
Wi' merry tale and hamely jest:—
Or whiles he reard his warlike crest,
As if prepared the brunt to meet!
An' then recountit mony a feat
O' apin strife and artfu' wile.—
Thus wald he listless hours beguile;

* SIR REGINALD CRAUFURD of Loudoun, the heritable Sheriff of Ayr. He was maternal uncle to SIR WILLIAM WALLACE.

While a' around, his sinewy race,
 Gazed, dumb wi' rapture, in his face!
 Crack follow'd crack, the cup gaed roun',
 That mony a caukerin' thought cou'd droun—
 Whan, sudden, at the yett a guest Admittance claim'd—Quoth Kerse, "The best
 Our almourie can yield bring ben—
 I trow there's walth, gin he war ten!—
 Shew in the stranger!"—"Fair and free,
 In strode young GILBERT KENNEDIE.
 "Kerse," (quo' the youth), "whan feuds are sworn,
 It matters nought how slight the thorn
 That poisonous rankles in our side—
 I bring defiance to your pride!—
 The bauld BARGANY bids me say,
 Whan mornin' breaks, on Lammas-day,*
 A Sow upon your land I'll tether!
 Like midges let the Craufurds gather,
 Some teeth in angry fit may chitter—
 But de'il a man o' Kyle sall flit her!"
 Kerse e'ed him wi' contemptuous sneer—
 "My merry man—an' come ye here
 To jeer me at my ain fire-side?
 Gae hame, for ance, in a haill hide!
 Time was, that Kerse wad blythe hae ridden
 Out owre yon hills at sic a biddin':
 Fu' little value I, or mine,
 Ten score o' Kennedies—and Swine!
 Had wither'd Kerse a limb to wag—
 But let the bauld Bargany brag!
 The Kennedies, wi' a' their power,
 Frae Cassillis to Ardstinchar Tower,
 May rise an' flock like screechin' craws,
 Frae heighs an' hows, fra hames and ha's,
 An' hither come wi' blawin' crack—
 They'll bear anither story back!
 Kerse is, alas! nair mair the man
 That in the onset led the van!
 But he has sons to shield his name,
 Heirs o' his valour and his fame!
 And if on Lammas-day they fail,
 Curse him wha lives to tell the tale!—
 Let your proud baron croosely crawl
 On his ain midden, days but twa;
 But on the third—by this grey head,
 He'll aiblins thank his geldin's speed!—
 This in defiance! (Craufurd says)
 Gie the chiel' room, lads—Slip your ways!"

Petri ad Vincula)—and got its name from the circumstance of the Apostle being considered as 'the patron of lambs'—from the metaphorical expression of our Saviour, 'Feed my lambs!' In the Romish Church, a Mass was instituted, on this day, for St Peter's benediction, that the lambs shorn at this time might escape the danger of cold, &c.

This well-told "tale in rhyme" was written by the late Sir Alexander Boswell, Bart., of Auchinleck, and privately printed at the Auchinleck press in 1816.¶ It is inscribed to "George Rankin, Esq., of Whitehill," near Ayr, from whom Sir Alexander obtained the tradition. There are, however, two versions of the story—the one, as narrated in the poem; the other—"that three of the Craufurds of Lochnorris were present at the battle; one of whom returned, heavily bemoaning the fall of his two brothers, when his widowed mother suddenly cut short his lamentation by exclaiming, 'Is the sow flitted?' 'Aye is she,' replied the youth, 'and five score of the Kennedies are drowned in Doon!'"

The scene of the conflict, as pointed out by tradition, is on the Kyle side of the river Doon, on a high bank not many yards from the water's edge. There is a farm-house in the vicinity called the Boarland, from the circumstance, it is said, of the sow having been tethered there. A delightful and extensive glen, through which the Doon flows, immediately above the house, also bears the name of Boarland or Boreland. But, as there are many Borelands—in various parts of the country—it is probable that the name had a different derivation. In former times, a portion of suitable land was usually set apart for the herd of swine—hence the number of Boarlands. This, however, does not militate against the tradition, which is supported by the fact that a broad pool in the water of Doon, in a holm adjacent to the rising ground already mentioned, has been known beyond living remembrance by the name of Kennedies' Dub, from the number of Kennedies, it is said, drowned in it in their retreat, pursued by the victorious Craufurds.

It is well known that feuds continued to prevail with deadly animosity, between the Craufurds of Kyle and the Kennedies of Carrick, for many centuries. The first on record was the slaughter of Gilbert, Earl of Cassillis, by Hew Campbell of Loudoun, sheriff of Ayr, at Prestwick, in 1527. This violent act originated, it is supposed, in political motives. Loudoun being the head of the Craufurds by the female side, a number of them were engaged in the assault; for it required a considerable force to overcome the followers of Cassillis—every person of rank, in those days of feud and foray, deeming it imprudent to travel without a formidable body of attendants. George and William Craufurd of Lochnorris were both engaged in the affair. The slaughter of their chiefs led to various retaliatory inroads by the Kennedies. The following year, Robert Campbell in Lochfergus, Alexander Kirkwood, and Patrick Wilson, were slain by the Kennedies. From the number and rank of the latter, who were charged with the offence in the Books of Adjournal, there can be little doubt that a large body of Carrick men were engaged in the invasion. In 1530, John Kennedy of Giletree, Patrick Mure of Cloncard, and fifty-eight others belonging to Carrick, were accused before the criminal courts "for art and part of the thieftuous stealing, under silence of night, from John Craufurd of Kersehill, six score of oxen and cows, ijc. sheep, and six horses and six mares"—a raid, it must be allowed, of no ordinary description.

Sir Alexander Boswell assigns the Flitting of the Sow to the fifteenth century—but upon what authority we know not. We rather incline to think that it occurred at a later period. The Craufurds of Kerse, from the time that David, with his adherents, in 1508, prevented the Bailie of Carrick* from holding his court and serving "the brieve of the Laird of Kilhenze," down to the great feud of the Kennedies, which terminated with the Tragedy of Auchindrain in 1611—were at all times ready, like knight-errants, to shield the oppressed, and undertake a crusade in Carrick.

The Craufurds of Kerse were an ancient race, descendants of the Loudoun Craufurds. The first of them, Reginald, had a grant of the lands from his brother Hugh of Loudoun, in the reign of Alexander III.—between 1249 and 1286. The family ended in a female, Christian Craufurd of Kerse, who married Mr Moodie of Molcester, and having no succession, sold the property of Kerse about the middle of last century.

The following receipt for rent—1737—was granted while it remained in possession of the Craufurds:—

The printing materials are still preserved at Auchinleck House.

Kerse Castle was situated in Kyle Regis, about eight miles south-east of Ayr, near the Craigs of Kyle. Not a stone of the building now remains. The greater part of it was carried away by the new proprietor to build a house on another property, some miles distant; and the only wall left standing was blown down by the same storm which, in 1797, scattered the French armament which had been destined for the invasion of Ireland.

SIR WILLIAM MURE,

KNIGHT OF ROWALLAN.

AMONGST the earlier poets, the author of the "Trve Crvcifixe for Trve Catholikes" is entitled to hold no mean place. His genius may not have been of the highest order; but his literary acquirements were fully equal to the age, and his writings bear the impress of a chaste and vigorous intellect.

Sir William Mure, born in 1594, was a lineal representative of the ancient house of Rowallan. Little is known of his education—where and how long he studied—but no doubt can be entertained of his general proficiency as a scholar. He was a nephew—by the mother's side—of Montgomerie, author of the "Cherry and the Slae," whose fame as a poet may not have been without its effect in fanning the early muse of Rowallan. Before his twentieth year he had completed a metrical translation of Virgil's "Dido and Æneas," extending to 407 stanzas of six lines each. Of this unpublished work, a favourable opinion may be formed from the following introductory verses:—

I sing Æneas's fortunes, while on fyr,
Of dying Troy he takes his last farewell;
Queen Dido's love, and cruell Juno's ire,
With equal fervor which he both doth [did] feel.
Path'd wayes I trace, as Theseus in his neid,
Conducted by a loyal virgin's threid.

But pardon, Maro, if myn infant muse
(To twyse two lustris scarce of yeirs attained,)
Such task to treat (vnwisely bold) doth choose,
As thy sweet voyce hath erst divinely strained!
And in grave numbers of bewitching verse,
Ravisht with wonder all the vniverse.

But, ravisht with a vehement desire,
Those paths to trace, which yields ane endless name!
By thee to climb Parnassus I aspyre,
And by thy feathers to impen my fame,
Nothing asham'd, thir colours to display,
Vnder thy conduct, as my first assay.

Sacred Apollo! lend thy Cynthia light,
Which, by thy glorious rayes, reflexe doth shyne,
That I, partaking of thy purest spright,
May grave, anew, on tyme's immortal shryne,
In homely stile, those sweet delicious ayers,
In which thy muse so admirable appears.

And ye, Pierian maids, ye sacred nyne!
Which haunt Parnassus and the Pegas spring,
Infuse your furie in my weak ingyne,

That (mask'd with Maro) sweetly I may sing;
And warble furth this hero's changing state,
Elish's love, and last her tragick fate.

Many of Sir William's manuscript effusions are dated as early as 1611, so that he could not be more than seventeen years of age at the time of their composition. Some of these are exceedingly creditable to his youthful muse. For example the following

"CHAUNSOVNE."

Calling to mind the heavenly feature,
The bashful blinks and comely grace,
The form of her angelic face,
Deck'd with the quintessence of nature—
To none inferior in place:
Oft I am forced,
Although divorced
From presence of my dearest's eyes,
The too slow day,
To steal away
Admiring her my smart who sees.

Although she, ruthless she, doth know
The secret burden of my woes,
The tear which from mine eyes down goes—
Regretting fortune, now my foe,
In whom much once I did repose:

Yet she, alace!
Cares not my case;
No spates of tears her heart can move:
She knows my pain,
Yet doth disdain;
But woe's me, I must still her love.

Though by mine eyes I should distill,
And quite dissolve in tears my heart,
To satisfy her causeless smart;
Yet, rather she delights to kill,
Than any joy to me impart.

But since the Fates,
Who rule all states,
Such tragic luck to me doth threat,
Do what she can,
Resolv'd I am,
To love her more than she can hate.

Although she frown, shall I despair?
Or, if it please her, prove unkind,
Shall I abstract my loyal mind?
Oh no! 'tis she must hale my sair;
For her, I loath not to be pined,
She I suppose,
Like to the rose,
The prick before the smell imparts:
Heart-breaking woes
Oft times foregoes
The mirth of mourning, martyr'd hearts.

Our author was as precocious in love as in poetry. In 1615, before attaining his majority, he married Anna Dundas, a daughter of the "laird of Newlistone," by whom he had five sons and six daughters.* Sir William succeeded his father in 1639. Prior to this event, he had published a translation of the Hecatombè Christiana, "Invected in English Sapphicks, from the Latine of that Reverend, Religious, and Learned Divine, Mr Robert Boyd of Trochoreg," and the "Trve Crvcifixe for Trve Catholikes,"† the latter of which became very popular. Though possessing no great poetical merit, it was nevertheless well calculated—by exposing † These works were printed in 1628 and 1629 respectively.

the superstition and absurd pretensions of the Romish priesthood—to advance the work of the Reformation. The following description of priestcraft, in the days to which the author alludes, may afford some idea of the manner and style of this now rare publication :—

Thus do those glow-worms, which but shine by night,
The substance of the world suck vp by slight;
By shows of holynesse, by secret stealth,
Congesting mountains of entysing wealth,
To which, as Ravens which doe carlon see,
Trowps of Church-orders, swarms of Shavelings fle;
Of which none idle, all on work are set:
By cousing miracles, some doe credite get;
To cristen bels, tosse beads, they some appoint;
Some crosse, some creepe, some sprinkle, some anbynt;
Some ballow candles, palmes, crisme, ashes, wax;
Some penitents admit to kisse the Pax!

With the exception of some verses in the Muse's Welcome—a collection of poetical panegyrics on the visit of King James to Scotland in 1615, printed the following year—the Heatombe Christiana and the "Tree Crucifixe" were all that the author gave to the world of his productions. A number of his MSS., however, were discovered some years ago, amongst a quantity of old papers found in the Castle of Rowallan; and in 1825 a proposal was made to publish the "Poetical Remains,"* of Sir William, but we are not aware that the design was ever carried into effect. Apart from these is an entire version of the Psalms—several manuscript copies of which exist—completed in 1639—public attention having been for some time previously much taken up with the subject of an improvement of the Psalmody. It does not appear that Sir William's version was laid before the Westminster Assembly of Divines; but though that of Mr Rous was adopted, the Committee of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, appointed to revise the Psalter, were instructed to avail themselves of the "help of Rowallan's," which, in not a few instances, was allowed to be very superior.

But Sir William's exertions in the cause of civil and religious liberty were not confined to the pen. In 1639, when the policy of the Court had driven the Covenanters to the necessity of taking up arms, Sir William repaired to the camp at Dunse-Law, at the head of a company, constituting a portion of the "1200 foot and horsemen" levied from Ayrshire, raised amongst his own tenantry and neighbours. He was a member of the Scots Parliament for the county in 1643; and in 1644 accompanied the army in the second expedition to England. He was engaged at the battle of Marston-moor; and at the subsequent storming of Newcastle had for a time the chief command of the regiment—the Colonel and some other officers being absent in consequence of their wounds. The following letter from Sir William at this period is peculiarly interesting :—

for his very Lovinge Sonne
yo: of Rowallane.

What part our author took in the stirring events which followed is not known. He died in 1657—having attained the same age precisely as his father had—63. Sir William was greatly esteemed as a pious and worthy man. Besides having "an excellent vaine in poyesie," he was scarcely less fond of music. A manuscript book, of his own noting, which we have seen, is well written, and contains several airs still popular. He appears to have had considerable architectural taste, and to have taken great pleasure in beautifying the castle and improving the estate. According to the MS. chronicle of the family, he "deylted much in building and planting; he buildd the new wark in the north syde of the close, and the battlement of the back wall, and reformed the whole house exceedingly." Rowallan Castle, situated on the banks of the Carmel water, about three miles north of Kilmarnock, is rapidly falling into decay, having been long unoccupied, except partially by the ground officer on the estate. The male heirs of the family failed in 1700—and, by the female side, it is now represented in the person of the youthful Marquis of Hastings.

THE OLD IRISH NEWSPAPER.

THERE is an Irish provincial newspaper which has claims to a very respectable antiquity—the Belfast News-Letter, which is said to have commenced so long back as the year 1737. I have not in my possession any of the earlier publications, but have a dilapidated and discoloured volume containing the greater portion of those issued in 1750 and 1751. It appears to have been published, at this time, twice in the week; and as the number on that of March 1, 1750, which I may take up as a sort of text for this communication, is 1408, the existence of the paper thirteen years previously is thus fully established. It consists of four small pages, the letter-press occupying about fourteen inches in length, and nine in breadth; and though nearly a century, with all its momentous changes and improvements, has rolled round since this little sheet first saw the light, it is printed more clearly and correctly, and on better paper, than a journal of the present day which passed through my hands a short time ago. A postboy blowing his horn, and with his horse at full speed, is figured at the top of the first page, illustrative either of the importance of the speedy transmission of news, or of the fact that by such mode of conveyance was this publication then sent to the towns in the neighbourhood, which was indeed the case down to a comparatively recent period. The "Foreign Intelligence" is generally first detailed, but consists of brief and meagre abstracts, which the newsmongers of these latter times would look upon as altogether unsatisfactory and contemptible. The "Plantation News" is next despatched in a few words; then that from London, and finally that from Dublin. This arrangement in subsequent papers is sometimes departed from; but there scarcely appears in any one of them the smallest reference to the town from which the publication issued, in the way of domestic intelligence, remarkable events, or proceedings of public bodies. These details, which swell the columns of modern newspapers, had either no great charms for our forefathers, or were not such necessities of existence as in our own more exciting days; or, perhaps, as it has been said, or rather sung, in allusion to other times and other people, no chronicler existed to transmit them to posterity. Belfast did not probably contain, in March, 1750, more than one-twentieth of its present population, and there was possibly not one among them taking notes of the progress of events. The advertisements in the paper are about thirty in number, setting forth accounts of ships for sea, lands for sale, as well as food, clothes, and luxuries of various kinds, all presenting the germ of the commercial eminence and activity to which this great town has now risen. These advertisements, it is announced, if of moderate length, will, with the exception of the first, be inserted for sixpence-halfpenny each; the paper itself, at the place of publication, was sold for the moderate sum of a halfpenny; and it is a proof of the difficulty and expense of transit when there were no mail or stage coaches, and when the roads were universally bad, that the price was nearly double in towns only thirty or forty miles distant. The state of the markets is also regularly given, the prices, at the time, of many articles of prime necessity being sufficiently tantalizing this melancholy year. Wheat and oatmeal are quoted for many months at prices which would not respectively exceed, at an average, seven shillings per hundred weight, and barley three-and-sixpence; while a still greater discrepancy appears in butter, which seems to have been less than threepence per pound. It is curious that commodities of great value were not known to trade at this period. The most considerable of these is pork, which has formed for many years an article of commerce of the very first importance in the town in which this paper was published. Nor can I see, either directly or indirectly, the slightest reference to potatoes, which would seem to have been as rare in the reign of George II., as many political economists would wish they should be for the time to come. Both these commodities probably rose into importance together, as the one has hitherto in Ireland been entirely dependent on the other for its production. Finally, and to conclude this branch of the subject, the tail-piece of the News-Letter informs the public that it is printed at the Peacock, in Bridgestreet, the location, or at least the street, from which it still issues. The Peacock, however, has disappeared; but the mention of the fact gives us to understand, either that newspaper establishments in old times had their street signs, or that the bird of gaudy plumage, being an emblem rather inappropriate to the press, indicated the existence of some other trade or occupation in the premises, the most insignificant corner of which was probably found sufficient for the preparation and sale of the humble broadsheet.

There are few intelligent or inquiring persons who will not find matter for reflection in this old paper. Some may be most impressed with the contrast which it exhibits with the present time in the state of foreign and distant lands; others with the great political, commercial, and manufacturing changes in our own favoured country; while others, of less ambitious taste, will pause over the evidences of social progress, which it cannot fail, more or less, to shadow forth. How changed is the aspect of those nations to which its foreign news refers! Poland, for instance, occupies a conspicuous place; whole kingdoms and dynasties have since been overturned and remodelled, in a manner, and by means, and to an extent, of which the politicians of those days, the far-seeing men, never dreamed; while, of all the plans here alluded to, the profound schemes, the alliances and projects, which were to produce effects so great and permanent, how long did they endure? Are they not unknown, except to the very student of political history—as unknown and forgotten by the world as the courtly ambassadors and diplomatists who figured both before and behind the scenes? Should these foreign topics fail to excite any interest, or stimulate to any further inquiry, the reader may, perhaps, have his attention aroused by matter nearer home, by a few pictures from our own annals, and if not led by any previous study or reflection to think of the state of society in former times, will scarcely believe some of the pieces of news inserted in this old journal. If he should happen to be, for example, a young, active, bustling, railway traveller, interested in some of the colossal manufactures of England—a man altogether of the present day, neither knowing of the past nor caring for it, familiar with all the conveniences and facilities around him, and almost thinking they had ever been—he will scarcely believe that it should be announced, as an extraordinary feat of speed, that a London tradesman, at the death of the Prince of Wales, father of George the Third, travelled by post from the metropolis to Manchester in thirty-two hours—that the object of this rapid journey was to anticipate his fellow-tradesmen in the purchase of mourning—that success rewarded his activity, and that he bought up, in the course of the morning, all the black goods in the town, “both linen and woollen, mercery and millinery.” Truly, he who can only think of the Manchester of the middle of the nineteenth century, with its enormous powers of production, with its manufactures to clothe the world, might ask, “—All, did you say all?” and though he might feel disposed to envy the times which produced so rare a customer, would hold in very small account the rapidity of his journey when thinking of Grand Trunks and Grand Junctions, and thirty or forty miles an hour. But here is another “tale of the times of old,” from our criminal statistics. I copy a sample of the “London News” of 1750, in these words:—“Yesterday the ten Malefactors were executed at Tyburn. Vincent, Clements, and Westly, three boys, went in the first cart; Smith and Davis in the second; Applegarth and Sauce in the third; and Field, Sullivan, and Parsons, in the last. Field’s legs were chained together, for fear his brother bruisers would attempt to rescue him. Mr Parsons, a few days before his execution, ordered a Diamond Mourning Ring to be made, with the following inscription:—‘William Parsons, Ob. 11 Feb., 1750—1, æt. 33,’ and the Poesy was ‘When this you see, Remember me,’ which Ring he presented to a certain young Lady, as the last Token of his Affection for her.” Does not this exhibit a remarkable difference between the newspaper spirit—between the state of popular feeling and opinion—of that era and the present. No word of comment from editor or correspondent appears on this wholesale execution; no account is given, either in this old paper or any previous one of the crimes of the sufferers; no long columns are filled with their trials; no hairbreadth escapes are detailed, nor strange chains of circumstantial evidence, nor unexpected providential discoveries, to awe and amaze the people, to strike dumb and confound the guilty. I would be curious to know something of the history of these men, whose names, entombed for a century, are thus again brought to light. Of what had these three poor boys been convicted? Of what Mr Parsons, whose tenderness and questionable taste the prospect of a violent and disgraceful death could not extinguish? The Newgate Calendar, doubtless, contains at length the fatal record; but that which is here extracted is the brief memorial—thought sufficient for the Irish public—of one of the passing events of the great metropolis: a proof of the appalling state of the criminal law, and of the apathy with which it was regarded. The London news also contains numerous accounts of robberies by mounted highwaymen, and there are in the other papers, in two places, within the space of a few weeks, most remarkable and lengthened relations of witchcraft doings. In one case, at a market town in England, two old women are formally proclaimed as witches at the cross, by a large assemblage of people; and in the other at Tring, in Hertfordshire, an old man and his wife, with their thumbs and toes tied together, are thrown into a pond, where the latter is smothered for the same imaginary and impossible crime.

Information referring to the domestic history of the time, or to the occurrence of any remarkable local events, is, as I have said, unrecorded, and not to be met with. The advertisements sometimes incidentally give us some notices of this kind, rather as confirming, however, former well-known usages of society, than as presenting anything very original. They should of themselves be curious and interesting to the present inhabitants of Belfast, if it were only as proofs of the state of trade and business among their predecessors, as affording faint glimpses of the past, or even as mute memorials of men and things that have long since passed into oblivion. None of the names which are now most prominent in the same locality are to be found among them, for almost every generation finds a large town occupied or ruled by new men, by new merchants. In a few cases, however, I have reason to know that the descendants of those who issued these advertisements are persons of wealth and station—in fact, “squires of high degree.” Observe in that advertisement of hardware, in the middle column of our old paper, cockheels announced for sale, among the tools of workmen and various articles of domestic usefulness. What a change in the state of society does that word suggest, indicative as it is of the prevalence of a base amusement, now happily extinct among us, or, if known at all, practised by stealth, and by the very lowest of the community! How odd it would appear to find such inserted in the advertisement of a hardware merchant of the present day! Yet the following extract from the paper itself, and which is only one of several of a similar kind that I observe in turning over these tattered leaves, would go to prove that the advertiser was only the medium of supplying a required want—that he did not offer a commodity in doubtful, or, perhaps, even in slender, demand:—“This Week thirty-six Battles were fought at the Royal Cock Pit, on Cork Hill, between Stags, for 2000 Guineas, Twenty-one of which were won by Captain Vernon's Cocks. There were also nine By-Battles for a considerable Sum, which were won by the Earl of Meath."

The Cock Pit forms the subject of one of the best productions of Hogarth, but perhaps the influence of the works of that great genius was yet unfelt in this remote region. There are also no less than two advertisements respecting servants who have absconded from their masters, and carried off property with them, and, in both cases, the fugitives are described as wearing wigs of a particular colour; or, more remarkable still, a long advertisement appears, raising the hue and cry after certain criminals who have escaped from the jail of a neighbouring county, and while most of them, for the purpose of leading to their identification and apprehension, are set down as having black or brown wigs, one remarkable fellow, whom we may conjecture, perhaps, to have been in advance of his age, is described as a "soft-faced man, with a large nose, wearing his own hair." These were the times when not alone gay sparks in ball costume, and gentlemen of worship, and grave citizens, and all the respectable members of the community, but the very convicts wore wigs as ordinary articles of apparel. A few, a very few, articles of some talent now and then enliven the sameness of these pages. There are two or three poetical extracts of this stamp. A schoolmaster, whom we conceive to have been a quaint and dry original, advertises to teach the mathematics, and to "Demonstrate the Laws of Motion by several Experiments by which are found a true Measure for Time which I hope some Men of able Minds and Opulent Fortunes will improve to the advantage of their King and country," a sound advice for such in every age, and coming thus unexpectedly in the middle of an advertisement, which immediately goes on to speak of mensuration and other kindred subjects, might be remembered when the precepts of the former moral essay would be forgotten. Quack medicines, too, are advertised, for credulity is of ancient growth, and in so far, at this improved era, of exhibiting any symptoms of decay, that the pills, elixirs, and styptics, which were to renovate the frames of our ancestors, are put forward with much less pretence and effrontery than by those who now pursue the same discreditable occupation.—Belfast People's Magazine.

Varieties.

THE THIRTEENTH CENTURY.—Lasflamma (says Voltaire), who wrote in the fourteenth century, complains, that frugality and simplicity had given way to luxury. He therefore regrets the times of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, of the twelfth century, and of the Emperor Frederick II. of the thirteenth century, when in Milan, the capital of Lombardy, they eat flesh meat but three times in a week; wine was very scarce; they had no idea of wax-candles, and even those of tallow were deemed luxury, inasmuch that even the better sort of people used splinters of wood instead of candles; they wore woollen shirts; the most considerable citizens gave not above 100 livres for their daughters' portions. But now, says Lasflamma, we wear linen; the women dress in silk gowns, some of which are embroidered with gold and silver; and they have 2000 livres for their portions, and have their ears adorned with gold pendants. Table linen was very scarce in England. Wine was sold only by apothecaries as a cordial. Private men's houses were all of wood in Paris as well in London. It was reckoned a kind of luxury to ride in a two-wheeled cart in the ill-paved and dirty streets of Paris, it being forbidden to citizen's wives by Philip the Fair. Let no one presume (says an edict of Charles VI.), to treat with more than a soap and two dishes. The use of silver knives and forks, spoons, and cups, was a great piece of luxury. Money was exceeding scarce in many parts of Italy, and much more in France, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries. The Florentines and Lombards, who were then the only people that carried on any trade in France and England, together with the Jews their brokers, usually extorted 20 per cent. for the interest of money. Great usury is the infallible sign of public poverty. Yet it was quite otherwise with the great trading cities of Italy, where alone the people enjoyed conveniency and opulence; whilst the people of the northern parts of Europe, and also of Spain, had only barbarous feudal customs, uncertain, tumultuous, and superstitious witchcrafts, &c.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SCOTS MAGAZINE."

Edinburgh, April 10, 1764.—Sir, I have sent the inclosed account of Oliver Cromwell's birth, thinking it may entertain your readers; none of our historians having observed, that his mother was a Scotchwoman. I am, &c. M. R.

Robert Cromwell, father to Oliver, though he was, by the countenance of his elder brother Sir Oliver, made a justice of peace in Huntingdounshire, had but a slender estate: much of his support being a brewhouse in Huntingdon, chiefly managed by his wife, who was sister to Sir Robert Stewart, of the city of Ely, Kt., and by whom he had issue this our famous Oliver, whose uncle, Sir Robert Stewart, left him an estate of five hundred pounds a-year, in the Isle of Ely.—Short View of the Troubles in England, p. 458. Oxford, 1681, folio. Oliver Cromwell's mother was daughter to Stewart of Rothayth, in the shire of Fife, Scotland. The situation of Rothayth Castle is almost opposite to Hopetoun house, on a rock near the sea. It is supposed the family of Rothayth went into England with James VI. The barony of Rothayth is now the property of the Earl of Hopetoun, worth five hundred pounds per ann.—Lond. Chron.

THE SCOTTISH FISHERIES.—The Hon. the Trustees for improving the Fisheries and Manufactures of Scotland have lately [1764] ordered two vessels to be fitted out, one from the Clyde, the other from Campbeltown, to make an experiment of fishing of cod, on the great bank described by Sir William Monson in his naval tracts (Churchill's Voyages, vol. 3), running from the island of Rona, above a hundred miles in length, as far as Till-head in Ireland; which bank, he says, affords the best quantity of cod and ling of any part of the seas, and for 160 years has not been used. The distance of this bank is 25 leagues, without the western Highland isles. The experiment is likewise to be made on banks about Bockel, which stands 50 leagues without St Kilda. If this laudable undertaking proves successful, it will open a new source of wealth to these kingdoms.

THE "ELVUI."

THE translator of the Gaelic poem, "The Aged Bard's Desire," which appeared in No. III. of the SCOTTISH JOURNAL, observes, in a note, that he is not acquainted with the English name of the flower ajacis. I find in another translation of the same poem, which is given in a forthcoming work by the Chevaliers John Sobieski and Charles Edward Stuart, entitled, "Lays of the Deer Forest," that the English name is Wild St John's Wort:—

"And the wild bright star of St John, Shall bend beside my cheek."

EARLY LAWS OF SCOTLAND.

No. III.

WE have no continuous record of the Acts of the Scottish Parliament earlier than the reign of James I., beginning in 1424. This may be accounted for by the long and devastating wars which both preceded and followed the successful assertion of his country's freedom by Robert the Bruce. Parliaments, under such circumstances, could not be regularly held; and no doubt the records of many of those that were convened have perished. As remarked in a former paper, the first volume of the Acts of the Scottish Parliament, recently printed, is made up from various fragmentary remains, and cannot be regarded as by any means complete.

The long imprisonment of James I. in England threw Scotland still farther back in the march of civilisation. By the time he ascended the throne, in 1424, the country had become ruinously disorganised. Amongst his first proceedings was the assembling of a parliament, and the enactment of such laws as tended to the establishment of order and the administration of justice. His reign extended to twelve years, during which period he devoted himself with extraordinary activity and zeal to the promotion of social improvement. Many of the statutes passed by his parliaments are not only curious of themselves, but interesting as illustrative of the state of society at the time. They may be classed under heads:—

THE KIRK.

"That the halie Kirke joyis and bruikes, and the ministers of it, their aulde privileges and freedoms, and that na man let them to set their landes and teinds, under the paine that may follow, be spiritual law, or temporal."

OF THE KING'S AUTHORITY.

"That na man openlie or notourlie rebel against the kingis person, under the paine of forfeitling of his land, and gudes." "That all men assist the king to punish rebelles."

ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAW.

"That there be maid officers and ministers of law, throw all the realme, that can, or may holde the Lawe to the kingis commounes."

"That all and sindrie the kingis lieges of the realme live and be governed under the Kingis Lawes and estatutes of the Realme allanerlie: and under na other Lawes, nor special Priviledge, nor be na kingis of other Countries nor Realmes."

"That na persones that inditis men to the Justice Aire, be on their assise."

"That na man be admitted to the attorney in the Justice Aire, bot gif he be ane honest and sufficient person of discretion for that office."

"That sex wise men and discreete, of ilk ane of the three Estaites, quhilk knawis the lawes best, sall be chosen (sen fraude and guile aucht to help na man), that sall see and examine the Buikes of Law, that is to say, Regiam Majestatem and Quoniam Attachamenta. And mend the lawes, that neidis mendment."

"The King with consent of his Parliament hes ordained, that his Chancellor, and with him certain discrete persones of the three Estaites, to be chosen and depute be our soueraine Lorde the King, sall sit fra thine fourth three times in the zeir, quhair the King likis to command them: Quhilk sall knaw and examine, conclude, and finallie determine all and sindrie compleintes, causes and quarrelles, that may be determined before the King and his Council."

"That all statutes and ordinances of this Parliament,† and of the two Parliaments preceidand, be registrate in the Kings Register, and given to the schireffes: quhilkis statutes and ordinances, ilk schireffe be halden to publish openlie in the chiefe place of his schirefdome, and utheris notabil places, and als to glue the copies of them to Prelates, Barrones, and Burrowes of his Bailliaris, upon the expenses of the askers," &c.

"That Judges sall be sworne to determine all causes after their coming."

We have here the origin of Circuit Courts. Other acts of the same reign regulate the "forme of proces" before these courts, the "election of the overs-man in arbitrie," &c. While in the two following statutes are prescribed the obedience due to his majesty's horn:—

"Gif it happenis the schireffe, to persew fugitours with the Kingis horne, as is foresaid, and the cuntries rise not in his support, they all, or parte, hearand the King's horne, or beand warned be the maires, and followis not the out-horne, and that may be over-tane upon them be ane assise before the schireffe, ilk Gentle-man sall paye to the King unforgiven fourtie shillinges, and ilk zeaman* twentie shillinges."

"That ilk officiar of the Kingis, as Maire, or Kingis serjand, and Barroune serjand, sall not pass in the Countrie, nor Barrone serjand in the Barronnie, but ane horne and his wand, and that sall be in this maner. The Kingis officiar as is aforesaid, sall have an horne, and ilk ane a read wande of three quarters of ane zairde lang at the leaste, and the officiaris of the Regalitie ane wand of the samin length, th'ane end reade, th'other ende quhite, and ane horne quhair he

And gif the principal partie be absent, the Advocate sall swear in the saule of him, after as is contained in their meters:—

PARLIAMENT.

"That all Prelates, Erles, Baronnes and Free-halders of the King within the Realme, sen they ar halden to give presence in the Kingis Parliament, and General Councel, frae thine fourth be halden to compeir in proper person, and not be a Procuratour: But gif the Procuratour alleage there and prove a lauchfull cause of their absence."

By a subsequent enactment "small baronnes and free halders" were relieved of the duty of attending Parliament, "twa or maa wise men, after the largenes of the Schirefdome," to be "out-tane" from each sheriffdom—which commissioners to appoint a speaker, &c.

ESTABLISHMENT OF ORDER.

"That firme and sicker peace be keeped and halden throw all the Realme."

"That all men assist the King to punish rebelles."

"That na companies passe in the Countrie, to lye upon onie the Kingis Lieges: or thigt or sojourne horse, outhor on Kirkmen or husbands of the land."

"That na Thiggeres† be thoiled to beg, nouthor to Burgh or Land-wart, betuix fourtene and threescore ten zeires." Those allowed to beg to have "a certaine takin on them," granted by the sheriffs and aldermen.§

All "Bands and Leagues forbidden."

"Receipters of rebelles to be forefaulted."

* This was not the oath itself, but simply the manner of an oath administered to the Advocates. We append a double translation:—

Take oath upon that which appears to thee to be a just cause:

And if the truth be inquired into, deny it not:

Make no promises, and let no false proof be given:

Do not seek a pretext for delaying the settlement of a suit.

Otherwise thus:

Swear only when the cause before thee brought

Seems just; let truth be told when truth is sought;

Beware of bribes: let no false proof be made;

Let not the course of justice be delayed.

DEFENCE OF THE COUNTRY.

James I. was careful to encourage warlike exercises amongst his subjects. With this view he prohibited several pastimes, such as "fute-ball," and ordained "that ilk man busk them to be archeres"—

"That all men busk them to be archeres, fra they be twelve zeir of age, and that in ilk twelve pundis worth of Lande, thair be maid bow markes, and speciale neir to paroche Kirkes, quhair in upon halie daies men may cum, and at the least schutte thrice about, and have usage of archere, and quha sa usis not the said archerie, the Laird of the Land sall raise of him a wedder, and gif the Laird raisis not the said paine, the Kingis Schireff or his ministers sall raise it to the King."

"That in ilk Schireffdome of the Realme, be maid weponschawinges four times in the zeir."

In another act the "maner of Weponschawinges" is set forth at some length:—

"That ilke Gentle-man, havand ten pounds woorth of land or mair, be sufficientlie harnished and armed with Basnet, haill legge Harnes, sworde, speare, and dagger: and Gentlemen havand lesse extentes of Landes, nor na landes, sall be armed at their gudlie power, after the discretion of the Schireffes, bot all uther zeamen of the Realme, betuix xvj. and sextie zeirs, sall be sufficientlie bowed and schafed, with sword and buckler and knife: And that all the Burgeses and indwellers within the Burrow townes of the Realme in like maner be anarmed and harnished, and make Weponschawinges within the Burrowis of the Realme in like maner, four times in the zeir, and that be the Aldermen and Baillies, upon the quhillk the Chalmerlane and his Deputes sall knaw and execute the said thinges. And that all men Seculares of the Realme, be weil purvayd of the said harnes and wepones be the feast of the Nativitie of our Lord Jesus Christ nixt to cum."

"That ilk man that may dispend zeirlie twentie pund, or an hundreth pund in movable gudes, that he be weil horsed, and haill harnished, as Gentlemen aucht to be: And uther's semplar of tenne pounce of rent, or fiftie pundes in gudes, have hat, gorger, and a pesane with wambrasserie and reirbrassers, and gloves of plate, breast plate, pans, and leg splents at the least, or gif him likis better."

"That ilk Zeaman, that is of twentie pound in gudes have a gud doublet of fense, or ane habirgeon, an iron hat, with bow, schaff, sword, and buckler, and knife, and the Zeaman, that is na archer, nor cannot draw a bow, sall have a guid suir Hat for his head, and a doublet of fense, with sword and buckler, and a gude axe, or else a brogged staffe."

"That ilk Barrone within himself sall see and ordaine his men to be bodin, as is before written."

All burgeses were to be armed in a similar manner, in proportion to their means. For the further protection of the country, it was enacted that no person should pass into Ireland without license, or come from it without testimonial—"And for twa causes," says the act, "and principallie, sen the Kingis notoure Rebelloures are receipt in Irishrie in Ireland, and for that cause Passingers passed fra thine, might do prejudice to this Realme; an uther cause is, that the men that are under Irishrie subject to the King of England, might espy the privities of this Realme, and do great skaith."

The "statute anent Ireland men" which follows is rather curious, as exhibiting the ancient amity which existed between the Irishrie and the Scots:—

"That it be maid manifest be the King's Deputes upon the Frontiers, that it is not done for hatred, nor breaking of the auld friendship betuixt the king of Scotland and his Liegis: and the gude aulde friendship of Irishrie of Ireland: Bot allanerlie to eschew the perrel foresaide."

Assurance with Englishmen was held to be treason.

The other acts of the reign of James I. embrace a variety of regulations for the improvement and better government of the country. Mines of gold and silver were declared to belong to the king—gold and silver not to be taken out of the country—customs were imposed—the unseasonable slaying of Salmon forbidden—muir-burning prohibited after the month of March—Deacons of Trades instituted—"Harnes and Armoures, with speares, Schafes, Bowes and Staves" to be brought home by merchants—"haivall men to ludgewith Hostillaries"—every man that "hes nocht of his awin" to labour for his living—Buying and selling of English goods prohibited—Horses not to be sold out of the country under three years of age—that no wine be purchased from "Flemings of the Dam."

Sumptuary laws were enacted by James I. as follows:

"That na man sall weare claithes of Silk, nor Furrings of Martrickes, Funzies, Purry, nor greate nor richer furring, bot allanerlie Knichtes and Lordes of twa hundreth markes at the least of zeirlie rent, and their eldest Sonnes and their aires, but special leave of the King, asked and obtained. And none ither were broderie, Pearle, nor Bulzeone, bot array them at their awin list in all ither honest arraiments, as serpes, beltes, broches, and cheinzies.

For some years great complaints have been made against rookeries by the farmers. Similar complaints occurred in the reign of James I. The following law was in consequence enacted:

"For thy that men consideris that Ruikes biggand in Kirks Zairdes, Orchardes, or Trees, dois greate skaith upon Cornes: It is ordained, that they that sit Trees pertainis to, lette them to big, & suffer on na wise that their birdes flie away. And quhair it be tainted that they big, and the Birdes be flowin, and the nest be fanden in the Trees at Beltane the trees sal be foirfaulted to the King (bot gif they be redeemed fra him, throw them that they first pertained to) and bewin downe, and five schillings to the Kingis taks."

Wolves, it would appear, were common in Scotland in the fifteenth century, for it was statute and ordained,

"That ilk Barronne within his Barronie in gang and time of the zeir, chase and seeke the quhelpes of the Woolfes, and gar slaie them. And the Barronne sall give to the man that slays the Woolfe in his Barronie, and bringis the Barronne the heade, twa shillings. And quhen the Barronnes ordainis to hunt and chase the Woolfe, the tennantes sall rise with the Barronne, under the paine of ane Wedder of ilk man, not risand with the Barronne. And that the Barronnes hunt in their Barronies and chase four times in the zeir, and als oft, as onie Woolfe beis scene with in the Barronie. And that na man seeke the Woolfe with schot, but allanerlie in the times of hunting of them."

For the better cultivation of the land it was enacted, "That ilk man of simple estaite, that suld be of reason labourers, have outhir half ane ox in the pleuch, or else delve ilk day seven fute of length, and seven on breadth, under the paine of ane ox to the king." Severe laws were also passed for the protection of growing timber and orchards, to which the popular ryme no doubt refers:

The Oak, the Ash, the Elm-tree,
Hang a man for a' the three;
For a branch you may won free,
But for a root you'll hanged be."

A RAMBLE IN KINROSS-SHIRE.

THE OLD CHURCHYARD, AND THE STANDING STONES OF ORWELL—THE BIRTH-PLACE OF

MICHAEL BRUCE.

THE old church of Orwell, the foundations only of which can now be traced, was situated on the northern bank of Loch Leven, about one and a half miles from Kinross. There is a great lack of information regarding the antiquity of this building, which appears, by a charter of Robert I., to have been merely a Chapel of Ease in 1330, when it was gifted by that monarch to the monastery of Dunfermline; and it is nowhere apparent at what period it was converted into a parish kirk. A considerable portion of the old building existed within the last forty years, but it was gradually taken to pieces for the purpose of building dykes. A beautiful Gothic window, which was spared when the other portions of the building were demolished, ultimately shared the same fate not many years ago. An aisle, which stood on the south side of the church, and which is said to have been the burying-place of the lords of Burleigh Castle, has been somewhat more tenderly dealt with, one or two loose stones, ready for removal, still remain to mark the position which it occupied. We have heard it stated, although we hope the rumour is without foundation, that even the grave-stones were not spared in this reckless appropriation, several of them having been carried away to form sides for a pig-house! The churchyard, which occupies a gentle slope between the site of the church and the lake, is surrounded by a low wall, and, except on a close inspection, is altogether undistinguishable from the ordinary farming enclosures by which it is environed. There are no venerable trees, the growth of a century, bending over the graves of the generation they have outlived, and giving forth a melancholy murmuring as the breeze sighs through their branches. They have no representative save a scranky saugh tree, which is fast hastening to decay, and, at no distant date, will lay its branches alongside the dust of those over whom it is the solitary sentinel. Although this churchyard has long been disused for purposes of interment, there are still a considerable number of grave-stones in good preservation. Several of the inscriptions are quite illegible, and few of the others possess any general interest: the earliest date we could decipher was 1623. Here, as in most old churchyards in this and the adjoining county, traces of the persecution are to be found. The following is part of an inscription pointing out the resting-place of "Robert Stirk," who appears to have outlived the troublous times in which it was his lot to be an actor:—

"This man . was . intercommuned . for . 10 . yrs . under . prelacy . and . he . with . his . family . were . forced . from . his . dwelling . in . this . parish . July . 1683 . and . durst . not . return . til . the . revolution . in . 1688 ."

At the south-west corner of the churchyard there is a stone with the following inscription:—

"Here . lays . the . corps . of . John . Henderson . his . age . is . 63 . who . died . in . the . yier . of . God . 1697 . in . April . the . 23 . day . 1718 ."

After which comes a quotation from Job, and, at the bottom of the inscription, there is a rude carving, in relief, of a pitchfork. The last mentioned date comes in very awkwardly, but it seems to refer to the period at which the stone was erected. In reference to the pitchfork, which appears on the stone, the following brief legend is told:—One of the Bruces of Kinross was, on a certain occasion, hunting in the neighbourhood of Blairathort, no great distance from Orwell, and, being fatigued, he entered a house to refresh himself. In this house a number of young women were at the time employed in the thrifty task of spinning. After refreshing himself, Bruce proceeded to enjoy a little harmless daffin with the fair spinsters, who, nothing loath, heartily seconded his wishes. Henderson, who was working near the house, hearing some of their screams, and mistaking the cause, rushed into the house, with a pitchfork in his hand which he had been using when disturbed. Seeing a stranger present, he at once threatened him with the instrument which he held in his hand; this the other highly resented, and a struggle ensued, during which the pitchfork was wrested from Henderson and plunged into his body. During the confusion which ensued, the hunter mounted his horse and escaped. Henderson subsequently died of his wounds, and Bruce, after being concealed for some time about Kinross, escaped abroad, where, after meeting with a variety of romantic adventures, he is reported to have died.

About half-a-mile above the old churchyard, in a field by the roadside, are two large upright stones, known as "the Standing Stones of Orwell." They are placed east and west of each other about fifteen yards apart—that to the west is flat, and about six feet in height—the one to the east is of a round form, tapering slightly to the ground, and stands nine feet high. The latter, although still of considerable size, has lost somewhat of its circumference within the last ten years, and, at the present moment, there is a large crack down one side, which, by the action of the weather, will lead to a further diminution of its bulk. It has not been ascertained to what depth these stones are embedded in the earth, but it must be considerable, in order to retain them in the position they occupy. The common belief is, that these stones are of Danish origin, erected in commemoration of a victory, or to mark the spot where those who had fallen in battle were interred. This supposition is so far countenanced by the fact that a stone coffin, of large size, was found on digging up the space between the stones. Similar coffins have also been turned up in the same field, and, ten or twelve years ago, the ground was dug up in several places by a neighbouring proprietor, when large quantities of bones, much decomposed and mixed with charcoal, were discovered. It may also be mentioned, that near "the Standing Stones of Lundin," in the parish of Largo, which are also reputed to be of Danish origin, Sibbald states that "ancient sepulchres have been found." Plausible as this theory is, it nevertheless can scarcely be supposed that the Danes would be disposed to waste so much time in their marauding incursions, as the conveyance and erection of these stones would require, and the more especially as, during the time that they were so employed, they would be constantly exposed to the attacks of the natives, who would be afforded ample time to gather in force, and who by no means relished the presence of such visitors. Moreover, had these been Danish monuments, they would, in all probability, have been overturned by the natives the moment that the invaders turned their backs. The most probable conclusion is, that both these stones, and those at Lundin, which are of much greater height, formed part of Druidic circles, and it is only by adopting some such conclusion that we can account for their preservation to the present time.

Eastward from the "Standing Stones," at the base of the Bishop's Hill, and at no great elevation above Loch Leven, lies the little village of Kinnesswood. The situation is by no means devoid of the picturesque, but the village is chiefly remarkable from having been the birth-place of Michael Bruce, "the Scottish Kirke-White," who was born here in 1746, and returned to die of consumption at the early age of twenty-one. The house, or rather cottage, in which Bruce was born, is situated in a narrow lane which ascends towards the hill from the main street of the village. It consists of two stories, with a thatched roof. The upper one is that which was occupied by the parents of Bruce. The entrance is from the back of the house, where there is a small garden, which was the poet's favourite resort during his periodical visits to Kinnesswood, while at college and teaching at Gairney Bridge. But the bower, in which the youthful poet dreamed his bright visions has been uprooted; the bushes which then flourished in the garden, have been taken away, many of them as relics, and the grassy bank where he delighted to recline, has been cut up by a footpath; so that this spot presents little resemblance to what it did in Bruce's day. Within, there has been less change. Originally the house consisted of but one apartment, but it was subsequently divided into two small rooms, badly lighted and worse ventilated, and must have proved an exceedingly uncomfortable dwelling for a consumptive patient. The building is in very indifferent repair, and the floor of the inner apartment, the place we believe where Michael died, is in a very frail condition. It creaks and shakes beneath every tread, and, unless repaired, it threatens speedily to give way altogether. When so much is doing at the present time to repair and preserve the "homes and haunts of genius" throughout the land, it is to be hoped that the lowly birth-place of Michael Bruce will not be overlooked. The cottage is now occupied by an elderly female, who very kindly gave us all the information we required. On leaving, we offered her a slight acknowledgment for the trouble which we had occasioned her, but this she firmly, but respectfully, declined. Her reply was so characteristic of that spirit for which our peasantry was wont to be famed, that we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of recording it: "I have never taken money from any one who has called to see the place, and would not like to begin it now. Siller's very good in its own place, but I would think it an imposition to take money from those who thought so much of Michael Bruce as to visit the place of his birth;" and a tear glistened in the good woman's eye as she said this.

We have no intention of entering on a narrative of the life of Michael Bruce at the fag-end of a brief article, but we cannot pass from the scene of his birth and death, without indulging in a few remarks on some of the peculiar circumstances in the history of this ill-used child of genius. His beautiful "Ode to the Cuckoo;" his "Elegy written in Spring;" and those singularly poetical versions of Scripture which now form part of our paraphrases, and which have been erroneously attributed to Logan, were alone sufficient to secure him a place on the roll of Scottish bards, whose works shall live while the language lasts, and this honour he achieved in poverty and suffering before he had reached the age of twenty-one. A doubly unhappy lot was his. While in life, he had to maintain a stern struggle for existence, borne down at the same time by the fell disease which ultimately proved fatal; and, when his blameless life and early death might have been expected to awaken the sympathies of every liberal heart, his productions were unblushingly appropriated by one who, under the mask of friendship, had, with deliberate forethought, possessed himself of every document which he conceived likely to lead to proof of the original authorship. By a breach of every thing appertaining to honour, John Logan, who afterwards wrote himself "Reverend," possessed himself of the MSS. of Michael Bruce, and, after doing all he could indirectly to damage the poetical reputation of the man he pretended to serve, completed his treachery by publishing the best productions of the deceased as the efforts of his own muse! Those who are desirous of seeing Logan's pretensions utterly scattered to the winds, will do well to consult the admirable memoir which the Rev. Dr M'Kelvie has prefixed to the latest edition of Bruce's Works. The Rev. Dr has accumulated a mass of indisputable evidence, which places Logan's conduct in the most contemptible light, and forever settles the question of authorship. A very chaste monument has been erected to the memory of Bruce, in the churchyard of Portmoak, where his ashes repose.

"Hail, and farewell, blest youth! soon hast thou left
This evil world. Fair was thy thread of life;
Not quickly by the envious Sisters shorn.
Thus have I seen a rose with rising morn
Unfold its glowing bloom, sweet to the smell,
And lovely to the eye; when a keen wind
Tore its blushing leaves, and laid it low,
Shorn of its sweets.—"

W. H.

LETH-SGEUR, NOW CALLED SGEUR NA BAINTIGHEARNA.

ELIZABETH, the daughter of Gilliesping Ruadh, or Red Archibald, the second Earl of Argyll, and sixteenth chief of the Campbells, counting from their succession to the chiefship of clan duine, (who are supposed to have been a remnant of the damni of the Romans that settled in Argyleshire when the southern tribes were scattered,) was married to Lachlan Catanach, the chief of the Macleans. She had no family, and the disappointment, as is frequently the case with ladies so situated, having irritated her susceptibilities, rendering her of an unequal temper, she indulged in jealous reproaches against her husband, in consequence of which both led so "unblessed a life," that Lachlan Catanach at length determined to get quit of her. She was accordingly doomed by him to be drowned, and placed on a rock, called Leth-Sgeur, situate to the south of the island of Lismore, about a mile from Duart Castle. This rock is covered by the sea, excepting when "the tide is out," it being intended by the cruel chief that the unfortunate lady should have time to look her death in the face, before the returning flood should gradually swallow up the rock and overwhelm her.

The poet of Hope made the above tradition the subject of one of his beautiful elegiac pieces; and the authors of the guide books, so industriously thrust into the hands of Highland tourists, seem to have considered themselves entitled to use the same poetic license as the bard, in their version of it. It is stated that Maclean and his clan marched in funeral procession, carrying a bier, in which the lady's corpse was supposed to be deposited, to Glenarary, where they were met by "her sire and her kinsmen;" and that a clansman of her own, by whom she was beloved previously to her marriage, and who, passing the rock opportunely before she was drowned, had heard her cries and rescued her, caused the bier to be set down and opened; and thus exposed and disgraced the treacherous husband in the presence of both clans.

For this version of the tradition there is no foundation, excepting in the verses of the bard. The established and genuine tradition of the district is, that the lady was rescued by a party of the Macleans themselves; and conveyed in safety to her father's castle of Inverary; and this tradition is perfectly consistent with the genuine spirit of the clan, while the version of the poet and guide books is only consistent with that of the feudal system. Lachlan Catanach was a fierce, bold and stern chief, and altogether incapable of stooping to the paltry subterfuge of a fraudulent procession and a mock funeral, to obviate a feud even with the Campbells; nor would any Highland clan tolerate a chief capable of disavowing his actions and shrinking from their consequences.

The Highland chiefs were not, like the feudal barons, absolute in their respective districts, or possessed of the power of "pit and gallows." They were, in all matters of jurisdiction, tied by the cleachdadh, or common law of the clans. The ceann-tighes made it not only a matter of conscience, but also a point of honour, never to allow any violation of their cleachdadh by the chief or any other person. Had they acted otherwise, they would have lost caste, and been looked upon as disgraced by all the other clans of the kingdom. It is impossible to conceive a more admirable system of government than that which prevailed among the patriarchal Celtic clans. It appears to have been the very model on which is founded the present constitutional monarchy of Great Britain. For, like the chief of the patriarchal system, our Queen is potent to execute, but powerless to break through our laws; while her exalted station affords her every means of conciliating the respect, and gaining the love of her subjects. Such was also the case with the patriarchal chief; and the result was the same in both cases. Hence, the devotion of her subjects to our Queen is but a type of the devotion of the clans of the olden time to their chiefs. Those who have been in the habit of regarding the institution of clanship as identical with that of feudalism, have, accordingly, been puzzled to comprehend, or to account for the difference between the tie which connected the baron and his vassal and serf, and the chief and his clansman; and, in their endeavours to do so, they seem to have come to the conclusion that the clansman was a creature of a much more degraded rank and character than the vassal and serf on the same principle that they consider the spaniel an inferior animal to the bull-dog, in consequence of his superior affection and devotion to his master.

The lady of Lachlan Catanach, therefore, was under the guardianship of the "use and wont," or common law of the Celtic clans; and when her husband overstepped the bounds set to his authority by these laws, the clan and their chieftains interposed; and, advancing to her rescue, conveyed her in safety to the guardianship of her father and kinsmen.

A legal separation afterwards took place between the ill-assorted couple; and Lachlan Catanach married the daughter of the chieftain of the island of Weiserneis. By this lady, he had two sons, whose warlike adventures are equal to those of the most celebrated warriors of their clan, distinguished as that clan have been even down to the present day, for their romantic and patriotic heroism—we mean Eeachan More and Ailein nan Sop. Nor did the lady (his former wife) carry her wrongs and her sorrows unavenged to the grave. She was afterwards married to a clansman of her own, Campbell of Achanambreac; and her brother, Achachallader, slew her former husband, Lachlan Catanach, in Duneidein, in revenge of the treatment his sister had met with, and an attempt he was said to have made on the life of his brother, Jain Gorm of Lochnell, while yet but a mere youth.

ORIGIN OF THE CANONGATE.

A RESPECTED correspondent, in reference to No. I. of "The Chronicles of the Canongate," writes us upon this subject. He is of opinion, with various other antiquaries, that no such place as Herbergare existed at the time the abbey of Holyrood was founded; and that the word itself "is simply a Latinized form of the old word herberie, which signified a lodging, an inn, a camp, a harbour, or indeed any place where accommodation was obtainable." The clause in the original charter of David I. to the canons of Santa Crucis runs thus: "Concedo etiam ei herbergare quoddam burgum inter eandem ecclesiam et meum burgum." Maitland has translated this passage, which Chalmers, author of Caledonia, adopts, in the following words: "I likewise grant to the said canons the town of Herbergare, lying betwixt the said church and my town of Edinburgh." Our correspondent says, the passage "seems to imply no more than that the abbot was at liberty to erect certain burghal habitations [herbergare] between the abbey and the burgh of Edinburgh, viz., in the Canongate." The weight of modern opinion is in favour of this construction; but we have great difficulty in assenting to it.

The question started by our correspondent formed an interesting point of debate in the Court of Session immediately before the Reformation. The action was brought by the Commendator of Holyroodhouse, Robert Stuart, natural son of James V., against the magistrates and council of Edinburgh, in vindication of the rights and privileges of the Canongate. In their defences, the authorities of Edinburgh disputed the titles of the abbey:—

"The said fundament contenis that the Queen's grace progenitoris infeft and gave to the abbot and convent of the said abbay ane burgh callit Harbargary quhilk is now allegit to be callit the Cannongait; thair saidis tytillis in na wayis contenand that ony burgh wer disposit to thame nother Harbargarie nor utheris, nocht grantand that Harbargarie wes ane burgh, nor yit in cace Harbargarie had bein ane burgh, or rather gif ony village or pepill wes callit Harbargarie, nocht grantand the samyn, yit it was nocht callit the Cannongait in the titill product to us; bot allanerlie the titill tueching thir purposis contenis thir wordis, efter mony uthir dispositiones,—Concedo eciam eis harbargary quoddam burgum inter eandem ecclesiam et meum burgum;—quhairin na specificatioun is maid that Harbargary wes ane burgh, or wes ordanit to be erectit in ane burgh; nec hec sonant aut volunt verba in carta posita, bot erar that licence wes grantit to big sum burgh quoniam dicta Harbargary, illic posita potius videtur esse verbum licet barbarum significans creditibiliter id quod edificare, quam nomen significans urbem oppidum vel burgum; quia si nomen esset, verba et dispositio aliter taxerentur, viz.—Concedo eis burgum de Harbargary, vel burgum quod harbare appellabatur inter eandem ecclesiam et meum burgum; quhairfor sen Harbargary in the said infeftment can nocht be tane as ane propir name of ane toun, nor yit can be understanding be the samyn that Harbary is now callit the Cannongait in cais it had been ane burgh; the titill na wayis verefeis that part of the narrative and fundiment that thair ar infeft in ane burgh callit Harbargary, and now the Cannongait. In fortificatioun of the premissis it is notourlie knawin be the inspectioun of histories that thair wes na biggingis about the said kirk of Haliruidhous the tyme of the granting of the said infeftment, nor yit in that rowme quhilk is now callit the Cannongait, but allanerlie woddis and wilderness. Thairfor in the infeftment it is said—concedo eciam eis quoddam burgum—nocht expremend* the certaine name of the toun, for gif Harbary had been ane propir name of ane toun this dictioun quoddam had nocht been admittit to it,—que dictio solet apponi designative ad res certam appellationem non habentes. And als the boundis now callit the Cannogait hes ay broukit that name past memor of man, and ay continwallie sen the foundatioun of the said abbay, and nevir callit with this name Harbergarie, nor nevir knawin as ane frie burgh broukand that name.”

In the “answeris for the parte of the commendator,” the objection thus pleaded is met as follows:—

“Answerand to the first pretendit exceptioun objectit aganis the first parte of the said summondis, touching the molestatioun done to the inhabitaris of the said burgh of the Cannogait be stopping of thame to use the privilegis qualifit in the saidis summondis, sayis that the first parte of the said first exceptioun foundit upoun the significatioun of Harbergary item the maner of ane grammatical disputatioun quibidder Harbergary be ane verb or ane nounne substantive, quihilk we reckon to be ane nounne substantive and sumtyme to be ane propir name in auld dayis of the boundis now callit the Cannogait; for we culd not find in latine sick ane word as Harbergary to be ane verb, and thairfore apperandlie the saidis boundis now callit the Cannogait wes abefoir callit Harbergary, and swa is reput and haldin be the anciant inhabitaris thairrof. Alwayis quibidder Harbergary be ane nowne or the name of ane toun or ane verb, that disputatioun makis na defence or exceptioun aganis the summondis as it is consavit, berand speciall that the boundis now callit the Cannogait wes the toun and boundis quihilk wes erectit in ane frie burgh at the tyme libellat, and that the inhabitaris of the boundis hes bene continwallie in possessioun of the preuilegis libellat during the space mentionat in the saidis summondis, and thairfor quibidder Harbergary be ane propir name of burgh than ane verb signifiand power to big ane burgh, yit in sa far as the samyn wes to be biggit within the boundis libellat now callit the Cannogait, and erectioun of the said burgh maid within the boundis libellat, as the saidis summondis beris, the titill productit is sufficient titill to persew the saidis summondis as it is consavit: and albeit the saidis boundis be now callit the Cannogait and swa hes bene past memor of man, nocht-theles it may sua be that the saidis boundis had bene callit Harbergary the tyme of the erectioun of the burgh libellat, as Edinburgh beis nocht all the very propir name quihilk it had at the tyme libellat, for be impositioun of men the names of boundis and landis are changit according to thair fantasie: and ferder quhair it is said all wes wildirnes, betwix the abbay of Halyrudhous and the burgh of Edinburgh, at the tyme of the making of the infetment libellat, trewlie we beleaf the contrar to be veritie, for thair wes na wildirnes but plenissit ground within the boundis foirsaidis.”

Such were the arguments advanced on both sides of the plea; which the reader will perceive rest mainly on the question whether herbergare is a proper name or a verb. It is not a Latin word, hence the dubiety. Lord Hailes, who did a great deal to correct or dissipate erroneous opinions, observes in his “Annals of Scotland,” (1153) “The true sense of the word [herbergare] is to be seen in a grant made by Malcolm IV. to the prior and monks of Coldingham. ‘Ut secundum voluntatem suam, adducant suos proprios homines abicunque maneat in terra sua, ad *herbergandum villam de Coldingham,’ i.e. “to inhabit or people.” Sir Walter Scott, in his “Provincial Antiquities,” article Holyrood House, in relating the incident which led to the foundation of the monastery, remarks—“In consequence of his [King David’s] escape from this imminent danger, the grateful monarch founded and richly endowed the church of the Holy Rood, granting to it, and to the canons regular of St Augustine, serving God therein, the privilege of erecting a borough betwix their church and the Nether-bow gate of the city, which is now called from thence the Canongate, but was formerly denominated the Herbergerie (or Hospitium) of the monastery.” Again, in the Report of the Burgh Commissioners for Edinburgh, the reporter, in noticing the charter to the abbot and convent of Holyrood, says, “the abbot of Holyrood was, by this charter, permitted to establish, for the accommodation of his kindly tenants, a burghal habitation [herbergare quoddam burgum] situate between the Abbey and the burgh of Edinburgh. In this permissive grant, which led to the erection of the burgh of Canongate, we have one of the earliest examples of those establishments, so well known afterwards as burghs of barony.” Dr Jamieson, in his Scottish Dictionary, explains the word herbery thus: “Sueo-Gothic haerberge is used in the sense signifying an inn, a lodging, a place where a multitude may be entertained; deduced by Ihre from haer, a crowd, and berga, to store, to nourish. But the word originally denoted a military station, as, indeed, it is used by Barbour; A. S. herberga, the abode of an army, a tent, a camp. Thence it came to signify a lodging of any kind; and particularly one appropriated for the reception of a multitude.”

The meaning of the Anglo-Saxon word herberg or herberga is thus well defined; and we see, from the charter quoted by Lord Hailes, that it also signified “to inhabit,” thereby changing its character of a substantive to a verb active. Still, granting this to be the signification of herbergare in the foundation charter of Holyrood, the passage would be far from admitting of a satisfactory translation. The words are plain in the original, “Concedo etiam ei” herbergare quoddam burgum inter eandem ecclesiam et meum burgum.” If we translate herbergare as a verb active, the passage would read thus—I grant also to the same [the canons of Holyrood] to inhabit or people, as a

* Ducauge, the greatest authority as to mediæval Latin, supplies several quotations which clearly indicate the sense. For example, in this passage from a deed in the chartulary of one of the churches of Rouen, of the twelfth century, Licet siquidem eadem Gilberto et heredibus suis hanc predictam terram et domum HERBERGARE de ligno et lapide, aut vendere, &c. So also in a charter of Poncius de Mont-launi in Baluze’s History of Auvergne, anno 1219—“Dicto Episcopo auciensi . . . licet firmare cast-rum suum de Charbonneriis, HERBERGARE et augmen-tare pro voluntate suo.” burgh, between the same church and my burgh [of Edinburgh]. Now this would be extremely vague in a charter, no boundaries being described on the south and north. Nor would it be improved were we to vary the translation thus:—"Also I permit them to erect a burgh between the said church and my burgh." If we regard herbergare as a noun, the passage is very different: I grant also to the same [the canons of Holyrood] the burgh Herbergare, between the same church and my burgh [of Edinburgh]. By this reading, the town or burgh, of Herbergare, as it then stood, constituted the boundaries. And it is not at all improbable that there was a hamlet or town where the Canongate now stands, in the twelfth century, when the charter of Holyrood was granted by David I. The rise of towns and villages in this country, we hold to be much more remote than is generally imagined. At the earliest dawn of written evidence we find the country studded with castles, towns, and communities. This is apparent from the very charter now under discussion. It shows that several places in the vicinity had the essentials of a community earlier than Edinburgh itself; as, for example, the mills of Liberton and Dene, and "my new mill of Edinburgh." Besides, the answer for the Commendator positively states that "the saidis boundis now callit the Cannogait was abefoir callit Harbargary, and swa is reput and haldin be the anciant inhabitaris thairof." And Sir Walter Scott, as already quoted, repeats that it "was formerly denominated the Herbergeire (or Hospitium) of the monastery." Now, if it is admitted that the Canongate was anciently known at any time by this name, how is it to be decided that it was not so before the foundation of Holyrood? Assuredly not by the charter of David I. Maitland may therefore, after all, be in the right.

* Expressing.

THE LEE PENNY.

BELONGING TO SIR NORMAN MACDONALD LOCKHART OF LEE AND CARNWATH.

OF the marvellous virtues of the Lee Penny every one has heard. If the legends respecting it have not originated the story of "The Talisman," in the "Tales of the Crusaders"—there can be little doubt that they have given rise to some of the most interesting incidents of that beautiful tale. The Lee

Penny is a stone of a dark red colour and triangular shape—in size about half an inch upon each side, set in a piece of silver coin, which, though much defaced, is supposed, from letters still remaining, to be a shilling of Edward I.—the cross being very plain on coins of his reign. This curious piece of antiquity is affirmed to have been in the Lee family since about 1323—a short time after the death of King Robert the Bruce. That monarch having ordered his heart to be conveyed to the Holy Land, it was carried there, it is said, by Simon Locurd of Lee, who about that time, borrowed a large sum of money from Sir William de Lindsay, Prior of Ayr, for which he granted a bond for an annuity of ten pounds of silver, during Sir William's lifetime, from his lands of Lee and Carnwath. The original bond, dated 1323, and witnessed by the principal nobility of the country, is still among the family papers. The sum, which was a great one in those days, is supposed to have been destined for that expedition; and it is said he changed his name to Lockheart; or Lockhart, from his having charge of the heart. For part of his arms, in consequence, he obtained a heart within a lock, with the motto—"Corda serata pando."

According to the tradition, Sir Simon made prisoner a Saracen chief, whose lady came to ransom him, and on counting out the money or jewels, the stone in question dropped from her purse. She hastily snatched it up—but Sir Simon observing her, insisted on obtaining it. The lady, rather than sacrifice her husband's liberty, gave it to him, telling him of its many virtues—its power to cure diseases, in man as well as bestial.

These virtues are brought into operation by dipping the stone in water given to the diseased to drink—washing, at the same time, the part affected, as in the case of hydrophobia. No words are used in dipping the stone, or money permitted to be taken by the servants at Lee. People used to come from all parts of Scotland, and many places in England, to carry away water in which the stone had been dipped, to give to their cattle—especially when ill of the murrain or blackleg.

A complaint was made to the ecclesiastical courts against the Laird of Lee, Sir James Lockhart, for using witchcraft, as appears by the following copy of their act. No year is mentioned, but from the orthography, and the name of the laird, the entry must belong to the seventeenth century:—

COPY OF AN ACT OF THE SYNOD AND ASSEMBLY.

"Apud Glasgow, the 25th October,
"Synod Sess. 2.

"Quhilke dye amongst the referries of the brethren of the ministrie of Lanerk, it was propounded to the Synode, that Gawen Hammiltoun of Raplock had preferrit an complaint before them against Sir James Lockart of Lie, anent the superstitious vsing of an stene set in selver for the curing of diseased cattell qlk. the said Gawen affirmit could not be lawfully vsed, and that they had differit to give any decisioune therein till the advice of the Assemblie might be had concerning the same. The Assemblie having enquired of the manner of vsing thereof, and particularie vnderstoode by examinatioune of the said Laird of Lie, & otherwise, that the custome is onlie to cast the stone in sume water, and give the diseasit cattil thereof to drink, & y^t the sam is done wtout vsing onie words such as charmers and sorcerers vse in their unlawfull practisess; and considering that in nature they are monie thinges seen to work strange effects q^of no humane witt can give a reason, it having pleasit God to give vnto stones and herbes special virtues for the healing of mony infirmities in man and beast,—advises the brethren to surcease thir proces, as qⁱn they perceiue no ground of offence; and admonishes the said Laird of Lie, in the using of the said stone to tak heed that it be vait hairafter wth the least scandal that possible maye be. Extract out of the books of the Assemblie helden at Glasgow and subscribed be thair Clerk, at their command. M. Robert Young, Clerk to the Assemblie at Glasgow."

When the plague was last at Newcastle, the inhabitants sent for the Lee Penny, giving a bond for a large sum, as a pledge for it; and they thought it did so much good, that they offered to pay the money and keep the "Talisman," but the owner would not part with it.

About a century and a half ago a remarkable cure is alleged to have been performed on Lady Baird of Saughton-hall, near Edinburgh, "who having been bit by a mad dog, was come the length of a hydrophobia; upon which, having sent to beg the Lee Penny might be sent to her house, she used it for some weeks, drinking and bathing in the water it had been dipped in, and was quite recovered."

Lee is also famed for its "Pea Tree," perhaps the oldest and largest oak in Scotland. It takes its sobriquet from its being the yearly custom to build at the top of the main trunk among its wide spreading branches a huge pease stack. The trunk has been for a long time much hollowed from decay: but its dimensions may be imagined when we mention that its interior is large enough to dine an ordinary party with comfort. Near it stands a stately larch, which was one of the first few seedling plants of that variety of the pine that the then Earl of Hyndford brought to Scotland in a flower-pot, on his return from the Embassy at St. Petersburg.

Lee itself is a beautiful retreat. It lies two or three miles below Lanark, in some low grounds not far from the Clyde, and is surrounded by many romantic wooded dells. In retired beauty it yields to none of the many highly picturesque residences that stud the rocky vales of the Upper Ward of the Clyde. E. A.

[No year is given in the above letter ; but it evidently refers to the expedition of the Earls of Lothian and Argyll against the Marquis of Huntly, who rose in arms in favour of the King in 1644. Argyll was appointed Commander-in-Chief. Huntly was obliged to fly—and Montrose, who also appeared in force, sought safety in the mountains. Subsequently, however, at the battle of Inverlochy, Montrose was the victor. "The Path of Droone" referred to in the letter, is in the parish of Dron, in the south-eastern part of Perthshire.]

HISTORY OF BRITISH PASTIMES.*

With the relaxations and pastimes of the ancient Britons we are unacquainted, but as their religion, like that of the early Greeks and Romans, was a savage superstition, delighting in human sacrifices, it may be inferred that their sports and games were of an equally ferocious character. However, there can be no doubt that in imitation of their Roman conquerors, they partially adopted paganism, and introduced many classical customs, sports, and holidays. And those had not entirely disappeared when the Saxon conquest effected a total change in the laws and Government of England, which, having driven the subdued Britons into their fastnesses, they may be said, in a great measure, to have repeopled. In addition to their natural love for hunting and other robust exercises, the Saxons appear to have inherited from their German ancestors an immoderate attachment to gaming, the only vice, unaccountable as the fact may be, which seems to exercise an equal influence over the most barbarous and the most civilized nations. After dice, chess and backgammon appear to have been the most favourite sedentary amusements of the Saxons and Danes,—amusements in which the inhabitants of London, as well as of the kingdom at large, extensively participated. At length, Christianity dawned upon the land, and with its thousand blessings mellorated the condition of the people. Even the feasts, processions, shows, spectacles, mysteries, moralities, mummeries, and all "the pride, pomp, and circumstance" of the Roman Catholic worship, exercised a beneficial influence in winning over, or attaching to religion, the illiterate masses amongst whom they were first instituted and practised. These were the precursors of better and brighter days. And then came the Norman Conquest, which occasioned two striking changes in the sports and pastimes that were prevalent at the close of the Saxon era, by restricting the privileges of the chase, and by establishing the game-laws. But, take it for all and all, the descent of William the Norman proved a blessing of no mean value to the country. "The transfusion of the rich Norman blood into our veins improved the breed. Additional physical strength, additional courage—physical or moral—the Normans could not give us; but by their introduction and spread of literature and the polite arts, they polished, refined, and heightened our national character, and made us what we are—made us better than they themselves had ever been. The intermixture of the two races produced an infinite improvement upon both."

Another remarkable change in our sports and pastimes, occasioned by the descent of the Normans, was the introduction of tournaments and jousts, with all the splendid and exciting observances of chivalry which, though they bore the visible impress of war, were decidedly of a civilizing character, and even ennobling in their general tendency. Under these influences, and those of female society, the mind began to be cultivated as well as the powers of the body; and the manners of those times experienced a sensible improvement by an infusion of incipient politeness and urbanity. Indeed, when such qualities are found to distinguish the upper classes, fashion, and an inherent love of imitation, will soon cause them to penetrate, more or less extensively, into those of a lower grade. Accordingly, the sons of citizens and yeomen, especially the young Londoners, affected to adopt, in all their sports and pastimes, the martial exercises and usages of chivalry. In this country the decline of chivalry may be dated from the conflict of the Roses, which had too much of the reality of war to leave much time for the exercise of its mockery. Henry VIII. proud of his physical strength and agility, and passionately fond of display, gave a new impetus—a temporary fashion—to military pastimes and athletic sports. According to Hall, his biographer, "even after his accession to the throne, he continued daily to amuse himself in archery, casting of the bar, wrestling, or dancing, and frequently in tilting, tourneying, fighting at the barriers with swords and battle-axes, and such like martial recreations." But these, we are told, "were not practised to the exclusion of intellectual pursuits; for he spent his leisure time in playing at the recorder's flute, and virginals, in setting of songs, singing, and making of ballads." But the amusements of the court and nobility, and subsequently of the people, gradually assumed a more subdued aspect. Thus we find, in the "Itinerary of Fynes Morison," published in 1617, the following notice of the sports and relaxations of Charles, Lord Mountjoy:—"He delighted in study, in gardens, in riding on a pad to take the air, in playing at shovelboard, at cards, and in reading of play-books for recreation, and especially in fishing and fishponds, seldom using any other exercises, and using these rightly as pastimes, only for a short and convenient time, and with great variety of change from one to the other." Something of a milkop, by-the-bye, his lordship certainly appears to have been; at all events, one not likely to have incurred the risk of strangulation for "setting the Thames on fire."

James the First's notions on these points were of a more manly stamp than might have been expected. In a set of "Rules" which he drew up, and addressed to his eldest son, Henry Prince of Wales, we find the following instructions respecting amusements:—

 "From this court I debarre all rough and violent exercises; as the foote-ball, meter for laming than making able the users thereof; 'as likewise such tumbling trickes as only serve for comedians and balladines to win their bread with; but the exercises that I would have you to use, although but moderately, not making a craft of them, are running, leaping, wrestling, fencing, dancing, and playing at the catch or tennise, archerie, pallemalle, and such like other fair and pleasant field games. And the honourablest and most recommendable games that yee can use on horseback, and especially such as may teach you to handle your arms thereon, such as the tilt, the ring, and low-riding for the handling of your sword. I cannot omit here the hunting, namely, with running boundes, which is the most honourable and noblest sort thereof; for it is a thievish sort of hunting to shoote with gunnes and bowes; and greyhound hunting is not so martial a game. As for hawkinge, I condemn it not, but I must praise it more sparingly, because it neither resembleth the wars so neere as hunting, and is more uncertain and subject to mischances; and, which is worst of all, is therethrough an extreme stirrer up of the passions. As for sitting or house pastimes, since they may at times supply the rooms which, being empty, would be potent to pernicious idleness, I will not, therefore, agree with the curiosity of some learned men of our age, in forbidding cards, dice, and such like games of hazard: when it is foul or stormy weather, then, I say, may yee lawfully play at the cardes or tables; for, as to dicing, I think it becometh best deboshed souldiers to play it on the heads of their drums, being only ruled by hazard, and subject to knavish cogging; and as for the chesse, I think it overfonde, because it is overwise and philosophicke folly." During and subsequently to the civil wars of the time of Charles the First, when the Puritans had gained the ascendancy, the sports and pleasures of all classes, especially the lower, were lamentably crushed. All the theatres and public gardens were closed; and a war of extermination was carried on against may-poles, wakes, fairs, organs, fiddles, dancing, Whitsun-ales, puppet-shows, &c. Under these proceedings the national mind received a saturnine stamp, which, notwithstanding the burst of licentiousness and demoralization that disgraced the return and reign of the heartless prodigate, Charles the Second, has to this day prevented it from recovering its natural and healthful tone.

THE LAIRD O' CHANGUE.

From "The Ballads and Songs of Ayrshire." Edinburgh: T. G. Stevenson.

There is a preacher in our chappell,
 And a' the live lang day teaches he:
 When the day is gane, and the night is come,
 There's ne'er ae word I mark but three—
 The first and second is—Faith and Conscience,
 The third—ne'er let a traitor free;
 But Johnnie—what faith and conscience was thine,
 When thou took awa my three kye frae me?

Border Minstrelsy.

In Changue ance dwalt a worthy man,
 And a buirdly carl was he;
 At kirk or market, far or near,
 His like ye might not see.

And Changue he was a right rich man,
 His flocks spread far and wide,
 For they cover't a' the hills o' Barr,
 And down by the Stinchar side.

Yet free was his honest heart o' pride,
 And kindly to a' the poor,
 And mony a benison blest his head
 As alms were gien at his door.

And Changue was a pious guidly man,
 For aft, at the day's decline,
 He raid to the Alti-kirk* to pay
 His devoirs at our Lady's shrine.

And aye as before the haly cross
 He kneel'd sae reverently,
 Auld father Grub, the parish monk,
 Looket on wi' a greedy e'e.

"What brings ye sae aften," says father Grub,
 "To bend the penitent knee,
 I fear ye hae done some evil deed
 You hae nae confess'd to me.

"And well ye ken that never a sin
 Ye may hope to be forgiven,
 Till confession be made, and penance done,
 And mass prevail with heaven."

"If feedin' an' cleeidin' the naked poor,"
 Says Changue, "be an evil deed,
 And thankin' heaven that gies the power,
 My weird will be ill to rede;

"But of nae ither ill, I ween,
 Need I confession give,
 Nor need they penance wha like me
 In pious duty live."

"Ye sin, ye sin," cries father Grub,
 "And an heretic near ye be,
 Ye squander your gear on the worthless poor,
 But it's little ye gie to me.

"Wha gies to the kirk, to our Lady lends,
 And lays up a haly store;
 But ten merks and acht pecks o' groats,
 You never have gien me more."

"Ten merks but an' acht pecks o' groats,
 Are a' that the kirk may claim,
 And weel are ye paid I wat," says Changue,
 "If aye ye get that same."

"Ye sin, ye sin," the monk replied,
 "And penance sair maun dree,
 Sae hearken your doom, ye heretic carl,
 The will o' heaven, frae me:

† "Alti-kirk"—so called from its elevated position amongst the hills of Carrick. Its ruins stand on the farm of Knockgirran, parish of Barr, by the side of the little romantic glen of Pinwhapple. When in its "pomp and pride of place" before the Reformation, it was, in all probability, a dependency of the neighbouring Abbey of Crossraguel.

* Crossraguel Abbey, now in ruins, is in the parish of Kirkoswald. It stands in a plain by the roadside, between the village of Kirkoswald and Maybole, and still presents an imposing and interesting appearance.

This Abbey was founded by Duncan, Earl of Carrick, according to some authorities, in 1144, and to others, in 1240. In 1561, the celebrated Abbot of Crossraguel, "Maister Quentin Kennedy" disputed for three days in Maybole with John Knox the Reformer.

Quentin Kennedy, according to Douglass and Crauford, died in 1564. His successor in office, Allan Stewart, was the well known victim roasted in the "Black Bout" at Dunure, by Gilbert, fourth Earl of Cassillis.

And the hour o' noon maun hear you knock
At the haly abbot's stile.

"And ye maun bring the evangels four Frae aff Saint Mary's shrine,
That I may teach you a' their store
Of truth and light divine.

"And ilka night, as the sun gaes down,
O'er Arran's ocean isle,
You'll meet me, at the Alti-kirk,
Whate'er the pain or toil."

Changue sought his hame, and lang ere noon
He stood at the abbot's door;
And fifty merks he had to tell
For the evangels four.

Then hame he came to father Grub,
And a weary man was he;
As roun' the Alti-kirk he crap,
Fu' low on his bended knee.

And ilka night, at the twilight hour,
He thither did repair,
To con his lesson to father Grub,
Wha nightly met him there.

But never a word, or letter, e'er
Could Changue or learn or spell;
For the beuks were written in French right fair,
By the friar o' Machry-Kill.*

But the monk aye read, and better than read,
An' storm'd and read again;
That Changue might learn his wrath to dread,
He grudg'd nor toil nor pain.

"Oh! was be on your beuks o' lair,"
At length says weary Changue,
"For I'll be dead, e'er I see the end,
Of this wearyfu' beuks and lang.

"I learn't to read when I was young,
Of nature's sacred lore;
But of flyting beuks, in a foreign tongue,
I never hae heard before!

"I ken the starns whilk tell the hours,
As blythely they look down,
And silently speak o' the haly powers
Wha rule and reign aboon.

"There's bless'd St Peter's staff o' strength,
And there's the starns seven,
And our Lady's wand an ell o' length,
Whilk metes our deeds in heaven.

"And there's the plough gangs roun' the north,
And tells the time o' night;
And the bonny north-pole that sparkles forth—
The guide of ilk wandering wight.

"And I ken twa moons in ither's arms
Bode aye o' wind and rain;
But weel do I like the braid hairst moon,
For she ripens and fills our grain.

"And there's the spunkie, witch and fay,
And the guid neighbours† dress'd in green:

* "At Machray-Kill, in the parish of Dailly, there was once a small church or chapel, probably dedicated to Saint Macarius," from whom the place derived its present name.

† There is a statute in the laws of Fairyland which expressly forbids the use of the term Fairy by mortal lips. In the north of Scotland, about twenty years ago,

And then there's the water kelpie sly,
For I ken them ilka ane.

"And have seen, on the sunny summer days,
On Craiganrarrie's hight,
The elves float past on the wee white cluds
Of the gossamer web sae light.

"I can read the corbie's eerie wail—
And the rin of the startit hare—
And the magpie's clamorous counsel tell,
But thir beuks I'll ne'er read mair."

"Weel even's ye like," says father Grub,
"But hearken to my decree:
A hunner merks ye down maun pay,
For the trouble you've gien to me,

Forbye threescore o' ewes and lambs
To our haly abbot send—
To pay for the shrivin' o' your sin,
And a mass that ye may mend."

"Odsooks! ye greedy monk," says Changue,
"I wonder'd you took sic pain;
But it was nae that my puir saul was wrang,
But the greed o' your heart for gain.

"A hunner merks ye sall never get,
And the abbot for me ye'll tell;
If a dinner of braxy please his pate,
He maun come for't himself."

"Swyth out o' my sight," says father Grub,
"With the foul thief ye ha'e been;
See, see he's whisperin' in your lug,
And glowrin' frae your e'en!

"You've been with that apostate Knox,
While preachin' at the Bar;*

this statute was strictly observed; and I recollect, in my boyish days, that while roaming over the green knowes and valleys in search of flowers, my youthful companions were perfectly acquainted with its provisions. The popular form of the statute ran thus—

"If ye ca's guid neighbours, guid neighbours we will be:
But if ye ca's fairies, we'll fare you o'er the sea."

And, in order to give weight to this mysterious announcement, it was always sagely added that they did, on one occasion, make good their threat. Having been detected using the misnomer, a person was actually fared o'er the sea: and what was still more terrible to youthful imagination to contemplate, the vessel in which he was conveyed was no other than an egg shell.

At the time and place I allude to, both old and young had as much faith in the existence of fairies as they had in their own. No man, for instance, would put clean straw in his shoes at night, because the fairies would then undoubtedly come and dance in them the whole night; nor would any spinster be so hardy as to leave the band on her wheel, because the fairies would then most assuredly come and spin till daybreak.

* The Bar Castle at Galston, Ayrshire, was one of Wishart's preaching stations in the year 1545 and of Knox in 1562. In that year, the name of John Lockhart of Bar appears as one of the seventy-eight "barons and gentlemen of Kyle, Cunninghame, and Carrick, professing the true evangel," who assembled at Ayr and subscribed a bond "to maintain and assist the preaching of the holy evangel, and the ministers of the same, against all persons, power, and authority, that will oppose the self to the doctrine proponed and by us received," &c.

It appears strange, in our day, that Changue should have been accused of being with Knox, when there is such a distance between the places mentioned; but it must be remembered that, in those days, when the light of truth was only beginning to break in upon the mind—

But soon I'll scatter your bonny flocks,
An' boil your bouk in tar!"

The monk has gathered the countryside
To the Alt-kirk by night;
And there he has cursed* the laird of Changue,
By bell, book, and candle light.

And cursed ilk ane soud wi' him speak,
Or wi' him soud buy or sell;
Or in his face soud dare to keek,
Or tread on the samin bill.

And he has hired a gipsy band,
That fen'd in Pinwhapple glen,
To spulye his sheep, and herry his land,
And vex him might and main.

Ane Riever Rab o' this band was chief,
And he was a desperate loon,
For he raised black mail o' mutton and beef
O'er a' the country roun'.

And fast by the side of Pinwhapple burn,
'Neath the Dow Craig's rugged steep,
O'erhung by the mountain ash and arn
His houf was houket deep.

And aye as the evening shadows crept,
Far up the woody glen,
On the green spy knowe a watch was kept,
To guard him and his men.

Now when the laird afield did gang,
Sic thuds he had to dree
Frae stanes and clods, wi' mony a bang
Yet fient ane could he see.

And round and round the house at night,
Sic awesome sounds were heard,
As if ilk corpse had risen in fright,
And left Kirkdamdie yard.

The bauldest in the earldom,
Were like to swarf wi' fear;
For they thought the "roarin' deil" was come,
To carry them to his lair.

Changue heard with awe the gathering host,
Yet whiles he'd bauldly say—
Were they men, instead of deils and ghosts,
He soon would end the fray.

For he had been a warrior brave—
Had led a stalwart band;
And fear'd nae danger in the field,
Nor strength of mortal hand.

At length he of the siege grew tired,
And vow'd to end the plight:
And wi' a draught o' Hollands fired
His courage for the fight.

Then down he taks his auld claymore,
Steel-bonnet, spear, and mail,
That aft had stood his stead before,
When many a mortal fall.

But, as in this dread fight of feinds
His harness was untried,
The four evangels, too, he finds,
Then out the hero hied.

Dark was the night, and round poor Changue
Loud rose a horrid yell;
And stanes upon his corslet rang,
And pelted him pell-mell!

"In name of the evangels four,
Ye ghaists and devils hear me:
I've sworn to gie your heads a clour,
If ye should daur to steer me.

"Ye maun be cowards, whan ye hap
By dykebacks, sheughs, and ditches;
But come to Craiganrarie's tap,
Be ye deils, ghaists, or witches.

"And if there's in ye ony bluid,
I rede ye hae a care o't;
Be't black, or white, or green, or red,
I vow I'll hae a share o't."

Then rose an eldrich hollow laugh,
Like echo from a cavern,
But nae ane spak, which mair than half
Set Changue's resolve a waverin'.

But grasping firm his Carrick spear,
He kiss'd the four evangels,
Then vow'd the deil he docht na fear,
Nor his maist gruesome angels!

Then up the brae he nimbly scour'd,
And now and then he rested,
And warily around him glower'd
Lest, unawares, molested.

On Craiganrarie's tap at last
His feet he firmly planted,
Within twa rings* he fenced him fast,
Then showed a front undaunted.

Whiles in the dark he glower'd aroun'—
Whiles to the left he glinted—
Whiles watch'd their rising through the grun',
Till patience maist he tint it.

At length a rustlin' din he hears
Behind and eke before him—
A closing ring of white appears,
Like ghaists wi' grave-claes o'er them.

Then, wi' a wild unearthly yell,
They closely gather'd near him;

enslaved peasantry, it was no uncommon matter for the people to travel ten, twenty, or even thirty miles, to hear a preacher of the true evangel.

* Rome has been more sparing in her maledictions than she was at the date of the circumstance mentioned in the text. The last instance on record is as late, however, as the year 1844, when Priest Walsh, in the glens of Antrim in Ireland, pronounced the greater excommunication against one of his congregation, because he had been caught reading the Bible in Irish to some of his ignorant neighbours. This victim of priestly tyranny was a miller, and the priest declared that "he would make his mill as dry as the road;" but the times are sadly altered. Priest Walsh was cited before a court of justice, and fined in £70 damages and costs.

* On the conical top of the green hill of Craiganrarie, where the indomitable Changue took up his position, are two foot-prints, which tradition asserts to be his, indented deeply in the surface, and around which, at about a sword's length from the centre, are the "two rings" or circles which he drew around him, also strongly marked in the sward. Neither on them, nor on the foot-prints, does the grass ever grow, although it thrives luxuriantly around the very edges of the mysterious markings.

In bygone times, when it was no uncommon thing to traffic in Satanic influence, it was the universal practice to draw a circle of protection around the person of the conjuror, before summoning his sable majesty to appear, round and round which he still kept running so long as he was visible to mortal eyes.

But, ere they wist, the foremost fell—
Changue mortally had spear'd him!

The trusty spear, an all or sae,
Gaed through his body gorin';
An' heels-o'er-head quick down the brae,
He row'd and tumbled roarin'.

Then Changue his twa-han'd falchion wheels—
Around the ring he kept them,
Till heads frae half a score o' deils
Sae manfully he swept them.

But one remain'd, a gruesome fiend,
And hot and hard he press'd him;
But though the utmost ring he gain'd,*
Changue soon and snoddy dressed him.

For closing fast, at arms-length,
Wi' steeket gauntlet Changue drew
Ae stroke wi' sic prodigious strength
The deil's harns frae the pan flew!

Thus Changue was master of the field,
Till dawn'd the morning light,
And then his wond'ring eyes beheld
A sad and woful sight:

There Riever Rab and a' his men
Lay reft o' heads and breath;
And the spear stuck fast in Father Grub,
Wha's eyes were seal'd in death!

The foregoing excellent ballad is by Mr Harrison, bookseller, Edinburgh, who lived for some years in Ayrshire. It was written in illustration of the tradition of the Laird of Changue's encounter with the enemy of mankind. It would seem that there were two Lairds of Changue distinguished for their personal prowess—the one at a much earlier period than the other. The circular appearances on the spot, where the alleged conflict took place, are by no means modern remains.

SKETCHES OF IRELAND SIXTY YEARS AGO.†

(From "The Critic.")

"SIXTY years ago," says the author, "we were an isolated and peculiar people, only settling down into the order of a peaceful community, after centuries of intestine commotion. Intercourse with our sister England was limited and unfrequent; few of our neighbours visited us, and we visited few of our neighbours." A voyage to Liverpool occupied ten days, and was a matter of boast to the adventurer.

The vast strides in the direction of improvement which Ireland has made during the interval, can only be appreciated by those who look back and review what was the actual state of society sixty years since. That is the object of the little volume before us, and a curious picture it presents of a condition that scarcely deserves the name of civilized.

Sixty years ago riots were of continual occurrence, and the most trivial causes provoked them. The College students were always prominent on such occasions, and the theatre was the favourite fighting-place. One of those here recorded shows the character of these

* Tradition affirms that the "great enemy" did break through the largest or outside ring, and a corresponding break in the circle is shown—but, before he could break the inner one, victory had declared for Changue!

COLLEGE RIOTS.

On the evening of the 19th of January 1746, a young man of the name of Kelly, a student of the University, entered the pit, much intoxicated, and climbing over the spikes of the orchestra got upon the stage, from whence he made his way to the green-room, and insulted some of the females there in the most gross and indecent manner. As the play could not proceed from his interruption, he was taken away, and civilly conducted back to the pit; here he seized a basket of oranges, and amused himself with pelting the performers. Mr Sheridan was then manager, and he was the particular object of his abuse and attack. He was suffered to retire with impunity, after interrupting the performance, and disturbing the whole house. Unsatisfied by this attack, he returned a few nights after, with fifty of his associates, gowmsmen and others. They rushed towards the stage, to which they made their way through the orchestra, and across the lights. Here they drew their swords, and then marched into the dressing-rooms, in search of Mr Sheridan, to sacrifice him to their resentment. Not finding him, they thrust the points of their weapons through chests and clothes-presses, and every place where a man might be concealed—and this they facetiously called feeding for him. He had fortunately escaped; but the party proceeded in a body to his house in Dorset Street, with the murderous determination of stabbing him, declaring with the conspirator in "Venice preserved," "each man might kill his share." For several nights they assembled at the theatre, exciting riots, and acting scenes of the same kind, till the patience of the manager and the public was exhausted. He then, with spirit and determination, proceeded legally against them. Such was the ascendancy of rank, and the terror those "bucks" inspired, that the general opinion was, "it was impossible any jury could find a gentleman guilty of an assault upon a player." "Then, sir," said Sheridan, "I hope you see one now." Kelly was found guilty of a violent assault, sentenced to pay a fine of five hundred pounds, and, to the surprise and dismay of all his gentlemen associates, sent to Newgate.

The streets of Dublin were without a police. Even at night there was no watch till 1723, when an Act required the parishes to appoint "honest men and good Protestants" to be night watches. Wild young men associated in clubs for purposes of violence, and were known by such names as "The Chalkers," the latter being a more brutal imitation of the former by the vulgar.

Duelling was a universal practice, and it prevailed more especially among the lawyers. A barrister required to be at least as ready at a pistol-shot as at a point of law.

Another Institution shows the state of society in Ireland sixty years since. Abduction of heiresses was a regular branch of business. Abduction clubs were formed among the young men, and gave rise to a law of the utmost severity. This is the account of

THE ABDUCTION CLUBS.

This association was "an abduction club," the members of which bound themselves by an oath to assist in carrying off such young women as were fixed upon by any members. They had emissaries and confederates in every house, who communicated information of particulars—the extent of the girl's fortune, the state and circumstance of the family, with details of their intentions and domestic arrangements and movements. When a girl was thus pointed out, the members drew lots, but more generally tossed up for her, and immediate measures were taken to secure her for the fortunate man by all the rest. No class of society was exempt from their visits, and opulent farmers, as well as the gentry, were subject to these engagements of the clubs, according to their rank in life. The persons who were most usually concerned in such clubs were a class of men abounding in Ireland, called "squireens." They were the younger sons or connexions of respectable families, having little or no patrimony of their own, but who scorned to demean themselves by any useful or profitable pursuit. They are described by Arthur Young, and other writers of the day, as distinguished in fairs and markets, races and amuses, by appearing in red waistcoats, lined with narrow lace or fur, tight leather breeches and top-boots, riding "a bit of blood," lent or given them from the stables of their opulent connections.

IRISH CONVIVIALITY SIXTY YEARS SINCE.

Fear to the kennel of his father's hounds was built a small lodge; to this was rolled a hog'shead of claret, a carcase of beef was hung up against the wall, a kind of ante-room was filled with straw, as a kennel for the company, when inclined to sleep, and all the windows were closed, to shut out the light of day. Here nine gentlemen, who excelled in various convivial qualities, were enclosed on a frosty St. Stephen's day, accompanied by two pipers and a fiddler, with two couple of hounds, to join in the chorus raised by the guests. Among the sports introduced was a cock-fight, in which twelve game cocks were thrown on the floor, who fought together till only one remained alive, who was declared the victor. Thus, for seven days, the party was shut in, till the cow was declared cut up, and the claret on the stoop, when the last gallon was mulled with spices, and drank in tumblers to their next merry meeting. The same writer describes a party given in an unfinished room, the walls of which were recently plastered, and the mortar soft. At ten on the following morning some friends entered to pay a visit, and they found the company fast asleep, in various positions, some on chairs, and some on the floor among empty bottles, broken plates and dishes, bones and fragments of meat floated in claret, with a kennel of dogs devouring them. On the floor lay the piper on his back, apparently dead, with the table-cloth thrown over him for a shroud, and six candles placed round him, burned down to the sockets. Two of the company had fallen asleep, with their heads close to the soft wall; the heat and light of the room, after eighteen hours' carousal, had caused the plaster to set and harden, so that the heads of the men were firmly incorporated with it. It was necessary, with considerable difficulty, to punch out the mass with an oyster-knife, giving much pain to the parties, by the loss of half their hair and a part of the scalp.

Executions were frequent, and were vastly more brutalising and disgusting exhibitions even than they were, and are still, in England. What a picture is this of

AN IRISH HANGMAN.

We may mention, in passing, that one circumstance which contributed to the strange contradiction exhibited at an Irish execution, turning that awful scene into an opportunity for merriment and jest, was the character and dress of the hangman. That functionary was generally disguised in a fantastic manner, very ill suited to the occasion. On his face he wore a grotesque mask, and on his back an enormous hump, in the whole resembling Punch in the puppet-show. The original design of this apparent levity was to protect the executioner by the disguise, and it was in some degree necessary. The use he made of the hump was curious. It was formed of a large wooden bowl-dish, laid between his shoulders, and covered with his clothes. When the criminal was turned off, and the "dusting of the scrag-boy" began, the hangman was assailed, not merely with shouts and curses, but often with showers of stones. To escape the latter he ducked down his head, and opposed his hump as a shield, from which the missiles rebounded with a force that showed how soon his skull would have been fractured if exposed to them. After some antics, the finisher of the law dived among the sheriff's attendants, and disappeared. This grotesque figure, surrounded by two or more human beings, struggling in the awful agonies of a violent and horrible death, was regarded by the mob as presenting a funny and jocular contrast. Many anecdotes are recorded of the levity of hangmen eminent in their day. The last and most notorious of the craft was "Tom Galvin." He is not very long dead, and in his old age was often visited at Kilmainham jail by persons who indulged a morbid curiosity to see him and the rope with which he had hanged most of his own nearest relations. One of his practical facetiae was to slip the rope slyly round a visitor's neck, and give it a sudden chuck, which would nearly cause the sensation of strangling. He was brutally unfeeling in the discharge of his horrid duty, and when a reprieve would come to some wretch whose hanging he anticipated, he would almost cry with disappointment at the loss of his fee, and say, "It is a hard thing to be taking the bread out of the mouth of an old man like me!" He was always impatient at any delay made by the convict. When the wretched Jemmy O'Brien was about to be executed, he exhibited the greatest terror, and lingered over his devotions, to protract his life thus for a few moments. Galvin's address to him is well known. He called out at the door, so as to be heard by all the by-standers, as well as the criminal, "Mr O'Brien, jewel, long life to you, make haste wid your prayers; de people is getting tired under the swing-swung."

We conclude with the melancholy story of

M'NAGHTAN AND MISS KNOX.

On the Derry side of the Foyle, and about two miles from the city, is Prehen, the seat of the Knoxes. It is highly wooded, and covers a considerable tract, descending to the river, and overhanging the broad expanse of water in this place, with its dark shade. The circumstance which marked its ancient owners with affliction is of such a character as to correspond with the gloom that pervades its aspect; and no traveller passes it without many reflections on the sad event which happened there. John M'Naghtan was a native of Derry. His father was an opulent merchant, who gave his son all the advantages of a most liberal education. He graduated in Trinity College, Dublin; but having inherited from his uncle a large estate, which precluded the necessity of engaging in any profession, he commenced a career of dissipation, then too common in Ireland. He married early, but his extravagance soon involved him in such distress that he was arrested by the sheriff, in his own parlour, for a considerable debt, in the presence of his pregnant wife. The shock was fatal. She was seized with premature labour, and both wife and child perished. Being a man of address and ability, he was appointed to a lucrative situation in the revenue, by the then Irish government, and in the course of his duty contracted an intimacy with the family of Mr Knox, of Prehen, whose daughter, a lovely and amiable girl, was entitled to a large fortune, independent of her father. To her M'Naghtan paid assiduous court, and as she was too young at the time to marry, he obtained a promise from her to become his bride in two years. When the circumstance was made known to her father, he interdicted it in the most decided manner, and forbade M'Naghtan's visits to his house. This was represented as so injurious to M'Naghtan's character, that the good-natured old man was persuaded again to permit his intimacy with his family, under the express stipulation that he should think no more of his daughter. One day the lovers found themselves alone, with no companion but a little boy, when M'Naghtan took from his pocket a prayer-book, and read himself the marriage ceremony, prevailing on Miss Knox to answer the responses—which she did, adding to each, “provided my father consent.” Of this ceremony M'Naghtan immediately availed himself; and, when he next met her at the house of a mutual friend, openly claimed her as his wife. Again he was forbidden the house by the indignant father. He then published an advertisement in all the newspapers, declaring the young lady was married to him. By a process, however, in the spiritual court, the pretended marriage was entirely set aside.

In the course of these proceedings, M'Naghtan wrote a threatening letter to one of the judges of the court of delegates, and, it was said, lay in wait to have him murdered when he came on circuit, but fortunately missed him in consequence of the judge's taking a different road. The result was, that M'Naghtan was obliged to fly to England. But here his whole mind was bent on obtaining possession of his wife: so at all hazards he returned, and lay concealed in the woods of Prehen. Warning of this circumstance had been communicated to her father, but he seemed to despise it. There was, however, a blacksmith, whose wife had nursed Miss Knox, and he, with the known attachment of such a connection in Ireland, always followed his foster-daughter, as her protector, whenever she ventured abroad. To detach his daughter from this unfortunate connection, Mr Knox resolved to leave the country, and introduce her to the society of the metropolis: and in the beginning of November 1761, prepared to set out for Dublin. M'Naghtan and a party of his friends having information of his intention, repaired to a cabin a little distance from the road, with a sack full of fire-arms. From hence one of the party was despatched to the house of an old woman who lived by the way-side, under the pretence of buying some yarn, to wait for the coming up of Mr Knox's carriage. When it did arrive, the woman pointed it out, named the travellers it contained, and described the position in which they sat. They were Mr Knox, his wife, his daughter, and a maid-servant. It was attended by but one servant, and the smith before mentioned. The scout immediately ran before, and communicated to M'Naghtan the information he had received. The carriage was instantly surrounded by him and three other men. M'Naghtan and one of his accomplices fired at the smith, whom they did not kill, but totally disabled. The blinds of the carriage were now close drawn, that the persons inside might not be recognised. M'Naghtan rode up to it, and either by accident or design discharged a heavily-loaded blunderbuss into it at random. A shriek was heard inside. The blind was let down, and Mr Knox discharged his pistol at the assassin. At the same moment another was fired from behind a stack of turf, by the servant who had concealed himself there. Both shots took effect in the body of M'Naghtan. He was, however, held on his horse by his associates, who rode off with him. The carriage was then examined. Miss Knox was found dead, weltering in her blood. On the first alarm, she had thrown her arm about her father's neck, to protect him, and so received the contents of the murderer's fire-arms. Five balls of the blunderbuss had entered her body, leaving the other three persons in the carriage with her unhurt and untouched by this random shot.

The country was soon alarmed, and a reward of five hundred pounds offered for the apprehension of the murderers. A company of light horse scoured the district, and amongst other places were led to search the house of a farmer named Wenslow. The family denied all knowledge of M'Naghtan, and the party were leaving the house when the corporal said to one of his companions, in the hearing of a countryman who was digging potatoes, that the discoverer would be entitled to a reward of three hundred pounds. The countryman immediately pointed to a hay-loft, and the corporal running up a ladder, burst open the door, and discovered M'Naghtan lying in the hay. Notwithstanding his miserably wounded state, he made a desperate resistance, but was ultimately taken and lodged in Lifford gaol. Some of his accomplices were arrested soon after. They were tried before a special commission at Lifford, and one of them was received as king's evidence. M'Naghtan was brought into court wrapped in a blanket, and laid on a table in the dock, not being able to support himself in any other position. Notwithstanding acute pain and exceeding debility, he defended himself with astonishing energy and acuteness. A singular trait of Irish feeling occurred in the course of the trial. One of his followers implicated in the outrage, named Dunlop, was a faithful and attached fellow, and his master evinced more anxiety to save his life than his own. As a means of doing so, he disclaimed all knowledge of his person: “Oh, master, dear,” said the poor fellow beside him in the dock, “is this the way you are going to disown me after all?”

On the day of execution, M'Naghtan was so weak as to be supported in the arms of attendants. He evinced the last testimony of regard for the unfortunate young lady he had murdered, of whom he was passionately fond, and whom he mourned as his wife. The cap which covered his face was bound with black; his jacket was trimmed with black, having black jet buttons, with large black buckles in his shoes. When lifted up the ladder, he exerted all his remaining strength to throw himself off, and with such force that the rope broke, and he fell gasping to the ground. As he was a man of daring enterprise and profuse bounty, he was highly popular, and the crowd made a lane for him to escape, and attempted to assist him. He declined their aid, and declared he would not live; he called to his follower, Dunlop, for the rope which was round his neck, the knot of which was slipped and placed round his own. Again he was assisted up the ladder, and collecting all his energies, he flung himself off and died without a struggle. His unfortunate but faithful follower stood by wringing his hands as he witnessed the sufferings of his dear master, and earnestly desired that his own execution might be hastened, that he might soon follow him and die by the same rope.

GLIMPSSES OF THE PAST.—PRODIGIES.

It is very interesting, when tracing the incidents of by-gone times, to step aside for a little from the beaten highway of history—from the details of kingly enterprise or courtly intrigue—from the record of “unsuccessful or successful war”—and to enter, as it were, the vale of private life; to consider what agitated the bosoms of undistinguished men, far removed from the immediate scenes of conflict, or what supplied the gossip of their lowly hearths while the “fate of nations,” as the phrase is, was being decided. Perhaps there are no writings which so much facilitate this digression into the by-ways of history as those private Memoirs or Diaries which our Literary Clubs have recently rescued from oblivion. For, while their writers relate with tolerable fidelity the principal incidents of their times, yet, not assuming the elevated platform of the general historian, they often descend to those minutiae of which we speak. Under the title of “Glimpses of the Past,” we shall occasionally draw a few illustrations from those sources.

Did an intestine war agitate our country at present, there is no doubt that its circumstances would occasionally form the theme of almost every conversation. But, in some remote district, were an awful phenomenon to appear in the sky; were, night after night, the heavens to be peopled with aerial visitants, and the hills to re-echo with sounds of unearthly warfare; was the very course of nature apparently reversed, and the sun to shoot up into the midnight sky—how would the occurrence of such wonders absorb the meaner topics! How insignificant would appear the rumours of warlike feats in distant parts of the earth, when here, before their very eyes, were the visible prodigies of Heaven! and how trivial would seem the petty dissensions of rival leaders in a state, when here it would seem as if the powers of heaven

These considerations may enable us to form some conception of the consternation into which some remote districts of Scotland were put, about the year 1644, by the appearances of the prodigies we are going to relate.

The haughty disregard, by the first Charles, of the wishes of a people, every day becoming more alive to a sense of their rights, had gone far to foment the great civil war. The Covenanters were in arms—Strafford arraigned—Laud confined in the tower—and, in the words of the Chronicler* we are about to quote, who was a staunch royalist, “Seauen yeires had this terrible distemper of the vnparalleled Couenant rulled, or rather ouer rulled this kingdome; and such new, and newer before practissed formes of the gouernement, that we might, with greiued heartes say, trewlie, In those dayes there was no king in Ieruell; but the rest of that sentence we could not fitly apply, for it was not euey one, but some of the pryme heades of the Couenant, that did whatsouer seemed good in there owne eyes. * * * *

Therefor, God, Who loueth euer to carie mercie along with His justice, would let them find how hatefull there inhumane dealling towards there brethren was in His eyes.

“His wraith, being kendled lyke a consumeing fyre, was fortold by diuers prodigies; there was strange motiones scene in the aer, as of armed men in battell raigned to feght. Upon the hill of Manderly, foure mylls from Banfe, tuo armies ware scene to approach the one against the other, then to joyne feght; the thundering of the shott and claisheing of armes mad such a fearefull noyes as the people round about hard; and this vision made such a reall show, as those that duelt in the tounes neirest about the hill caryed away there stuffe and ther best thinges to marishes and boges, and there buried them vnder bankes of earth.

“The sunne in diuerse partes was scene to shine with a fant beame, yelding a dime and shaddow light ewen in a cleare heaven, and sometyme did show like a deipe and large pound or leacke of blood.

“The beating of drumes and sounding of trumpets, with salutes of canones and muskeate, was ordinarily hard in many places, as semeing to foretell the lairge lose of blood that was sheed soone after. * * *

Att Ellen, in the countie of Buchan, the preacher of that toun, called Mr David Leich (as I am informed) being forced, for the discharge of a naturall bussines, to arise betuixt twelue and one at night, did see the sune to shine as if it had bene at midday, and, therefor, much astonished at so fearefull a prodigie, called vp his bedell to sie it also; and least the treuth heiropould not wine beleiff, he caused the same bedell to raise a number of neighbours from there bedes, all which did testifie the same when the preacher was questioned about it by the committie sitting at Aberdene.”

Another historian* relates, after describing the locality of the hill which "bears the name of Duneycht (or, to wrytte it truly, Dun Pictie):" "Upon the topp of this swelling hill (whiche is situate easterly and contigouse with the mountaines called the Hill of Faire, famouse for the defeate and slaughter of George Earle of Huntly, by James Earle of Murray, at Corrichy, hard by) there are to be seen old ruined walles and trenches, which the people, by a receaved traditione, affirme to haue been built at such tyme as the Picts wer maisters of Marre. Upon the topp of this said hill of Duneight, it was that, for the space of all the winter, almost evry night, drumms wer hearde beatne about four a clocke, the parade or reteering of the gwardes ther taptoos, their reveilles and marches distinctly. And eare witnesses, souldiours of credite, haue told me that, when the parade was beating, they could discern when the drumer walked towards, or when he turned about, as the fashion is for drummers, to walk too and again, upon the heade or front of a company drawne upp. At such tymes, also, they could distinguish the marches of severall nationes; and the first marches that wer heard ther was the Scottish marche; afterward the Irish marche was harde; then the English marche. But before thes noyses ceased, thes who had been trained up much of ther lyves abroad in the German warres, affirmed that they could perfectly, by their hearing, discern the marches upon the drumme, of severall forraigne nationes of Europe, such as Frensh, Dutch, Danes, etc."

These apparitions, however, were not always of a fearful cast. The historian we first quoted from narrates one which was coloured rather by the beauties and solemnities of devotion, than the terrors and parade of war, and the writer evidently rises in his style while relating it.

"At Rethine, in Buchan, (he says) there was, about the tyme of morneing prayer, for diuerse dayes together, hard in the church a quire of musicke, both of woces, organes, and other instrumentes, and with such a rauisheing sweetnes, that they were transported which, in numbers, resorted to heire it, with vnspeakable pleasure and neuer wried delight."

These aërial musicians, however, were determined to preserve a strict incognito, for, "The preacher on day being much takin with the harmonie, went, with diuerse of his parishoners, in to the church, to try if there eyes could beare witness to what there eares had hard; but they ware no sooner entered when, lo, the musicke ceased with a long not, or stroke of a violl de gambo; and the sound came from ane vpper loft where the people vsed to heare seruice, but they could sie nothing."

Although such enquiries might be both profitable and agreeable, we do not conceive it to be our province to examine into the philosophy of these prodigies, or to consider how far they were produced by the operation of natural causes; there is no doubt that they were considered as purely supernatural by the witnesses of them, and as such it is for us also, in the present instance, to regard them.

How must the rustic inhabitants in the neighbourhood of Banff have marvelled when those impalpable armies met amid "the thundering of shott and claisheing of armes," while the sun, perhaps, "did show lyke a deipe and large pound or leacke of blood!" What must have been the amazement of the people of Echt and Midmar to hear, for a whole winter, when evening began to close in, the "taptoos, reveilles, and marches" of regiments, when no soldier was to be seen in the old encampment! And who cannot imagine the awe of the humble hinds of Buchan while that heavenly music was ringing in their ears with "rauishing sweetness!" How completely, too, must their minds have been under the power of the preacher when, "much takin with the harmonie," he summoned them to enter the church, if, peradventure, they might discover those mysterious musicians; and when the music ceased with that

"—— winding bout
Of linked sweetness long drawn out," and he was alone with them in the solitary church,

"With its empty pews and its closed books
And its stonen men with awful looks,
Carven in niches, or lying in nooks;
And its pulpit with never a parson there;
And its clerk's desk with no one to mutter a prayer;
And its organ hushed, and no girls and boys
To lustily sing with heart and voice.
And all looking ghostly, and quaint, and odd,
In the hushed and desolate House of God."

It was a time when, according to the will or ability of the preacher, he might have wound up their souls to bliss or bale, and no doubt he improved it as his disposition prompted him; and no doubt, also, but such occurrences must have tended greatly to promote that prodigious sway which the clergy of old maintained—too often for selfish purposes—over the minds of the people.

By this time, however, the light was fast breaking in upon the public mind—yea, had already broken. Milton was bequeathing a legacy of sublime thoughts to all time coming by his poetry, and was attacking the very citadel of church abuse by his vigorous prose. Cromwell and his compatriots were fast dispelling that imagined halo of "divinity that doth hedge about a king." And, altogether, although soon to be subjected to a lamentable re-action, this was an age which did so much for the march of mind, and which, even at our remote period, is considered so interesting an epoch, that, instead of being surprised at those marvels which either accompanied or preceded it, the wonder might rather be, if

"No prodigy appeared in earth or air, Nor aught that might a strange event declare."

the nature of the cases brought before the authorities :

" 19 November 1561.

John Smith seems to have retaliated upon the aggressor in this instance pretty severely, and a counteraction was the consequence :

" The quhilk day Johnne Smyth is convict be the foirsaid assise for the crewall strykin of Johnne Gibsoun upoun the xiiij day of July last bipast foranent the baikhous of the bak land of the said Johnne Gibsoun with ane battovn wondand him thairwith in his heid and twa of his medmost fingeris of his left hand to the effusione of his blude in greit quantitie utherways nor he aucht upoun law For the quhill caus he is adjudgit in ane amerchiamment of courts siclik as he aucht to tyne upoun law amend to the party and to be punist for his fault and is acquite of the hurting of him upoun set purpose passione and forthocht fellownie and that gevin for dome."

Occasionally very trifling cases engaged the attention of the bench, as in the following :

" 23 October 1567.

The quhilk daye Thomas Craufuird being accusit be the baillies and counsall of the manassing and boisting of James burrell and david baillie The said Thomas confessit thatt he said to James Burrell sone being gangand withe the bell that heid it bene ane man that heid gane thairwithe he wald nocht haif bene content."

The punishment of the branks, or jouge, was a pretty common award :

" 31 October 1567.

The quhilk daye bessie Tailzefer being accusit be the baillies and counsall of the sclandering of thomas hunter baillie sayand that he heid in his hous an fals stoip and thane after tryall tane thairrof be James Graye baillie and James Selkrig officer fand the samyn nocht to be veritie and thairfoir

" 5th September 1588.

The quhilk day Thomas Russell baxter being accusit befor the bailleis and counsall for disobedience of James Eistounne baillye upoun the feird day of September instant efter that the said baillye himselfe and the officiaris of this burch in our Soverane Loird name and my Loird Justice Clerk had commandit the said Thomas to pas to waird for the cruell stryking and dinging of James Dik Wilkeyne Pott and James Martene Smyth burgessis of this burgh and diverse uthers with ane pistolet upoun thair heidis faces and schoulderis diverse bangis straikis to the effusione of thair blude in greit quantitie and thairby contemptand and disobeyand the saidis bailleis and officiaris efter that the said Thomas was commandit as said is at the stair fute of the tolbuith of the said burgh sayand the devill ane fute wad he gang to waird and thairefter being put up the stair quhill he come to the tolbuith dure and than declairit he wald gang na farder and beand commandit be the said baillye to pas up the stair and enter his persoun in waird for the offences he had committit in dinging of the foirsaidis persounes Refuisit sayand the said baillye leyit falselie As alswa dang and manassit Patrik Speir and Robert Craufuird officiaris in executioun of thair offices as in the dittay gevin in thairupoun at mair lenth is contentit Quhill being verefeit sufficientlie be famous witnessis The said Thomas Russell was convict of the foirsaidis offences and contentis of the said dittay and thairfoir was decernit in ane unlaw of ten pundis money and tinsell of his friedome and libertie and to be debarrit thairfra during the bailleis and counsall will and als was ordanit to sit doune on his kneis and ask God and the said baillye and officiaris forgervenes for the saidis offences."

When the authority of the ecclesiastical courts failed in compelling compliance, the civil power became subservient to the church :

"10th January 1568.

ROBROYSTONE—BETRAYAL OF WALLACE.

ROBROYSTONE, the scene of the betrayal of Sir William Wallace, is about four miles north-east of Glasgow. It is situated in a valley, in the parish of West-Calder, on the old road from Glasgow to Kirkintilloch. Tradition points out an elm tree as the spot where stood the barn in which Wallace and his faithful Keirlys slept on the fatal night of his capture. Some, however, are of opinion that the house still exists, and forms part of the modern mansion of Robroystone. It is a square building, with only a single apartment on each flat—one of which is called Wallace's room. The entrance to the upper apartment is by a narrow stair-case. It was in this room, possibly, that, in the words of Hamilton's Blind Harry modernized,

"—— The barb'rous byke

Surround the hero; but he, Sampson-like,
Got to his feet; finding no other tool,
Broke one rogue's back with a strong wooden stool;
And at a second blow, with little pains,
Beat out another footy rascal's brains."

In describing the place of Wallace's retreat, the same authority says—

" Rabreston it was near to the way-side,
And but one house where he used to bide."

The present mansion of Robroystone is two stories high, and of comparatively recent erection, if we except the square building already alluded to. There is a dial stone in the front wall, with "1679" upon it—probably the date of its erection. A more secluded retreat could not be found in the neighbourhood than "Glasgow Muir," as Blind Harry calls it. Even at this day, when every other road around this great city is thronged with travellers, solitude reigns there as undisturbed as when the hero of Scotland made it his hiding-place.

The circumstances of the betrayal of Wallace by "the fause Monteith" are minutely detailed by Blind Harry, and well known to every Scottish reader. He was attended only by his "faithful Keirly" and

"The young man that false Menteith had sent."

Who "faithful Keirly" was, however, is not so generally understood as it ought to be. His name was William Ker of Kersland, in Ayrshire. He shared in many of the most perilous adventures of Wallace, and was styled his steward by Blind Harry. Kerlie, or Keirlie, was slain in resisting the "vile barbarian crew" by whom Wallace and he were treacherously surrounded.

From "The Tragedy of Sir William Wallace," a "chap-book," as the cheap publications of a past age were denominated, we copy the following verses—not assuredly on account of their poetical merit, but as illustrative of the appetite which existed among the peasantry for every thing pertaining to the history of the patriot:—

"Now loud is heard the traitor's cry,
Wallace! thy time draws nigh!
Get up and come with us.—Ah why
Was not thy broad sword by?"

Then up did start the hero lord,
At the sound of danger near,
Says, boy, where is my good broad sword?
But boy nor sword was there!

Ah! cursed wretch! why did'st thou so
Bereave him of his brand?
Thou hast taken all away to go
And bring the traitor band!

Then up he took a piece of board,
'Twas the nearest weapon by,
An' he did strive to stave the sword,
To keep back the band did try.

Now out then spoke the traitor sleet,
The false traitor mean an' sly;
'Wallace! thy kinsman speaks to thee,
So lay all resistance by.

• • • • •

Besides, I now must let you know,
That you may fear no ill;
For Edward much desires to shew,
And his great mercy to fulfil.

King Edward much desires to view
A man of your great power,
Assure yourself you shall not rue,
For you'll find his bounty shower."

• • • • •

In prison lay he there till then
 When King Edward sends to know ;
 ' Why did you slay so many men ?
 Tell me why did you so ?

Acknowledge me your lawful king,
 An' of Scotlan' master too,
 Or I'll shew you a fearful thing,
 So make haste and shew you do.

Ask pardon for your many sins
 That you have done below ;
 The wicked here no favour wins,
 And that you soon shall know.'

Wallace did laugh at this brave speech—
 ' Go tell your king from me !
 I scorn his favour to beseech,
 An' despise the lowest treachery.

I scorn his mercy for to crave,
 For mercy he has none ;
 An' let him know I'll be no slave !
 My honour's not yet gone.

An' as for killing of your men,
 I own I've slain a few,
 But not so much as one to ten,
 I've wished to slay I vow !

* * *

O Scotlan' old ! then well may mourn !
 An' sigh an' weep thee dry !
 For where shew you your hero's urn ?
 Where does his ashes lie ?

Did he not toil and fight for thee ?
 An' wrought himself full sore ?
 In the saving of thy country,
 His blade for thee he wore.

Did he not stand against the foe ?
 Unsheathed the weapon bright ?
 But now he's gone and does lie low,
 As silent reigns the night.

But why should men expect to find
 The rose without the thorn !
 For know ! 'tis this that proves the mind ;
 Then forbear to be forlorn."

Lord Hailes, in his "Annals of Scotland" attempted to discredit the popular tradition that Wallace was betrayed by his friend Sir John Menteth. In a foot-note he says,—“Sir John Menteth was of high birth, a son of Walter Stewart Earl of Menteth. At this time, [1305] the important fortress of Dumbarton was committed to his charge by Edward. That he had ever any intercourse of friendship or familiarity with Wallace, I am yet to learn. So, indeed, is said by Blind Harry, whom every historian copies, yet whom no historian, but Sir Robert Sibbald, will venture to quote. It is most improbable, that Wallace should have put himself in the power of a man whom he knew to be in an office of distinguished trust under Edward ; but it is probable that Wallace may have been apprehended and committed to the castle of Dumbarton, where Menteth commanded ; the rest of the story may have arisen from common fame, credulity, the spirit of obloquy, and the love of the marvellous."

Dr Jamieson, author of the Scottish Dictionary,

in a note to "The Bruce and Wallace,"* thus discusses the point with Lord Hailes :—

"The account given of the treachery of Menteth is one of those points on which Sir D. Dalrymple shews his historical scepticism. He introduces it in language calculated to inspire doubt into the mind of the reader ; observing, that the popular tradition is, that his friend Sir John Menteth betrayed him to the English. Annals, I. 281. It is rather strange that he should express himself in this manner, at the very moment that he quotes the Scotichronicon on the margin ; as if this venerable record, when a modern should be disposed to adopt a theory irreconcilable with its testimony, were entitled to no higher regard than is due to 'popular tradition.' He adds—'Sir John Menteth was of high birth, a son of Walter Stewart Earl of Menteth.' I can perceive no force in this remark, unless it be meant to imply that there never has been an instance of a man of noble blood acting the part of a traitor. On the same ground we might quarrel with all the evidence given of the conspiracies formed against Robert Bruce ; and even call in question the murder of that amiable and accomplished prince, James I.

"But 'at this time,' we are told, 'the important fortress of Dumbarton was committed to his [Menteth's] charge by Edward.' Here, it would seem, the learned writer fights the poor minstrel with his own weapons. For I find no evidence of this fact in Fœdra, Hemingford, or the Decem Scriptores ; and Lord Hailes has referred to no authority ; so that there is reason to suspect, to use his own language, that he here 'copies' what 'is said by Blind Harry, whom no historian but Sir Robert Sibbald will venture to quote.' If Harry's narrative be received as authority, it is but justice to receive his testimony as he gives it. Now, in the preceding part of his work, he represents Menteth as holding the castle of Dumbarton at least with the consent of Wallace, while acknowledged as governor of Scotland. It would appear, indeed, that the whole district of the Lennox had been intrusted to him.

In the Seynhouse a quhill he maid repayr ;
 Schyr Ihon Menteth that tym was captane thar.

But even at this time there was something dubious in the conduct of Menteth. While he retained the castle, the English held the town under Edward.

In peess thai duelt, in trubyll that had beyn,
 And trewbut payit till Ingliss capdains keyn.
 Schir Ihon Menteth the castell had in hand :
 But sum men said, thar was a prewa band
 Till Sotheroun maid, be meny off that knyght,
 In thar supplé to be in all his mycht.

It is perfectly conceivable, that, although it was known to Wallace that Menteth had some secret understanding with the English, this artful man might persuade him that he only wished an opportunity of wreaking the national vengeance on them, or at least of more effectually serving the interest of Wallace when he saw the proper time. Although Wallace had been assured that Menteth had taken an oath of fealty to Edward, he would have had no more reason for distrusting him than for distrusting by far the greatest part of the nobility and landholders of Scotland, who, as they

* 4to. Edinburgh : Manners and Miller, &c., 1820.

"John de Menteth is designed by Arnold Blair immanis proditor; and the writer proceeds to curse him as if with bell, book, and candle. Sir David aims another blow at this account in the following words: 'That he had ever any intercourse of friendship or familiarity with Wallace, I have yet to learn.' But the truth is, the worthy judge does not seem to wish to learn this. It is difficult to say what evidence will satisfy him. The incidental hints, in the preceding part of the poem, in regard to Wallace's connection with Menteth, all perfectly agree with the mournful termination. Such confidence had he in him, according to the minstrel, that he not only resided in Dumbarton castle for two months, while Menteth had the charge of it, but gave orders for building 'a house of stone' there, apparently that he might enjoy his society.

Twa monethis still he duelt in Dumbertane;
A house he foundyt apon the rock off stayne;
Men left he thar till bygg it to the hycht.

"But independently of the testimony of Blind Harry, Bower expressly asserts the co-operation of Menteth with Wallace, Graham, and Scrymgeour, in the suppression of the rebellious men of Galloway: In hoc ipso anno [1298], viz. xxviii die mensis Augusti, dominus Wallas Scotiæ custos, cum Johanne Grhame, et Johanne de Menteith, militibus, necnon Alexandro Scrimzeour constabulario villæ de Dundee, et vexillario Scotiæ, cum quinquaginta militibus armatis, rebelles Gallovidienses pruerunt. These words, which seem to be a quotation in the Relationes of Blair from the Scotichronicon, are not found in the MSS. from which Goodall gave his edition. They appear to have formed the commencement of the xxii chapter of the eleventh book, one of the two chapters here said to be wanting. Now this, whether it be the language of Bower, or of Blair, could not have been borrowed from the minstrel, for the circumstance is overlooked by him. It seems to refer to that period of the history of Wallace, in which he is said to have made a circuit through Galloway and Carrick.

Fra Gamlis peth the land obeyt him haill
Till ur wattir, bath strenth, forest, and daill.
Aganyis him in Galloway hous was nayne.

"It is to be observed, that John Major expressly affirms the treachery of Menteth, as acting in concert with Aymer de Vallonis, Earl of Pembroke. He says that Menteth was considered as his most intimate friend;—ipsi Wallaceo putatus amicissimus. Now, although he rejects many of the transactions recited by Blind Harry, 'as false,' so far is he from insinuating the slightest hesitation as to this business, that he formally starts an objection as to the imprudence of Wallace in not being more careful of his person, and answers it by remarking, that 'no enemy is more dangerous than a domestic one.' He differs from the minstrel, in saying that Wallace was 'captured in the city of Glasgow.'

"It may be added, that Bower expressly asserts that Wallace, 'suspecting no evil, was fraudulently and treacherously seized at Glasgow by Lord John de Menteth.' Bower again refers to the treacherous conduct of Menteth towards Wallace when afterwards relating a similar plan which he had laid for taking King Robert Bruce prisoner, under pretence of delivering up to him the castle of Dumbarton, on condition of his receiving a hereditary right to the lieutenancy of the Lennox. These two chapters are not in all the MSS., but are found in those of Cupar, Perth, and Dunblane. Now, Bower was born A.D. 1385. The date assigned to the Scotichronicon, as published with his continuation, is 1447, and that to the minstrel's poem 1470. It is therefore impossible that Bower could have borrowed the account given of Menteth from Blind Harry. Bower was born, indeed, only eighty or eighty-one years after the fact referred to; and considering the elevation of the character of Wallace, and the great attachment of his countrymen even to this day, as well as the multitude of his enemies, it is totally inconceivable that a whole nation, learned and unlearned, should concur in imputing this crime to one man without the most valid reasons.

"Wyntown finished his Cronykil, A.D. 1418. He, it is generally believed, was born little more than fifty years after the butchery of our magnanimous patriot. Sir D. Dalrymple could not, we would suppose, reasonably object to his testimony. Let us hear it.

THE PECULIAR RELIGIOUS AND SUPERSTITIOUS OBSERVANCES OF THE HIGHLANDERS.

THE little interest which the more eminent class of literary men have hitherto taken in Gaelic literature (if we may with propriety so term the beautiful traditions and poetry orally preserved and composed in the Highlands,) has always struck us as singular, when compared with the avidity with which the public receive all works that treat of the religious observances and superstitions of mankind in general. The doubts in which M'Pherson involved the authenticity of Ossian's Poems, and the heavy controversy written, pro and con, on the subject, accounts, in some measure, for the discouragement Gaelic literature has met with from those who require undoubted evidence of all traditions and poetry introduced to their notice as belonging to the olden time; yet, it ought not to be forgotten or overlooked, that the same peculiar and secluded state of society, which gave rise to and aided in the preservation of the religious observances and superstitions of the Highlanders, and other people similarly situated, may have been equally potent in the preservation of their poetry and traditions.

Since the public taste, however, has an evident partiality for the perusal of sketches of the peculiar religious and superstitious observance of ignorant and secluded people, (and we have not been uninterested auditors of some of those of the Highlands in the olden time,) we shall devote this communication to one or two of them.

In doing so, we take the opportunity of observing, that we are persuaded the subject will be found more worthy the consideration of the philosophical inquirer than it has hitherto been deemed. For instance, we have no doubt that the class of superstitions denominated gisreagan in the Highlands and freits in the Lowlands, have been intended as a system for the correction of vicious and slovenly, and the encouragement of virtuous and tidy habits among an adult people, on the same principle that nursery maids check naughtiness and encourage goodness in children, by threatening them with the presence of "a great big black man," or promising them the favour of some benign fairy. We recollect one or two of these gisreagan at this moment, and could easily recal many other that have evidently been meant to inculcate forethought and cleanly and tidy habits; but we forbear such illustrations in the mean time, and revert to our object—that of laying before our readers a few of the (we think) peculiar religious and superstitious observances of the Highlanders.

Religion was invoked to aid and protect the Highlander in all his enterprises. For instance, when his ship was launched, she was consecrated by a formal and solemn blessing; and whenever he undertook a voyage, from one port to another, religion in like manner was invoked to bless and prosper the enterprise. We have a specimen of the former in the collection of Raonul Dubh, the son of the celebrated bard of Prince Charles; and of the latter in a Gaelic periodical, published in Glasgow some years ago, which fell to the ground for want of encouragement, (in consequence of the poverty and widely scattered position of the people for whose instruction and amusement it was intended,) not for want of zeal, genius and talent in the founder and contributors. It bears to have been extracted from a work, now out of print, and which is extremely interesting, not only because of the understood value of its contents, but also because it is the first Gaelic work ever printed in Scotland—Bishop Carswell, or Kerswell's Liturgy.* Our translation of the former is as literal as we could render it consistently with a due regard to the meaning of the author.

BEANNACHADH LUINGE,
From Ronald M'Donald's Collection.

May God bless the ship of Clanranald,
This day when she is launched on the sea,

* Any of our readers who can tell us where a copy of the above book can be obtained, will greatly oblige

Herself and her warlike crew,
Who excel in strength and in worth.
May the holy and benign Deity
Bless the elements and the breath of the skies,
Bear her sweepingly through the rough desert of the ocean,
And guide her to a safe and calm haven.
Father, who hast created the turbulent sea,
And the winds which rush from every art,
Bless our slim bark and our warriors,
And preserve herself and her crew entire.
Son of God, do thou bless our anchor,
Our sails, our implements and our helm,
Our masts and all they sustain,
And, by thy knowledge, bring us into the harbour.
Holy Spirit, do thou preside at our helm,
And guide us on the course that is right;
Thou knowest every bay under the sun,
And we throw ourselves wholly on thy inspiration.

THE MANNER OF BLESSING A SHIP WHEN THEY GO TO SEA.

From Kerswell's Liturgy.

The Steersman says—Let us bless our ship.

The answer by all the crew—God the Father bless her.

Steersman—Let us bless our ship.

Answer—Jesus Christ bless her.

Steersman—Let us bless our ship.

Answer—The Holy Ghost bless her.

Steersman—What do you fear since God the Father is with you?

Answer—We do not fear any thing.

Steersman—What do you fear since God the Son is with you?

Answer—We do not fear any thing.

Steersman—What are you afraid of since God the Holy Ghost is with you?

Answer—We do not fear any thing.

Steersman—God the Father Almighty, for the love of Jesus Christ his Son, by the comfort of the Holy Ghost, the One God, who miraculously brought the children of Israel through the Red Sea, and brought Jonas to land out of the belly of the whale, and the Apostle St Paul to safety out of the troubled raging sea, and from the violence of a tempestuous raging storm—deliver, sanctify, bless, and conduct us peaceably, calmly, and comfortably through the sea to our harbour, according to his divine will, which we beg: and let all unite, saying, "Our Father which art in heaven," &c.

Among a great many observances in honour of the sun, the deiseal may be mentioned in particular. The Highlanders went deiseal, or to the right about, at every meeting of importance. They went to the right, around the grave, with the funeral—to the right three times, around the consecrated well, before drinking—the company at a wedding went to the right, round the house, before entering—when the party sat in a circle, at a wedding or a funeral, the same rule was observed—when the boat was pushed from the shore, it was turned round to the right—when any one even sneezed, somebody behaved to say deiseal,—when an infant came to the world, the horedie circled it three times, right about, with the candle, &c., &c.

There were also a great many observances in reference to the moon. No Highlander would begin any serious undertaking in the waning of the moon, such as marrying, fitting, or going on a far journey from home. When the roth, rath, or circle of the moon, was full, then was the lucky time for beginning every serious or important matter. Hence the Gaelic word roth or rath, luck or fortune, as such a person is raihail or mirathail, i.e. lucky, or unlucky; or, in other words, the full moon arose or did not arise on his destiny.

The Highlanders were also very observant of the winds and the clouds, at all times, as well as at certain or stated periods, one of which is new-years' night. If the wind blows from the west on that night, it is considered extremely lucky, and foretells a season of abundance. The following rhymes are repeated, in reference to the winds:—

The south wind, heat and plenty,
The west wind, fish and milk.
The north wind, cold and storms,
The east wind, fruit on trees.

The Highlanders always wished the first three days of winter to be dark and cloudy. The following are the relative rhymes, but, as we are not certain that we exactly understand the meaning of the two last lines, we copy the original.

Dorcha, dorienta, dubh,
'Cheud trì laithean do'n gheamradh;
Ge e'bé bheir geil do'n spreidh,
Cha tugain fein gu samhradh.

Translation.

Gloomy, stormy, black,
The first three days of winter;
Let who will despair of the cattle,
I will not (do so) till summer.

The copy of the following charm is stated to have been received by the transcriber forty years previously, and appears to have been published verbatim. We have made some corrections of palpable errors, and of misarrangement of the lines (which should always be attended to by persons noting down rhymes or verses from oral recitation), but have taken no other liberty with the original, in our translation, excepting the pruning of exuberances, and the omission of repetitions.

SEUN.

For thy preservation and prosperity,
Be endowed with the charm with which
Bride encircled the daughter of Dordéal,
Mary (the virgin) encircled her son;
From thy feet to thy knee,
From thy knee to thy bosom,
From thy bosom to thine eye,
From thine eye to thine hair,
From the crown of thy head
To the sole of thy foot.
Be the sword of Michael on thy side,
The shield of Michael on thy arm,
The flag of Christ waving over thee,
The power of Christ overshadowing thee.
Thou belongest to God and his powers,
And thy enemy shall be vanquished.
Thou shalt go forth in the name of thy king,
And the people will follow thee.
Thou shalt not be struck from behind,
The point of the sword shall not pierce thee,
The sea shall not drown thee.
Thou shalt be the son of Eala* in battle.

* Can this be the Ella by whom Lodbrog was conquered?—TRANSLATOR.

Thou shalt run through five hundred.
Thou shalt stand in the midst of the slaughter.
The charm of God is around thee.
There is not between the heaven and the earth
(A being) Who will be victorious over the God of mercy.
Fear not, be bold and determined,
Thou shalt ascend to eminence.

THE CLAN CHATTAN.

CLUNY MACPHERSON NOT THE CHIEF.

It is true that on several occasions a claim to that title has been set up by various predecessors of Cluny, and it is still maintained by himself; all evidence, however, is against it. I might show this at great length, but that would scarcely suit the pages of a newspaper, and I will therefore quote briefly from a few authorities that I chance to have at hand.

William, seventh Laird of Macintosh, son of Angus, sixth Laird, and of Eva, heiress of Clan Chattan, was designated "Captain of Clan Chattan," in a charter of the lands of Glenluy and Locharkaig, granted by the Lord of the Isles in 1337; and confirmed in that title by a grant from King David (Bruce), dated at Scone, the last day of February, in the 29th year of his reign, 1359.

The thirty men of the Clan Chattan, who fought the same number of the Clan Kay on the Inch of Perth (1396) were commanded by Shaw Macintosh, cousin-german of Lachlan, 8th Laird, he having had only one son, Ferquhard, who, from physical causes, was unable to engage in the combat.

In 1411 the Chattan formed a large part of the army of Donald of the Isles, at the battle of Harlaw. It consisted of the Macintoshes, Macphersons, Shaws, Farquharsons, Macgillivrays, Macqueens, Macbeans, Macphalls, Clan-Duy (Davidsons), Clan Chlerrich (Clerks), &c., and was commanded by Malcolm, 10th Laird of Macintosh (vide Boethius). This Laird Malcolm was made Governor of the Castle of Inverness, by King James II., in 1429.

Duncan, 11th Laird, obtained a charter of the lands of Brnelochaber, in 1466, from John, Earl of Ross, chief of all the Macdonalds, in which he was designed, "Duncanus Macintosh, cansanguineus noster, capitanius de Clan Chattan." He afterwards received a charter of confirmation, and sashine was given (upon the said lands) by King James III., in 1476 (4th July); and he was therein designed, "Dilectus noster Duncanus Macintosh, capitanius de Clan Chattan."

William, 15th Laird, in a charter from Queen Mary, 19th July 1545, received the same title; and in a commission from George, Earl of Huntly, Lieutenant-General of the north of Scotland (as his deputy), dated "Inverness, the penult day of October 1544," he was denominated, "Captain of Clan Chattan."

King Charles II., in a letter to Lachlan, 17th Laird, dated Perth, December 24, 1650, addressed him as "our right-trusty and well-beloved the Laird of Macintosh and the gentlemen of his kin of Clan Chattan."

There are extant obligations of mutual friendship between the Macintoshes and the Earl of Huntly, the Earl of Argyll, the Earl of Atholl, the

Earl of Murray, Lord Forbes, Sir Donald Macdonald of Sleat, the Laird of Macleod, the Laird of Kilravock, the Laird of Foulis, and the Laird of Calder, in every one of which the Macintosh is designated, "Captain of Clan Chattan."

Lesly in his work, "De Gestis Scotorum," 9th book, has these words:—"Tribus Clanchattana, vulgo nuncupata Macintoshiana, Principe Mackintoshio," and in the 10th book he calls William Macintosh "Clan Chattanæ Tribus Ducem."

Hollingshed calls the same William, "Head and Chief of the Clan Chattan."

Sir George Mackenzie (Heraldry, page 67) styles him "Chief of the Clan Chattan."

In a bond, dated Feb. 28, 1396, granted by the Macphersons and others of the Clan Chattan, to the Laird of Macintosh, they acknowledge him to be "the principal Captain of the haill kin of Clan Chattan," and oblige themselves to concur with, maintain, and defend him against all who shall oppose him.

In another bond of the same nature, dated April 4, 1609, by the Macphersons and all the other branches of the Clan Chattan, they give the Macintosh the title of "Principal Captain of the haill kin of Clan Chattan, according to the King's gift of Chieftaincy of the whole Clan Chattan."

A third bond of a similar tenor, dated 19th of November 1655, is subscribed by Andrew Macpherson of Clunie, Lachlan Macpherson of Pitmean, John Macpherson of Innesie, and several others, and in it the Macintosh is recognised as "our Chief."

In a declaration by Sir Charles Areskine of Cambu, Lord Lyon (Nov. 10, 1672), the Macintosh is pronounced to be "the only undoubted Chief of Clan Chattan."

Lachlan, 17th Laird of Macintosh, received from Lachlan Macpherson of Clunie, "with the special advice and consent of his friends of the name of Macpherson," a bond in which Clunie, "for himself, his heirs, and successors, not only owned and acknowledged the Laird of Macintosh as his and their undoubted Chief, but disclaimed and utterly renounced whatever has been (at any time past) wrote, said, or done to the contrary."

I might multiply authorities to the same effect, but I take it that enough have already been cited. To show, however, the natural effect produced by this mass of evidence on the minds of competent judges of such matters in the Highlands, I will just subjoin half a dozen lines from Donald Gregory's "History of the Western Highlands and Isles of Scotland," published at Edinburgh in 1836. The author says (page 422)—"During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the Clan Chattan was a flourishing clan; and the present Alexander Macintosh, Captain and Chief of Clan Chattan, besides his estates in Badenoch, still possesses the lands in Lochaber, so long disputed between his ancestors and the Macdonalds of Keppoch. The Macphersons, or Clanvurich, having during the same period succeeded in establishing themselves as a separate clan from the Mackintoshes, although not without a struggle. At the head of the Clanvurich is the present Ewen Macpherson of Cluny, commonly called Cluny Macpherson, who styles himself also 'Chief of Clan Chattan.' It is, however, well known and easily proved that the title of Captain and Chief of Clan Chattan has been enjoyed by the family of Macintosh for at least four hundred years."

MILKY HOLLOW.

THE voyager by the Caledonian Canal, as he passes from Loch Ness to Loch Oich, may observe a line of road ascending the high hills on the left. Through the valleys at the foot of the farthest mountains it works by "sinuosities along," to preserve a line amidst innumerable knolls; but, from the bottom of the tallest mountain of the range, the road begins a tedious ascent, and for eight or ten miles together, it sweeps boldly on, scaling height after height, until it is lost over the shoulder of the hill, or veiled by the clouds that almost invariably hover round the top. The mountain is Corryarrick, separating the blue waters of Loch Laggan from Loch Oich; the road is the old military highway, formed with so much perseverance by General Wade. Until late years, this was the only road by which the district of Badenoch was accessible; in fact, it was the main highway from the north to the south, though a more difficult and dangerous road it is hardly possible to conceive. Now it is crossed only by a few drovers, and still fewer tourists. At best but a narrow track, crossing moors and marshes, and unfenced from the bog-holes that are ready to entrap the unwary traveller—like the pits in the bridge of Human Life (Vision of Mirza)—encroaching streams have added to the difficulties, sufficient before. Here, filling up the road for many yards, down the slope of the hill, rushes a mountain torrent, impetuous and strong: now, the accumulated waters rest in some hollow of the way, forming a loch over which there is a ferry-boat. As the road approaches the summit the air becomes cold: snow lies in the crevices; snow-posts, extending a long and irregular line, in winter mark the road, and in summer tell the perils of the winter passage. The prospect, at the same time, widens. Over the green slopes that were as walls to the valleys below, the glen of the Garry, Glen Quoich, Loch Quoich, the peaks of Kintail, the hills of Strathglass—all are opened up; but the grey cairns to the dead, put up at almost every hundred yards, where some poor heart became hushed, frozen in the "winter wild," invests the scene with an interest impressively affecting.

At the commencement of the last and long ascent, the road, by a sudden sweep round the elbow of a green hill, enters "Lagan Bhainne," or Milky Hollow. It is an oasis in the midst of a desert. A small branch of the Tarff finds its way down in the bottom of the glen; dwarf birches cast their fantastic shadows over its streams; aspens and mountain-ash admire themselves in its pools; and the hollows on its banks are green with thickets of hazel. Sheltered from the north winds, but open to the sun, in Lagan Bhainne all the delights of a sweet mountain valley congregate. The soft air is odorous; the moss is spotted red with cranberries; the bee flies heavy with honey; and the purple bloom of the heather feeds numerous coveys of grouse. In this teeming glen there is one solitary bothy. All the magnificence of the summer morning, noon's glory, and evening's dreamy gentleness, passes unseen and unfelt. The finch, returning from her long winter journey, finds her old nest undisturbed in the bushes. Here is no one to whisper love "when the kye come hame;" but it was not always so. When the hills were first profaned by the foot of the road-making soldier, the valley was a smiling natural temple, sacred to "meek-eyed peace." Its holms were dotted over with the rude dwellings of a rude but kindly people. The strath was cultivated, and yielded excellent corn, while the heights were the favourite pasturing-places of milk-giving cattle. The spindle, buzzing at the door; the shuttle clacking within; the churn sputtering in the cow-house; the noise of the quern, made use of at the river side by young and merry millers,—were so many voices speaking of comfort in a delightful solitude. But the secret of the prosperity of the inhabitants was the great plenty and richness of the milk which the herds fed in the valley yielded. There seemed to be a charm in the grass. However valueless the cow might be when fed on any other part of Corryarrick, within the bounds of Lagan Bhainne, it became a fine productive animal. Its bare ribs obtained a due covering of flesh; its skin a silky sleekness; and at the regular hours the flow of its milk would fill the dairy-maid's pails. For milk, and butter, and cheese, the valley was the Cuninghame of the surrounding country; the cottars thrived and were rich; and all this was obtained by the courage and readiness of a native of the glen, at a very early period. Long before Bruce was King, a famine of milk was felt all over Badenoch and Glengarry. The grass seemed luxuriant, but the cattle gave no return; milk, butter, and cheese were no longer to be had. Some potent spell was over the land: all the suspected evil-doers were watched and questioned; prayers and counter-charms were tried. All was in vain—the dugs of the kine remained sealed, there was no milk; and the good-wife left her spindle, and the good-man his corn-rig, to ponder over the misfortune, but without the desired result. Through summer, and autumn, and winter, and spring, this scarcity continued. At length it happened, one fine evening in June, when the sun was setting behind the dark hills of Moidart, and the last rays glanced upon the snowy cap of Corryarrick, that Allan 'a Skene trudged slowly down into the valley, musing, with a heavy heart, on the continued unproductiveness of his herds. He had got about half-way down the hill-side, when the playful voices of his children reached his ear, rising like music through the thin vapour; and he leaned against a solitary rowan, to survey his possessions dimly seen far down. Allan had stood in this meditating humour for a few minutes, when a solitary figure appeared, climbing slowly up from the valley towards him. At first he supposed it to be a herd-boy out on some late errand; but as the creature approached, Allan, surprised, saw that it was a strange old man, much less in stature than even Dugald na Snathad, the smallest bodach in the whole country side. He wore no bonnet, and his bare brown locks contrasted strangely with the time-worn aspect of his face; while Allan had never seen any thing at all like the fashion of the night-walker's habiliments. Over his shoulder the old fellow carried a long, slender twig, cut from a hawthorn, that bent as if it would break with the weight of some invisible burden, under which the bearer struggled with difficulty up the face of the hill, hauling his legs slowly and wearily after him, and drawing long breaths, as if fatigued with long travel. The wind came up the glen with a roaring sound, the rowan leaves trembled, and Allan felt his heart beat with mixed fear and curiosity as the stranger came nearer. But a new idea flashed upon him as the traveller passed within arm's length—out went the keen deer-knife, and, keeping his eye fixed, half in fear, on the stranger's face, he cut the wand by the middle. The little old man pursued his way, as before, in silence and sadness, apparently feeling no diminution of his load, until he disappeared over the hill; but as he vanished, a rushing sound came from the bleeding twig, like the up-boiling of a vigorous spring. Rich yellow milk flowed from it in a stream as it lay at Allan's feet—roared and rushed down into the valley—spread itself thinly over all the plain—filled the channel of the rivulet, that for hours together flowed with the golden current, till the whole of the milk which had been stolen from Badenoch and Glengarry had run from the old man's severed switch. Allan 'a Skene had broken the spell. The cattle over all the wide district gave their milk as before; but the valley on which the stolen fluid was out-poured, was thenceforward a favoured spot. Its grass was more nourishing, its kine more lacteal, than any other grass or kine in Badenoch or Glengarry. While inhabited, it was truly a land overflowing with milk; and now, that it is abandoned to the wild flowers and fruits of nature, it retains its distinguishing name, the "Milky Hollow."

J. C. P.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER, EARL OF STIRLING.*

WILLIAM ALEXANDER was born in New York, in 1726. His father, James Alexander, was a native of Scotland, who having served at an early age as an engineer officer in the army of the Pretender, in the rebellion of 1715, on its suppression took refuge in America. Through the interest of friends, he obtained employment, on his arrival, in the office of the secretary of the province, and devoted his leisure assiduously to the study of law. His mathematical acquirements soon obtained for him the appointment of surveyor-general of the provinces of New York and New Jersey. He was also admitted to the bar in New York, and, practising in the intervals of his duties as surveyor, according to Smith, the historian of the colony, "attained great eminence for his profound legal knowledge, sagacity, and penetration." In 1720,

* The life of William Alexander, Earl of Stirling, Major-General in the Army of the United States, during the Revolution, with selections from his Correspondence. By his grandson, William Alexander Duer, LL.D. Published for the New Jersey Historical Society, by Wiley and Putnam. New York, 1847. 8vo. pp. 272.

Governor Burnet appointed him a member of his council. According to the biographer,—"It was not merely as a lawyer, a politician, or a statesman, that Mr Alexander was distinguished, but also as a man of science. He was not only the principal author, with Dr Colden, of the memorable Report on the Indian Trade, in defence of the policy of Governor Burnet, but, together with Dr Franklin, Francis Hopkinson, and others, founded the American Philosophical Society. He maintained, moreover, a constant correspondence with Halley, the Astronomer Royal at Greenwich, and other learned mathematicians in different parts of Europe, upon subjects relating to their common pursuits." James Alexander died in 1756, leaving an ample fortune to his children.

William Alexander had received the best education the country at that time afforded, and had the advantage of private instruction from his father in the exact sciences. Early in life he had engaged in commercial pursuits, and subsequently joined the commissariat of the army. "The zeal, activity, and military spirit he displayed in the discharge of his duties, in the field as well as in the camp, attracted the notice of the commander-in-chief, General Shirley, whose staff he was eventually invited to join as aide-de-camp and private secretary. In this capacity he served during the greater part of the war, which, although not formally declared in Europe until 1756, had actually commenced on this continent some years before. It was thus that young Alexander had an early opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of military affairs, during three severe campaigns in which he served with General Shirley."

In an interval of his service with the army, the enlightened benevolence which marked his character exhibited itself in his uniting with five of his fellow-townsmen in laying the foundation, by a donation of "six-hundred pounds to purchase books for the people," of the admirable institution now known as the New York Society Library. About this period he married Sarah, the eldest daughter of Philip Livingston, proprietor of Livingston Manor.

General Shirley having been superseded in the military command in the colonies, Major Alexander accompanied him to England in the autumn of 1756, to aid in the settlement of his accounts, and to vindicate by his testimony the character of his commander. He was accordingly examined as a witness on his behalf at the bar of the House of Commons, in April 1757, and his evidence contributed materially to the justification of his friend and patron. The candour and intelligence of the young American in giving his testimony received the marked approbation of the House, and contributed with the interest of Shirley, and the letters he had brought with him from other military men of rank and family, to facilitate his introduction to some of the most eminent public characters in England; while his conciliatory manners, social accomplishments, general information, and enlightened views in regard to the mutual interests of the mother country and her colonies, recommended him strongly to their esteem and confidence. Among the friends distinguished by rank and station that he made at this period was the eloquent and ingenious Charles Townshend, the versatility of whose talents has obtained a permanent celebrity in the splendid eulogy and quaint metaphors of Edmund Burke.

James, the father of William Alexander, was known, at the time of his leaving Scotland, to be the presumptive heir to the title of the Earl of Stirling. On the death of that nobleman, in 1737, James Alexander was probably prevented from laying claim to the title by the circumstances under which he left his native country, being implicated in the rebellion of 1715.

His son, William Alexander, being free from reproach on this account, and having received from his father a considerable inheritance, which he had increased by marriage, so as to render his fortune sufficient for the support of a Scotch earldom, felt bound to make good his claim to a title which he considered rightly his own. Nor was Mr Alexander's object in procuring himself to be judicially recognised as the heir-male of the deceased Earl of Stirling limited to the attainment of the peerage alone. The estates of the last earl in Scotland had all been sequestered for the benefit of his creditors. But there remained large tracts of country in America, which had been granted to his ancestors, and which had escaped the sequestration, as well on account of their remoteness, as their inconsiderable value at that period. The progress of time, settlement, and the consequent development of resources, had now given to these tracts no trifling present, and immense prospective value, which their enumeration will suffice to show.

They consisted first of Nova Scotia, next of Long Island, and lastly of St Croix or Sagadahock, a territory comprising all the present State of Maine lying eastward of the Kennebec river. The last Earl of Stirling had conveyed his title to Long Island and St Croix to the Duke of York, in consideration of an annuity of £300, which is said never to have been in any part paid. The right of the Earl to make this conveyance was also questioned, by reason of his having refused to enter on the inheritance of his father, on account of the debts with which it was incumbered, chiefly in consequence of the expenses incurred by his father in colonizing his American estates; he had therefore abandoned it to sequestration. The American estates had eventually come to be administered by the Crown, which now enjoyed the quit-rents.

Under these circumstances, Mr Alexander was persuaded to hope, that if he could make good, as he had just reason to believe he should, his claim to the earldom of Stirling, the inheritance of the family estates in America might follow. This inheritance he offered to divide equitably with the descendants of the female branch of his family in England, who cordially assented to his proposition, and authorised him to proceed in their behalf. Having made his claims known to his friends in England as well as in this country, "it was," says his biographer, "from the encouragement of Mr Townshend, the Duke of Argyll, and the Earl of Bute, in addition to the persuasions of General Shirley, and of his friends Messrs Thomas and John Penn, the proprietors of Pennsylvania, and of Mr Morris, their governor of that province, that

Having obtained the highest legal opinions in favour of his claim, among others that Mr Wedderburne, afterwards Lord Chancellor and Baron Loughborough, he repaired to Edinburgh in the summer of 1757, and remained there a year, occupied, with the aid of eminent counsel, in collecting the testimony necessary to substantiate his title to the peerage, and in instituting the proper legal proceedings to establish it. These matters not having been accomplished without the law's usual delay, Mr Alexander returned to London to await the result, where it was at length communicated to him by his legal adviser in Edinburgh, in March, 1759, in a letter which thus concluded:—"We had a most creditable jury of the best gentlemen in town, who, with one voice, have found you nearest male heir to the last deceased Earl of Stirling."

It had appeared in evidence before the jury, that Mr Alexander was lineally descended from an uncle of the first Earl of Stirling, whose direct male line had failed on the death of his great-grandson in 1738. Under the Scottish laws, a patent of nobility, not confined to heirs male in the direct line, went to the nearest collateral branch. This was not the case in England; but as the claim was to a Scottish peerage, which carried no right, except by election, to a seat in the House of Lords, Mr Alexander's counsel were of opinion that his title to the peerage resulted from his having established his claim to be considered the nearest heir-male.

Subsequently to the finding of the jury in his favour, Mr Alexander was addressed by his title of Earl of Stirling, which he continued ever after to use and to receive in his correspondence with the ministers of the crown and other officers of state. His able legal adviser in Scotland was of opinion that, having gone through all the forms which the Scottish laws required to put him in possession of his title, he should now assume it and rest satisfied, until objections should be made at an election of Scottish peers to represent the body in the Imperial Parliament. This opinion coincided with his own. But the Duke of Newcastle, then prime minister, and others of his friends in England, urged him to petition the House of Lords to acknowledge his claim to the peerage, as the most respectful course towards that body, and most likely therefore to conciliate its favour. This he accordingly did.

Whilst the matter was still pending, with several other contested peerages, before that body, the death of his mother in New York made it necessary for him to return home. He accordingly sailed from Portsmouth in the Alcide man-of-war, on the 28th July. This ship had to convoy a fleet of merchant-vessels for the West Indies, as well as for North America. The circuitous voyage which this involved, as well as the dull sailing of some of the vessels, and their general dilatoriness and disobedience of signals, so prolonged the passage, that the Alcide did not arrive at New York until the 21st of October, after a passage of eighty-five days. Soon after his arrival, he wrote to Lord Bute, congratulating him on the recent fall of Martinico, and expressing the opinion that the force which had accomplished this conquest might advantageously be employed in the reduction of Havana, whose great importance in the hands of England he strongly enforced, especially as a means of subsequently conquering Louisiana. He suggested, moreover, that "if the troops already in the West Indies were insufficient, they might be reinforced by eight or nine good battalions from New York." Havana was, indeed, soon after taken, the expedition having sailed from England soon after Stirling's letter reached Lord Bute. It reinforced itself with the troops which had reduced Martinico, and was further aided in the siege, at a moment when failure seemed inevitable, by the timely arrival of a strong reinforcement from New York.

Stirling had intended returning in the following winter to England, to aid the favourable issue of his petition to the House of Lords. But his passage to New York had been so unexpectedly prolonged as to render this course incompatible with the necessary attention to his domestic affairs. His petition, which could only be entertained after several antecedent ones of a similar nature, were disposed of, probably languished for the want of his personal attendance. He wrote to Lord Bute, explaining the circumstances which rendered his immediate return to England impossible, and asking the favour of his "protection and interest, so far as to obtain that justice which every one in like circumstances has enjoyed."

A change of ministry soon after followed, bringing in the Tories, and dispossessing the Whigs, who were personally and politically Stirling's friends. The fall of Bute was especially unfortunate. Prime minister at the time, a Scotchman himself, and according to popular reproach the favourer of his countrymen, his great influence with the king, whose tutor he had been, and by whom he was greatly beloved, could not but have enabled him to give effect to his friendship to Stirling, by procuring a favourable issue to his claim. With the change of ministry that followed, it was doomed to languish and die. The last that was heard of it was its being postponed for consideration to a succeeding session of Parliament. Another claimant of the peerage subsequently arose, in the person of Alexander Humphreys, who claimed as descended from a daughter of the last earl, and produced a patent, extending the entail to heirs-female. But on the production of this document, he was indicted for forgery, and the patent, with other papers on which he relied to prove his title, was found to be spurious; and in a subsequent suit, so late as 1833, after the heir-male of Lord Stirling had failed, it was judicially decided that Humphreys was not the lawful heir to the earldom.

Turning his attention to what was attainable, and of more immediate interest, Stirling now devoted himself with renewed zeal to the concerns of his native country. He became surveyor-general of New Jersey, which office had been held by his father, and busied himself in collecting materials for a new map of North America, having detected many inaccuracies in the maps already published. He announced to Lord Bute his attention to make a journey of exploration around all the great lakes in furtherance of this project, and also to measure a degree of latitude on the Hudson, for which he was then making preparation. An evidence of his scientific pursuits at this period is preserved in the library of the New York Historical Society, in a manuscript account of an observation made by him of the transit of Venus, for the purpose of verifying the longitude of New York. He was at this time one of the Governors of King's, now Columbia, College, in his native city, which was languishing for want of means to render it as useful as its friends desired. The governors determined to send an agent to England, to solicit aid from the benevolent patrons of education in that country. Dr James Jay, a brother of John Jay, was selected for that purpose, and bore from Stirling urgent letters to Lord Romney, Lord Buta, and other influential friends, in furtherance of his mission.*

On the return of Stirling to America, he had resumed his residence in New York. Soon after, he commenced building at Baskenridge in New Jersey, on an extensive estate which he possessed there, his father having been one of the proprietaries of East Jersey. On the completion of his house, he made it his summer residence, and eventually his permanent abode. Soon after his removal to New Jersey, he was chosen a member of the governor's council, and continued to hold the office without interruption until the period of the Revolution. In the political duties thus devolved upon him, in those of his station of surveyor-general, and in others which he appears to have assumed with the higher object of adding to what was then known of the geography of the country, for which purpose he had the aid of detachments from the king's troops in New York, his time was usefully employed; and any leisure that remained must have been occupied by the exertions required of him as a large landed proprietor, solicitous at once to raise the value of his estates and to promote the prosperity of his tenants, by the exercise of an extensive hospitality, and by the correspondence which he continued to maintain at home and abroad.—From the North American Review.

THE CASTLES OF BRAWL AND DIRLET.

PARISH OF HALKIRK, CAITHNESS-SHIRE.

[From Sir John Sinclair's Statistical Account of Scotland, reprinted in No. 11 of "The Caithness Chronicle," a small and neatly got up newspaper. Price 3d.]

BRAWL is truly a beautiful and princely place, and may with great propriety be called the Paradise of Caithness. Indeed, it would make a figure in any northern county, were it duly improved, for which it is a most excellent subject in this corner of the world. Though very little improvements have been made upon it, in comparison of what it deserves, yet of old it was a capital seat of the Harolds, Earls of Caithness. The fabric, which is called the Castle or Tower of Brawl, stands on an eminence, at a small distance from the river of Thurso. It is completely square, of a very large area, wonderfully thick in the walls, which are partly built with clay, partly with clay and mortar mixed, and in some parts with mortar altogether. The stairs and conveyances to the several stories are through the heart of the walls. These stories were all of them floored and vaulted with stones prodigiously large, as are indeed most of the stones of the whole fabric. A great part of it still remains, is as plumb and firm as ever, and seems, from its structure, to have been very high and stately; and what is strange, the highest stones seem to be larger than those below. It surely cost immense labour to get some of them up to such a height, especially in those days, when it is to be supposed, they had no proper machinery for the purpose. The plummet and rule were surely well applied in the progress of the work, but there is not the least impression of block or chissel, which shows the great antiquity of it. It was manifestly a place of strength, as well as of habitation. A deep, large, well contrived ditch secures it on the north; and we have reason to believe, that it was continued down to the river, which secures it on that quarter. It has the appearance of being fortified also with other outworks, such as walls, moats, &c., which have been all demolished, when the gardens about it were first planned or enlarged. It is not known by whom, or when it was built, though it is the current report, that it was built and inhabited by the Harolds, who came over here from Denmark, but more immediately from Orkney, where they bore a princely sway, as well as here. But very ancient as this fabric certainly is, there is the remains of another very near it, to the south, that seems to excel it far in antiquity, and to have been not inferior to it in strength. Nothing of it remains, but a huge unshapely cairn of stones, which yet indicate it to have been once a very large and strong fastness. We suspect that below it are subterraneous vaults and communications to other works, necessary for defence and security in those days of violence and constant invasion.

* Columbia College, thus fostered in its infancy by Stirling, has since become one of the most flourishing and efficient institutions, as far as its course of instruction extends, in this or in any country. For many years, and until the shattered state of his health occasioned his retirement, it was presided over with the greatest ability and entire success by the grandson of its early benefactor, to whom we are indebted for this volume. The discipline of Columbia College, which, from the independent character of our youth, is ever the chief difficulty in our institutions of learning, was perfect under the presidency of Mr Duer, whose dignified yet courteous bearing, and happy union of suavity and force, always restrained even the approach of insubordination.

But the beauty of the whole are the remains of a much more modern building, which was extremely well begun, but never finished. It stands close to the bank of the river, below the fabrics above mentioned. The design is certainly grand and magnificent, and worthy of its princely site; and had it been finished, it would, in all appearance, have been one of the finest, and most stately, and commodious edifices in the north, according to the style of those times. The work was carried on a few feet above the vaults, which were completely finished, and are indications of the greatness, majesty, and elegance of what was to be above them. There, unluckily, the building was stopped, and never was resumed or attempted afterwards, though what was done already was a very great temptation to it.

Though there was abundance of stones ready at hand, excellently calculated for building on any plan, yet to suit the grandeur and elegance of the design, vast numbers of large freestone were brought from the shore, at the distance of eight miles. This carriage was attended with great labour and expense, and occasioned the death of several men and horses; and this is very credible, because at that time there were no roads; and if there were, yet there were no carts then in use, but the tenants behoved to carry them in loads on the backs of horses. In short, all things put together speedily effected a total miscarriage of the undertaking, and the failure of funds, and left this piece of work as a standing monument of the undertaker's great spirit, but of his great folly also. It was begun by John Sinclair, one of the Earls of Caithness, distinguished by the mock appellation of John the Waster, but in what year is not known.

The next piece of antiquity worthy of notice is Dirlet Castle. It stands in a very beautiful, romantic place in the Highlands, called Dirlet, on a round high rock, very steep, almost perpendicular on all sides. The rock and castle hang over a very deep dark pool, in the river Thurso, which runs close by its side. On each side of the river and the castle, and very near them, are two other rocks much higher, looking down over the castle, with a stately and lowering majesty, and fencing it on these sides. By appearance, as well as by accounts, it was a place of strength in the days of rapine and plunder. For further security it had the river on one hand, and a ditch on the other, through which the water was conveyed, with a draw-bridge. The last inhabitant was a descendant of the noble family of Sutherland. He was called in Erse the Ruder Derg, that is, the Red Knight. Having been denounced a rebel for his oppressive and violent practices, he was apprehended by Mackay of Farr, his own uncle, and died on his way to Edinburgh, some say to Stirling, to be tried for his life. Mackay took possession of his estate, which consisted of the lands called the Tenpenny-land of Braygald, a very fine and lucrative estate, and his successors enjoyed it for a considerable time. Whether Mackay got these lands as a reward for his loyalty, and the services he did his king and country by this action, or by what other means, we cannot say. Neither can we say at what period of time this Ruder Derg lived. His name and title, by all accounts, was Sir William Sutherland of Braygald, that is, of the Height of Caithness. This estate has been for many years in the possession of the family of Ulbster, who acquired it from the Mac-kays.

"HARRIE THE SOWIE."

From "Tales of the Century," by John Bobieski and Charles Edward Stuart.
Edinburgh: James Marshall.

"HARRIE the Sowie" is a game played by boys in Scotland, and is a sort of shinty, or as it is called in England "Hockie," in Ireland "Commons." There is, however, considerable difference. In the latter, a "hail," or winning goal, is possessed by each party, which endeavours to drive the ball through its own hail, and prevent it reaching that of the opponents. But in the former there is but one, and the struggle consists in the contest of each party to obtain the honour of the hail, or driving the "sowe," which is generally a piece of bone, into the goal. In shinty, the hails are gates marked by posts or any upright object, and are placed opposite to each other, at the distance of about two hundred yards, and the parties stand opposed between them; but in Harrie the Sowie they stand in a circle, and the hail is a hole in the centre of the arena.

It may be doubted whether—varying only by a very trifling aspiration—the name should not be "farra," or "farrow-the-sowie," in allusion to the ancient military engine, called a sow, and the ordinary jest of a besieged garrison, when they dislodged its inmates, that "the sow had farrowed her pigs." In the days when the military engine was familiar, this etymology might have arisen from a jocular comparison between the struggle to hail and prevent hailing the game sow, and the contest to advance and prevent the advancement of the military sow to the beleaguered wall.

Whether or not this analogy existed—since we have named the engine, for the sake of those who are not familiar with its nature—it may not be impertinent to remark, that it was a wooden shed upon small block wheels, closed at the head, top, and sides, by very strong planks, and used to protect the engineers employed in breaking the foot of a wall. It was one of that herd of wooden animals which, from their names, were called in Scotland "Bestial," and of which the principal were the "War-wolf," the "Ram," the "Sow," the "Tortoise," and the "Cat." A graphic account of the contest, for and against the advance of the sow to its attack, is given by the venerable and poetical Barbour:—

* * * * *

"Then they without, in great array,
Pressed their sow towards the wall,
And they within soon caused call;
The engineer that taken was,
And great menace to him mais,*
And swore that he should die, but he Proved on the sow such subtilty
That he should crush her ilk dele,
And he that has perceived wele
That the deed was well near him till,
But if he might fulfil their will,
Thought that he, at his might would do.
Bended in haste then was scho,
That to the sow was even set
In haste he caused draw the clecket,†
And smartly let fly out the stone;
Even o'er the sow the stone is gone
And behind it a little way
It fell and then they cried, "hey!"
That were in her—"Forth to the wall!"
For dreadless it is ours all!"
The ginmer then actively Caused bend the gin in full great hy,
And the stone smartly let fly out;
It flew out wizzing with a rout,
And fell right even before the sow;
Their hearts then began to grow,
But yet then with their mights all,
They pressed the sow towards the wall,
And has her set there-to gently.
The ginmer then cause bend in hy

* Make.

† The check or trigger of the engine.

The gin, and slapped out the stone
 That even towards the sky is gone
 And with great weight then dashed down,
 Right by the wall in a randown,
 And hit the sow in such manner
 That it that was the most sure,
 And strongest for to stand a stroke,
 In sunder with that crash broke;
 The men ran out in full great hy,
 And on the walls they made cry,
 That their 'sow was farrowed' there!"

We have modernized the orthography and some of the words of the above passage, for the facility of those unfamiliar with the old Scots.

A TAILOR'S LETTER OF TWO HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

From the Arbroath Guide of 2d Oct. 1847.

We have now in our possession a veritable curiosity belonging to the olden time—no less, in fact, than the original letter of an Edinburgh tailor, written on the 17th September, Anno Domini 1647, and addressed to the then Earl of Airlie. This rare and curious document was recently discovered in Cortachy Castle, the seat of the present noble Earl, and has been by his Lordship liberally presented, through James Rait, Esq. of Anniston, to the Arbroath Museum. The letter is written in the bold quaint handwriting of that time, and is in every respect creditable to the tailor, who appears to have been no despicable calligraphist. What in an especial manner enhances the value of this ancient epistle, is the circumstance of its containing some samples of broad cloths of the year 1647, for which it would appear the Earl of Airlie had written Mr Morphie. There are five samples of cloth all in perfect preservation: indeed, just as if they had come from the calenderer's press, and all looking like stuffs that would wear for two hundred years to come. The letter bears the distinct impress of the tailor's seal—viz. a thimble. The following is an exact copy of the letter referred to:—

Rightt

Honorable Lord I reseuid your Lordships letter and have tryid for ye neirest suchis of clothe I could find conforme to ye orders reseuid and hes enclosid yaimie in yis letter withe ye pryces wretine be yaimie. Nott trubling your Lordships ony forder butt rests your Lordships humble and obedienn servauntt, James Morphie.

from Edinburgh

Ye 17 day off September 1647.

This letter was addressed on the back thus:—

For the Rightt Honorable the Earllie of Earllie

By a reference to a work devoted to the Scottish Peerage, we find that in April 1639, eight years previous to the date of the letter to which we refer, the Earldom of Airlie and Linlathen was created—James, the seventh Baron Ogilvie, being the first bearing that title. It is very clear, therefore, that this same James must have been the Earl with whom Mr Morphie cultivated a correspondence, and who had his doublet curtailed of its fair proportions in the year 1647. In an account of this Earl James, we find that he distinguished himself on several occasions in the service of King Charles I., particularly at the Battle of Kilsyth, for which he was excommunicated by the General Assembly. He married Isabella, daughter of the Earl of Haddington, and was father of James, the second Earl.

DUNCAN MACRA, FROM CORRY-CHOING.

At the battle of Sheriffmuir (Sliu Thirra), the Macras of Kintail greatly distinguished themselves. Being surrounded and overpowered by a superior force, they were cut down in great numbers, but performed prodigies of valour. It is related of Duncan More Macra—great-grandfather of the present tenant of Knocknagail—that, on that occasion, he killed fifteen men with his own hand, which was so much swollen in the hilt of his sword, that it could with difficulty be extricated. Irresistible, sword in hand, he was killed, in consequence of a trooper furiously plunging his horse on his sword, which, snapping in two, unfortunately failed him. While thus sorely pressed, a body of Glengarry men passing by, one of their number, perceiving the slaughter of the Macras, proposed to succour them. "No," exclaimed the leader of the Macdonells; "remember Innes-a-Cheil—the deil a care, let them have it"—alluding to the untimely death of the celebrated Angus Macdonnell of Glengarry. This Angus, in passing through Kintail, to uplift the rents of Lochcarron (then in dispute between Glengarry and Seaforth), killed a Macra, who attempted to check his progress, and maintain the claims of his chief, Seaforth; but was himself, with his party, slain by means of a well-laid stratagem, on their return, in their birliem at Kylerae. It was to avenge this deed, and the death of Innes-a-Cheil (Angus of the Kyle), that the Macdonells over-ran parts of Ross, and burned the church of Gilchrist. Revenge for deeds of violence or injustice was the recognised practice of the times.

Some years after the battle of Sheriffmuir, a handsome Highlander, while following his drove in the south country, sought a night's quarters at the house of a gentleman, Captain Macdougall, who commanded a troop of cavalry at that battle. The Captain questioned the Highlander as to his news from the Highlands, and asked if he knew a place called Corry-Choing, and the name of its owner. The Highlander listened unmoved, while Captain Macdougall related the following anecdote:—"In the pursuit of that day, he and other two well-mounted troopers pursued a stout Highlander, who, perceiving their approach, turned round, took off his ample plaid, which he coolly folded, and placing it on the ground, stood upon it, to give him a firmer footing. Desirous not to kill, but to take the man prisoner, the troopers skirmished with brandished swords round the devoted Highlander, when one of them, happening to come within reach of his trusty claymore, he, with one stroke, cleft his skull in two. The two others, on witnessing the fate of their comrade, kept at a respectful distance, until the second, coming too close, was touched with the same sword, and dropped dead from his horse. Captain Macdougall, on this, deemed it prudent to move off, questioning the Highlander, whose fine martial appearance and bravery he greatly admired, as to his name. With characteristic prudence he declined giving ing his name, but said he was "from Corry-Choing." I know the man, said the drover, and his name is Duncan Macra. I wish him no harm, observed the Captain, but have felt a curiosity to know the name of so brave a man, to whom I am under such a singular obligation. I shall tell him so, answered the wary drover, who was the identical "Duncan Macra, from Corry-Choing."—Inverness Courier.

REIGN OF ALEXANDER III.—It is well known that Scotland enjoyed an unusual degree of prosperity during the reign of Alexander III. This was mainly to be attributed to the wise measures he adopted for the promotion of agriculture and commerce. Wyntown, in the graphic vernacular language of the age in which he wrote, gives us some idea, while he eulogises the Monarch, of the regulations enforced in reference to the cultivation of the soil, as well as of the prices of grain in the thirteenth century:—

"Yhwmen, powere Karl, or Knawe,
That wes of mycht an ox til hawe;
He gert that man hawe part in Placho;
Swa wes Corne in his Land enwche;
Swa than begowth, and eftyr lang
Of Land wes mesure, ane ox-gang.
Mychty men, that had ma
Oxyn, he gert in Pluchys ga.
• A Pluch of Land eftyr that
To nowmyr of oxyn mesure gat.
Be that Vertu all hys Land
Of Corn he gert be abowndand."

Here we see that every person possessed of land, and who was owner of a single ox or upwards, was compelled to have a certain portion of it in cultivation. It was from this law of Alexander's that, as the poet informs us, land came afterwards to be measured by the number of oxen necessary to work it. The value of corn at that period he thus briefly chronicles:—

"A Bolle of Atis pennys foure
Of Scottis mone past noucht oure;
A Boll of Bere for awcht or ten
In comowne prys sawld wes then;
For sextene a Boll of Qwhete;
Or for twenty the derth was grete."

Wheat was thus a common commodity in Scotland six hundred years ago. We know, however, from other sources that it had been so long previously. In David the First's time (1124), wheat was still cheaper than in the reign of Alexander. It could then be had for ten in place of sixteen pennies—the value of which, in sterling money, would be, at the respective periods, about 2s. 6d. to 4s. per boll. The great abundance and prosperity enjoyed under Alexander III. was speedily dissipated after his death. Wyntown says—

"This falyhyd fra he deyd suddenly;"

and quotes eight lines of a song, supposed to be the oldest which has reached our time, in corroboration of the statement:—

"Qnhen Alysandyr oure Kyng wes dede,
That Scotland led in Lwne and Le,
Away wes sons of Ale and Brede,
Of Wyne and Wax, of Gamyn and Gle:
Oure Gold wes changyd in-to Lede,
Cryst, borne in-to Virgynyte,
'Succour Scotland and Remede,
That stad is in perplexyte."

These often quoted lines are greatly to be admired for their simplicity and sweetness. The expression "Away wes sons* of Ale and Brede" has reference, in all likelihood, to the practice of Alexander, when in the vicinity of a monastery, of allowing the monks two flagons of ale or wine daily, at the royal expense, during his sojourn. Owing to the disputed succession and consequent wars which followed the death of Alexander, the monks no longer enjoyed the wonted munificence—hence the lamentation of the minstrel—

* Plenty.

"Away wes sons of Ale and Brede,
Of Wyne and Wax, of Gamyn and Gle."

"COALS AND CAN'LE" DUTIES.—For the benefit of those who never heard of this interesting relic of a by-gone generation, we may offer a word of explanation as to the nature and origin of the custom. Every alternate week-day evening, during the winter months, the bellman of Haddington goes his round through the town, reciting with a musical, plaintive intonation, the following antique lines, intended to commemorate the total destruction of the town by fire about two hundred years ago, and thereby prevent, if possible, the recurrence in all time coming of a similar calamity. The fire was the result of accident, having arisen from the thoughtlessness of a nursery-maid who had one night placed a screen of clothes too near the fire. The lines were prepared at the time, and the bellman was appointed by the Magistrates to recite them through the town during the winter months—a practice which has been continued without intermission ever since. The remuneration, which was originally a pair of new shoes, is now given in cash, and entered annually in the treasurer's accounts thus—"Coal and Candle, 10s. 6d." The lines are the following:—

"A' gude men's servants, whae'er ye be,
Keep coal an' can'le for charity,
Baith in yere kitchen an' yere ha',
Keep weel yere fire whate'er befa'.
In bakehouse, brewhouse, barn, and byre,
I warn ye a' keep weel yere fire;
For often times a little spark
Brings mony hands to muckle wark.
Ye nurses that has bairns to keep,
See that ye fa' na o'er sound sleep,
For losing o' yere gude renown,
An' banishin' o' this burgh town."

The foregoing appeared in one of the Edinburgh newspapers two years ago, but the rhyme differs materially from the copy given in the Scots Magazine for 1801, which we subjoin:—

"All good men's servants where'er ye be,
Keep coal and candle for charitee,
In bakehouse, brewhouse, barn, and byres;
For all your sakes keep weel your fires,
Both in your chambers and your halls;
Keep weel your fires whate'er befalls;
For oftentimes a little spark,
Brings many hands to meikle wark.
Ye noursesses, that have your bairns to keep,
See that ye fa' not o'er sound asleep,
For losing of your good renown,
And banishing of this borrow's town:
'Tis for your sakes that I do cry;
Take warning by your neighbours bye."

DUEL WITH BOWS AND ARROWS.—On the 10th of February, 1791, two gentlemen met in the Meadows, Edinburgh, equipped with bows and arrows, to decide a point of honour. They were accompanied by seconds, and had a surgeon in attendance, in case their Indian artillery should by any chance prove effective. After a harmless exchange of three shots, the parties retired, the "point of honour," doubtless, being thus satisfactorily arranged. If similar weapons were always employed in duelling, this amusement would speedily become unfashionable, seeing that the seconds would run quite as great, if not a greater, risk than the principals.

THE CLAN GREGOR.

during the existence of the patriarchal system of the Celtic nations, appear to have been simply the supreme chiefs; and, as such, bound by the cleachdadh, like the other chiefs of the people. They could confer no titles, and grant no lands nor jurisdictions; ranks, lands and jurisdictions, among the patriarchal nations, being hereditary and unalienable. Neither could they make war nor impose taxes—the former being competent only to the people, in convocation assembled; and the armies, when in the field, being bound to provide their own supplies.

In these circumstances, although Scotland escaped the conquest, whereby the feudal system was established in the different states into which Europe had been divided by the spoilers of the Roman empire, her kings became acquainted with that system of government, and determined on its introduction.

The machinery of government was the same in the patriarchal and the feudal systems, with this difference, that the powers of the aristocracy were limited in the former, and absolute in the latter. That the feudal was only the patriarchal system, so altered as to suit the circumstances in which the conquerors of Europe found themselves placed, is not a new idea; for Dr Robertson observes that "it may be ascribed with great probability to the similar state of society, and of manners, which they were accustomed to in their own countries, and to the similar situation in which they found themselves when taking possession of their new domains." Not having undertaken the conquest under their hereditary leaders, they were obliged to elect others; and discipline could only be maintained by giving them increased power.

The change which had been produced by the conquest of Europe and the introduction of the feudal system, was compared to "a change from light to darkness;" but a writer in Chambers' Information for the People describes its advantages in a manner calculated to make us believe that the kings of Scotland, in their determination to convert the patriarchal constitution of their country into the feudal form, which it afterwards assumed, were actuated by patriotic motives. For it must be confessed that the patriarchal system was only suited to an early state of society. There was no supreme government or executive power to protect the lives and property of persons beyond their own districts; and, hence, any injustice done to an individual by a different clan, or any member of a different clan, was left to the cleachdadh, which could be enforced only by the clans of the individuals concerned. The government of a country by patriarchal chiefs was thus too local in its operation, and too conservative in its character, for the exigencies of a state progressively advancing in either the arts of war or of peace; while the feudal system was quite the reverse, if justly administered. "Victorious armies," observes the writer already mentioned, "were centered out into countries which they had seized, continued arranged under officers, each of whom had a separate territory allotted to him, on which he could retain and support his immediate followers, while the principal leader had the largest; and in this way all were bound in allegiance, both to their superiors and to their chief, and all were in readiness to be called to arms whenever their services were thought to be required."

But the feudal system, though well adapted to the government of military states, and not adverse even to the progress of commercial and manufacturing enterprise, was good or evil according to the character of the sovereign for the time—for he was absolute, and had the lives and properties of his lords and barons in his power; as they, in like manner, had the lives and properties of their own feudal vassals in their power, being equally despotic in their respective districts; while the classes now called the lower orders "were counted and disposed of as the mere goods and chattels of the owners of the states to which they belonged. Hence, although the writer already referred to, states that "this military chieftainship, infusing itself, as an element, in the barbarian societies, was the first advance to anything like civil or social government, since the extinction of the Roman power;" yet, he is not silent on its glaring evils and defects. He admits that, under the feudal system, nations "were far from having the advantage of a regular government. The method of conducting judicial proceedings, and of administering justice, was still peculiarly unsettled and uncertain. The authority of the magistrate was so limited, and the independence assumed by individuals so great, that they seldom admitted any empire but by the sword. It was then that trial by ordeal became universal, and men's guilt or innocence was thought to be proved by the capacity of their bodies to withstand the influence of red hot iron, or boiling water applied to them, or by their overcoming the accuser in single combat."

It is not, therefore, at all discreditable to the people of Scotland, whose patriarchal government, by chiefs and chieftains, was suited to the simple manners and customs, and the occupations and pursuits of the time, that they resisted the introduction of such a system into their country—especially considering that its immediate effect would be to sink themselves into the position of serfs, and to elevate their kings, chiefs and chieftains to a position whereby they should have absolute power over their lives and liberties. They accordingly did resist it, and that most manfully; but the division of the country into so many districts as there were clans, each governed by its own local court of chief and chieftains, was every way adverse to an effectual or combined national movement: and thus, clan after clan was drawn into a feud with some powerful feudal enemy, and broken up and dispersed, and their lands granted to feudal lords and vassals. Tradition affords sufficient grounds to lead us to the conclusion that, by these nefarious means, the clans were one after another reduced into the condition emphatically described, in royal edicts, by the term “broken clans,” before they suffered themselves to be dispossessed of their inheritances. In many parts, even in the south of Scotland, in comparatively recent times, as at Dundonald, (when a grant of that estate was made to the Earl of Abercorn,) the people resisted; and much blood was shed. The persecution of the brave and high-minded Clan Gregor is not altogether unknown, excepting to tradition; and is abundantly illustrative of the means used for the establishment of the feudal system in Scotland.

The royally descended Clan Gregor occupied a large district of the Highlands, which may be described generally as beginning on the south-east, not far from Stirling,—as extending northward to Fortingal, westward to the foot of Glenorchy; and again, southward by the upper part of Lochlomond, to the same place. This district became gradually surrounded by the estates of feudal lords and barons, whose power progressively increased, until they found themselves in a condition to provoke feuds with that numerous and great tribe, with the view of reducing them, as the custom was, into the condition of “a broken clan,” and so dividing their country among themselves.

At a period when something like public opinion seems to have arisen in Scotland, even under the feudal system, the Clan Gregor fought a battle, and gained a victory over the Colquhouns, in Glenfruin, the slaughter in which it suited their feudal enemies (for the purpose of rousing public indignation against them), greatly to exaggerate. It was accordingly alleged that they not only slaughtered the Colquhouns, in the most cruel and ferocious manner on the field, but that they also attacked a college, in which a great many scores of their sons were being educated, after the engagement, and murdered them also in cold blood. The greater number of the Colquhouns, notwithstanding their defeat at Glenfruin, “lived to fight another day;” and the college, with its precious charge, was never violated by the generous Clan Gregor. Nevertheless, a great and solemn procession (pretended to have been formed of the wives and mothers of the murdered Colquhouns) was fraudulently got up, and waited on the king; and, each bearing a bloody shirt, alleged to have belonged to a murdered son or husband, and crying aloud for vengeance on the Clan Gregor. In short, a tragic scene, well got up, afforded to the king and his feudal vassals the coveted opportunity of striking a fatal blow at one of the most powerful clans who still inflexibly adhered to the patriarchal cleachdadh; and it was not neglected. The name of Macgregor was proscribed, warrants of fire and sword issued against the clan, and their country divided among the feudal lords and barons, who were most active in their persecution and betrayal, and by whose estates it was surrounded.

The Clan Gregor, for a long period, struggled against the spoiler and oppressor. They were at all times ready to face their feudal enemies individually; but when they joined together, and “went out against them” in a body, and with a combined movement, they were obliged to form themselves into small parties, and, separating from one another, to seek an asylum among such patriarchal chiefs and chieftains as were allied to them by blood, or to hide themselves among the rocks and caves of their native mountains. Among the many touching traditions, relative to the adventures of small bands of the Macgregors, while thus under hiding, the following may be mentioned:—

Macdonald of Tiradries, one of the chieftains of the Macdonalds of Braelochaber, was related to the Clan Gregor; and a small band of them, who had been pursued by their enemies to that district, were received by him with apparent cordiality; but their treacherous host, for some cause on which tradition is silent, betrayed their hiding place, and they were shot, in the most cowardly manner, while sleeping side by side, in secure dependence on his watchful protection.

The general indignation was roused against the base betrayer of the Macgregors; and Macdonald soon found himself hated, shunned, and despised even by his own clan. It is also possible that his violated conscience was armed against him. The consequence was that he became half deranged, as it would appear, and took it into his head that his steps were continually pursued, after night-fall, by the spectre of a fierce and powerful Highlander, fully armed. Tormented by this imaginary spectre, he determined to have the mystery explained by one of those wild and crazy beings whom the Highlanders of the olden time regarded as wizards, and believed capable of foretelling events, and solving sights and visions, by supernatural agency. The wizard lived in a cave, “remote from human haunt;” and, on being visited by Macdonald, and having the spectral appearance described to him, he assured his visitor that he was haunted by “his own wraith,” and that he had not many days to live. It is said that, on again seeing the spectre, Macdonald clearly discerned, by certain swollen glands or sinews in his legs, that the wraith was his own. He was killed, very soon afterwards, by one of the chiefs of the Macgregors, near his own house, in revenge of his treachery. Some say that the avenger was the celebrated Gregor Glen dubh; others assert that it was the scarcely less celebrated nephew of black Duncan of the Turban, by whom he was slain. The date of the event is therefore doubtful.

The brave but unfortunate Macgregors were buried at the side of the river Spean by the kind-hearted Macdonalds of Braelochaber, who reared a cairn over them. This cairn has been planted by Colonel Hugh Ross, with good taste and good feeling, with Scottish fir—the badge of the clan—that the tree “which they loved when living might wave over them when dead.”

WILLIAM ALEXANDER, EARL OF STIRLING.

THE even tenor of his life, whilst engaged in these tranquil occupations, equally beneficial to the land of his birth, and to that other country which he, in common with his fellow-colonists, was accustomed to consider and speak of as “home,” were ere long interrupted by the mad attempt of the administration to tax the American Colonies without their consent. This pretension was in violation at once of their charters and of their intrinsic rights at British subjects, and when once before suggested, it had been rejected by Sir Robert Walpole, for reasons the wisdom of which has long since been confirmed by history.

Stirling was among the most active of its opposers. He encouraged resistance to its execution by promoting the agreement to dispense with the stamped paper without prejudice to the validity of contracts in which the Act required it to be used.

It became apparent that arms alone were to vindicate the just rights of the Colonies. A Whig, not merely from education and early associations, but from the convictions of his mature judgment, Stirling had opposed the Stamp Act, and used his influence to procure its repeal; he had opposed with equal determination the expedients by which, under another form, it was attempted to attain the same unlawful end of taxing the Colonies without their consent. When coercion was at length attempted in Massachusetts, and was followed by the resistance of its people and the shedding of their blood, Stirling was among the first in the other provinces to take up arms in defence of what he knew to be the common cause of all the Colonies. The military experience which he had gained on the Canadian frontier twenty years before, under Shirley, together with his local influence and personal popularity, and, above all, his ardour in the cause of American liberty, led to his being unanimously chosen by the people of Morris county to command a regiment of militia, which he had been instrumental in raising in the summer of 1775; and the legislature of the province confirmed the choice, and commissioned him accordingly.

He displayed his characteristic energy and activity in recruiting and organising his regiment, supplying arms at his own expense to such of his men as were unable to arm themselves. Whilst engaged in this duty, he was ordered to organise two regiments of regular troops, which Congress had directed to be raised in New Jersey for the general service. He visited in rapid succession the various parts of the province to procure recruits, collect arms and ammunition, and prepare barracks. In a few days, he succeeded in completing the regiment intended for his own command, the head-quarters of which were established at Elizabethtown. Immediately afterwards, he commenced preparations to defend any vessels that might take refuge in the neighbouring waters of New Jersey from molestation by the British cruisers in the harbour of New York; and he asked from Congress to take, for the public use, from any merchant vessels that might arrive, whatever ammunition they might have on board, on the payment of its value. This suggestion was adopted. Having reason to believe that the king's governor in New Jersey, William Franklin, son of Dr Franklin, was likely to undertake something in favour of the royal cause, he caused him to be placed under guard. Having subsequently issued a proclamation, in the king's name, for assembling the provincial legislature, Franklin was removed to Connecticut by order of Congress, and guarded there as a prisoner.

Early in January 1776, Stirling received a letter from General Washington, then commanding the army by which Boston was invested, advising him that the British were fitting out an expedition, which the General believed to be destined against Long Island, and possibly against New York itself. He stated that he had detached General Lee to take the command in New York, and prepare for its defence, and to overawe Long Island, where many of the inhabitants were disaffected; and he directed Stirling to reinforce Lee with troops from New Jersey. Whilst he was executing these orders, intelligence reached him that a transport for the ministerial army at Boston was hovering off Sandy Hook in distress, waiting for assistance from the king's ships in New York. Supposing her to be laden with arms and ammunition, he immediately started for Amboy, seized a pilot-boat which lay there, and manned her with volunteers to attempt the capture of the transport. He was joined by three boats from Elizabethtown, under Colonel Dayton. They found the ship nearly twenty miles seaward from Sandy Hook, and immediately boarded, captured, and brought her into Elizabethtown. She proved to be laden with coal and provisions. Though Stirling felt a natural regret that the ship was not laden with arms and ammunition, as he had conjectured, yet the capture was a serious annoyance to the enemy. Provisions were already becoming scarce in Boston, and fuel was in such requisition to meet the rigours of a severe winter, that many of the houses were demolished for firewood. The promptness with which this little naval enterprise was conceived, and the spirit with which it was conducted, at once established his character for zeal, activity, and gallantry, and gained for him and his followers one of the earliest votes of thanks from Congress. At the same time, he zealously exerted himself to check the attempts that were made by the disaffected and avaricious to ship provisions and wood from New Jersey for the aid of the troops in Boston.

On the 4th of February 1776, he received orders from General Lee to march with his regiment to New York. He set out the following day, and crossing the Hudson with difficulty through the running ice, reached New York on the 6th. There he found no commissary of provisions, and was obliged to supply his regiment with rations by such ways and means as he could devise. On the 1st of March, Stirling was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-general, and his commission was forwarded to him in a highly complimentary letter from the President of Congress. General Lee being soon after detached to take the command in the Southern Colonies, Stirling remained for a season in the chief command at New York. He immediately directed his efforts to cutting off the communication between Staten Island, off which the king's ships lay, and Long Island, by stationing parties along the shores of the bay, to watch the movements of the enemy, check their depredations, and destroy their boats, as opportunity offered. He also made great exertions to prepare quarters in New York for the American army, under Washington, who proposed to march thither as soon as the royal forces should leave Boston, which it was evident they could not long continue to hold.

The forces under Stirling, including the New Jersey and Connecticut troops, and volunteers from the city, amounted to two thousand men. It being apprehended that the fleet and army from Boston would proceed at once to New York, to occupy that place permanently, and endeavour to divide the Colonies by opening a communication through Hudson's River and the lakes with Canada, every effort was made to strengthen the defences of the place. Stirling called for additional troops from New Jersey and Connecticut, and fortified the most commanding points on Long Island and at New York, being aided by the inhabitants in throwing up the works. In addition to other motives to exertion, he was stimulated by the assurance of Washington, "that the fate of this campaign, and, of course, the fate of America, depends upon you, and the army under your command, should the enemy attempt your quarter." Though Washington reinforced him after General Howe had embarked a portion of his forces, with an apparent intention to depart from Boston, still, lest his preparation might be only a feint, Washington could not withdraw his troops until the British fleet and army departed, on the 17th of March. Then he broke up his camp, and proceeded with his army by detachments to New York.

During a short time, Stirling was superseded in the chief command at New York, by Brigadier-General Thompson. He employed the interval in superintending the construction of additional works on the Jersey shore of the Hudson. General Thompson being soon after ordered to the Canada frontier, the chief command again devolved on Stirling, who continued to urge forward the completion of the defences. To the principal work on New York Island he gave the name of Fort Washington; to that opposite it, on the Jersey shore, the name of Fort Lee, in compliment to the officer who had planned the fortifications. Smaller works were constructed at Hore's Hook and Throg's Neck, to defend the approach by Hell Gate, while the approach to the city by land was guarded by a redoubt at McGowan's Pass, near Haerlem. Intrenchments were also thrown up on Long Island, and forts erected or repaired at Red Hook and the Narrows, and on the small islands in the harbour.

General Washington reached New York with the remainder of his army on the 14th of April, and assumed the chief command. General Howe, instead of proceeding at once, as was expected, to New York, had retired to Halifax, to await reinforcements from England. He arrived in New York towards the close of June, and landed on Staten Island on the 4th of July, the day on which Congress had solemnly proclaimed the independence of the United States. Being joined by his brother, Lord Howe, in command of a formidable fleet, the two were empowered as commissioners to treat of peace. They accordingly made overtures for this purpose; but as their powers extended to little beyond granting pardons to those who, as General Washington remarked, "had committed no fault, and therefore wanted no pardon," their overtures were ineffectual.

On the 22d of August the British landed, with nearly their whole force, under cover of their fleet, at Gravesend, on Long Island. General Putnam had the chief command on the island; and he remained within the line of fortifications which Stirling had erected. Under his orders, General Sullivan and Stirling were appointed to command without the lines. Only a portion of the American army had been ferried over to Long Island, probably to prevent the sacrifice of the whole; and General Washington did not assume the command in person. The object, therefore, was not a general and decisive battle, but a temporary check and annoyance: even this was considered perilous.

The centre of the British army, consisting of Hessians under General De Heister, occupied Flatbush. Earl Percy and Lord Cornwallis were on the right, and General Grant on the left. On the night of the 25th, General Clinton drew off the van of the British army to the eastward, and in the morning seized some heights which commanded the road from Jamaica to Brooklyn. General Grant, at the same time, advanced along the shore of the bay, at the head of the left wing, with ten pieces of cannon. Stirling was directed by Putnam to oppose this advance with the two regiments nearest at hand. Early in the morning he came in sight of the enemy, before whom our advanced parties were retreating. These he rallied, and skirmishing immediately commenced, the contending parties having come within one hundred and fifty yards of each other. The fire was kept up briskly for two hours, when the British light troops retired, though the cannonade continued on both sides.

Meantime, it became apparent from the firing that the British had turned the left wing of our force, and gained its rear, and that the centre also had given way, and was in full retreat. Stirling perceived that immediate retreat could alone save his own detachment from being made prisoners. Ordering the main body of his force to make the best of their way through Gowan's creek, he gallantly, and with great self-devotion, placed himself at the head of four hundred of Smallwood's Maryland regiment, and attacked a corps under Lord Cornwallis, advantageously posted at a house at the mills, near which his detachment was to pass the creek. The attack was kept up with the greatest intrepidity, the small party having been checked five times, and rallied again under his encouragement, with fresh ardour. They were on the point of driving Cornwallis from his station, when the approach of a British reinforcement compelled Stirling to draw off, in the hope of providing for the safety of the brave men who were still with him, those for whom they were sacrificing themselves having already effected their retreat. But fresh bodies of the enemy encountered him in every direction, keeping up a galling fire from several quarters. He succeeded in turning a hill-side, which covered him from the fire of the British, and was making a rapid retreat, when, meeting a fresh body of the enemy, he was compelled to surrender to the Hessian General, De Heister. He was soon taken on board of Lord Howe's ship, the Eagle.

Had not the enemy been allowed to turn the left of our army, from neglect of a precaution which had been specially enjoined by Washington, and had all parts of the line been defended with equal obstinacy with that intrusted to Stirling, the check to the British army would have been more effectual. Its advance would have been purchased by greater sacrifice, and Stirling would have been able to make good his retreat. Washington bore strong testimony to the bravery and resolution with which he had defended his position, and took the earliest occasion to effect his exchange; and Congress, in acknowledgement of his services, promoted him to the rank of Major-general.

Soon after the evacuation of New York, he returned to his duty in the army, and took part in the retreat through New Jersey, and in the operations on the Delaware, where he again signalised himself by the successful defence of Coryell's Ferry, which the British attempted to seize. When the army, elated by its successful efforts at Trenton and Princeton, but worn out by fatigue and privation, settled down for necessary repose, very late in the season, in winter-quarters at Morristown, Stirling's vigilance recommended him to Washington as a suitable person to command the lines immediately opposite to the enemy. This led to his being frequently engaged in skirmishes with detached parties of the British. On the opening of the campaign in 1777, Stirling encountered a strong party under Cornwallis, and, after sustaining the attack of the British with great gallantry, was compelled by their superior numbers to retire from the open country, with the loss of three field-pieces. But after reaching a more advantageous position, he made so obstinate a stand as to arrest the further progress of Cornwallis. Other similar checks led Sir William Howe to abandon the attempt to reach Philadelphia by land.

Stirling was then detached with his division up the Hudson, to reinforce the army intended to operate against Burgoyne. He had reached the highlands, when intelligence of the British army having embarked, with the probable intention of passing round by sea to Philadelphia, led to his recall to reinforce the main army under Washington. Discouraged by the difficulties of ascending the Delaware, Sir William Howe entered the Chesapeake, and, ascending to the north of Elk river, moved his army up in the transports as far as it continued navigable, and disembarked his troops to the number of eighteen thousand men. The effective force of Washington did not exceed eleven thousand, a considerable part being militia, in whom he had little confidence. This force he assembled on the Brandywine, to oppose the approach of the British to Philadelphia, and he determined to hazard a battle for the protection of our seat of government.

On the morning of the 11th of September, the British army got in motion to attempt crossing the river, and skirmishing commenced. Cornwallis had been detached from the left of the British up the bank of the Brandywine, and had crossed it at the Forks, without opposition. Washington immediately detached Generals Sullivan, Stirling, and Stephen, to oppose this column under Cornwallis, with whom was Sir William Howe, in person. Stirling's and Stephen's divisions formed on favourable ground, having both flanks covered with wood, and the artillery judiciously posted. Sullivan's troops, having made a longer circuit, had not had time to form, when the British commenced their attack with great impetuosity. The American column made a spirited resistance; but the right wing being in some disorder, was obliged to give way. Sullivan succeeded in rallying his command, but being briskly charged, it again gave way, and the flank of the column being thus exposed, the remainder of the line began to waver. Sullivan, left behind by his flying troops, joined those who continued to resist, and throwing himself, with Stirling and Lafayette personally into the conflict, made a stand until our forces were completely broken, and the enemy were within twenty yards of them; then, taking refuge in the woods, they succeeded in rejoining their routed followers. Lafayette was wounded, but Sullivan and Stirling escaped unhurt.

Washington soon after pressed forward, with Greene, to the succour of this column; but finding it broken, he succeeded in covering its retreat, and checking the advance of the British. The remainder of Howe's army having crossed the Brandywine, Washington retreated to Chester, and on the following day to Philadelphia. He again offered battle to the British army, and the action had commenced, when a heavy rain coming on, it was suspended. Washington then continued his retreat to Skippack, and the British took possession of Philadelphia, from which, notwithstanding their superior force, Washington had kept them out an entire month since their landing at Elk river.

Howe having extended the cantonments of the British army, Washington thought the moment favourable for attacking the portion of it which lay in Germantown. Stirling was to command the reserve, consisting of the brigades of Nash and Maxwell. At seven in the evening, the various corps began their march, and falling upon the British advanced parties by surprise, routed them with little difficulty. The plan was well concerted; but an unusually thick fog prevented the Americans from distinguishing friend from foe, occasioned them to lose their way in some instances, and threw every thing into confusion. A very determined and successful resistance was also made by a party of British troops which occupied Chew's house, a stone building of such strength as to resist a cannonade. The attack failed, therefore, in its main object. The reserve under Lord Stirling appears to have been actively engaged, General Nash, who formed part of it, having been among the slain.

Soon after, Washington called a council of his generals, to consider the question of an attack on Philadelphia. Eleven of them were opposed to the attack, and four in favour of it. Stirling, in behalf of this minority, prepared an able plan for attacking Philadelphia at daylight. But the experiment was deemed too hazardous, considering the weakness of our own, and the strength of the British army, and our troops soon after went into winter-quarters at Valley Forge.

Just before this period, the American arms had gained a great triumph on the banks of the Hudson by the capitulation of the entire army of Burgoyne to the forces under General Gates. The successful commander, who, besides being favoured by fortune and the errors of the enemy, had conducted himself with ability, immediately became an object of admiration to the whole country. Many were in favour of placing the whole army under his command, instead of leaving it under the more cautious guidance of Washington, who, though he had shown that he could act with great decision and vigour when there was a fair prospect of success, was yet unwilling to hazard the liberties of his country by exposing an ill-provided and imperfectly disciplined army in frequent combats with superior numbers. This opinion had its favourers even in Congress. But the army, estimating Washington at his full worth, with two or three exceptions, was decidedly in his favour. General Conway, an Irishman, educated in France, had come with other foreigners to America to seek advancement in our army. He had been made a brigadier-general, but not having won any distinction in this rank, and having excited Washington's distrust, he became his secret enemy, and exerted himself to disparage his proceedings. With him originated the secret scheme to substitute Gates for Washington, known as the "Conway cabal," which was brought to the knowledge of Washington through the instrumentality of Stirling. Colonel James Wilkinson, aide-de-camp of Gates, being on his way with despatches to Congress, then sitting at York in Pennsylvania, stopped at Stirling's head-quarters at Reading, and having dined with him, repeated to Major M'Williams, an aid of Stirling, the following passage from a letter of Conway to Gates:—"Heaven has determined to save your country, or a weak general and bad counsellors have ruined it." Major M'Williams considered it his duty to disclose this communication to Stirling, who in turn felt bound by public duty as well as by private friendship to make it known to Washington. He immediately did so, with the remark, "Such wicked duplicity I shall always consider it my duty to detect."

This led to a correspondence between Washington, Gates, and Conway, and subsequently between Stirling and Wilkinson. Rumours respecting it got abroad, and public sentiment was so aroused against the conspirators, that they were compelled to abandon their ambitious projects. A part of the rancour of these disappointed men was naturally enough directed against Stirling. An attempt was made to disparage him for an imputed violation of the laws of hospitality, by imparting to Washington the scheme which had been divulged at table in a moment of conviviality. Those whose conspiracy could not bear the light, who were themselves plotting treason and circulating calumny, evinced a wonderful respect for the laws of honour and hospitality. But Stirling only communicated intelligence reported to him as a matter of duty by his subordinate officer. It would have been treason alike against friendship and patriotism to have withheld a knowledge of this plot from its intended victim. The course which he pursued was identical with that of Patrick Henry, then governor of Virginia, when the same cabal attempted to poison his mind against the commander-in-chief. He at once informed him of what was plotting for his injury, remarking, "While you face the armed enemies of your country, and by the favour of God have been kept unhurt, I trust your country will never harbour in her bosom, the miscreant who would ruin her best supporter."

The army remained at Valley Forge until Sir Henry Clinton evacuated Philadelphia, on the 18th of June 1778, when Washington immediately started in pursuit, with the intention of hanging on the British rear, harassing its march, and, if a favourable opportunity occurred, of bringing it to battle. On the 28th, the British occupied the high grounds about Monmouth Court-house, Sir Henry Clinton having sent forward his baggage under Knyphausen, leaving the flower of his army wholly unencumbered to bring up the rear. At eight in the morning, the British rear having descended into the plains, Lee, who led the advance of the Americans, commenced cannonading them, and pushed forward a force on both their flanks. The whole of the enemy immediately marched back to resist this attack. Part of Lee's troops fell into confusion, and he ordered a retreat, intending, as he afterwards alleged, to rally them in a more defensible position. Washington, who was ignorant of what had occurred, ordered up the rear of the army to support the advance, and rode forward, when he was met by the troops in full retreat. He ordered Lee to rally his corps and make a stand, which he partially accomplished, but was again forced from the ground. At this moment, Stirling, who commanded the left wing, brought forward a detachment of artillery, which played with such effect on the British, who had now crossed the morass, as to check their advance. They then attempted to turn the left flank, but were repulsed by Stirling's infantry. Wayne had now come up with the right wing, and equally checked their advance on his side, compelling the British to retire to the position they had occupied on the arrival of Washington. Washington now ordered the artillery forward to cannonade the enemy, and detached a corps of infantry to gain their flanks; but before any further impression could be made, night put an end to the battle. At midnight, the British decamped so silently that their retreat was not perceived, and thus got beyond the reach of further pursuit. Lee subsequently requested a court-martial upon his conduct, and measures were immediately taken for his trial. Stirling was made president of the court, and Lee was found guilty of all the charges preferred against him, and suspended from command for a year.

In October, Stirling was ordered to Elizabethtown, to command the troops in New Jersey employed in watching the British fleet and the army in New York. On the opening of the campaign of 1779, he was ordered to take post at Pompton with the Virginia division, and cover the country towards the Hudson. Major Henry Lee, who, with his light horse, formed part of the command, was stationed in advance to watch the motions of the enemy. Having learned that their advanced party at Paulus Hook was remiss in keeping guard, Major Lee formed a project of surprising it. His suggestion being approved by Washington, Stirling furnished him with the necessary force, and took part in person with a strong detachment to recover his retreat. The enterprise was carried through with great spirit, and was entirely successful, the British post being surprised, and one hundred and fifty men taken prisoners. For the part which Stirling took in this affair, he received the thanks of Washington and of Congress.

The main body of the army having gone into winter quarters at Morristown, Washington detached Stirling with two thousand men to attempt carrying the British posts on Staten Island. The troops moved rapidly forward on sleds, and having crossed the inlet on the ice, Stirling detached Colonel Willet to attack a British regiment at Decker's, whilst he proceeded with the remainder to the watering-place, where the main body of the enemy lay. Notwithstanding the precautions that had been taken, and the great despatch with which the assailants had moved, the spies of the enemy had gained intelligence, and the British troops were all within their works, prepared for resistance. The projected surprise having thus failed, the works being too strong to be carried by assault, and the communication, moreover, with New York being unexpectedly found open, by which the British could be reinforced, the attack was necessarily abandoned. Some skirmishing took place in the retreat, a charge on the rear from the enemy's cavalry was repulsed, and a few prisoners were brought off by the Americans.

The campaign of 1780 was not fruitful of any important events in the northern part of the United States, where Stirling was employed. Projects were entertained for the recovery of New York, with the assistance of the French, who had now engaged actively in our behalf; but on account of the delay in waiting for our allies, the plans for this purpose were not carried into effect. In 1781, Stirling was ordered to Albany, to take the chief command of the Northern army collecting there, to resist another invasion from Canada under St Leger. He had under his orders Brigadier-Generals Stark, Van Rensselaer, Gansevoort, and Enos, with a small body of regular troops and militia from New York, Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire. He collected the main body of his army at Saratoga, and made the most judicious arrangements to maintain the favourable omen of a battle-field already consecrated by victory.

Soon after his arrangements were completed, he had the satisfaction of announcing to his troops the complete triumph of our arms at Yorktown. This decisive event, with the approach of winter, doubtless put an end to the projected expedition of St Leger. Stirling soon after dismissed the militia to their homes, and transferred his headquarters to Albany. A scheme was formed for a winter's expedition, moving the troops in sleds over the snow, to reduce St John's, Chamblee, and Montreal; but it was deemed advisable to remain on the defensive in this quarter, and the project was not prosecuted.

Stirling now resumed the command in New Jersey, and in January 1782, he repaired to Philadelphia, which was within his military command, and established his head-quarters there for the winter. In the spring of the following year he was appointed, with the adjutant-general of the army and another officer, on a commission to settle the rank of the subalterns of the Connecticut line; and he proceeded for that purpose to Fishkill, where those troops were encamped. This service being accomplished, he was again ordered to command the Northern department, and established his head-quarters at Albany. There were rumours again of a contemplated expedition from Canada, to join an army of the enemy from New York, and effect the long meditated junction by the Hudson river and the Lakes; but no real movement was made towards this object, and Stirling had only to remain on the watch, and use every effort to keep himself well informed of the intentions of the enemy.

While thus engaged in the service of his country, his useful and honourable career was suddenly brought to a close. "The fatigue of body and mind to which he had been subjected during his command on an important and exposed frontier, superadded to the hard service and constant exposure he had undergone from the commencement of the war, brought on a violent attack of the gout, which soon proved fatal. He died at Albany, on the 15th of January, 1783, in the fifty-seventh year of his age," within a week of the day on which the independence of his country was solemnly recognized by treaty.

He was buried in the vault of his wife's ancestors, within the walls of the ancient Dutch church in that city; and when that venerable edifice was demolished, his bones were removed to the cemetery belonging to the Protestant Episcopal Church, of which he was a member. His funeral was solemnized with the military observances appropriate to his rank, and the religious rites of his communion; and the ceremonies of the occasion are still remembered by the elder inhabitants of that city, as a spectacle of extraordinary interest and solemnity. He left a widow and two daughters: Mary, the elder, married to Robert Watts; Catharine, the younger, to Colonel William Duer. The death of Lord Stirling was lamented by his brother officers, and the troops he had commanded [embracing every brigade in the American army, except those of South Carolina and Georgia], as well as by his personal friends. He was regretted, indeed, by all, both in military and civil life, who knew him either in his public capacity or private relations; by many, also, who, without knowing him personally, were aware of the loss the public cause had sustained in being deprived of the influence of his character and the benefit of his services.

THE CURSE OF MOY.

A LEGEND OF THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

"I will tell you of aue wondrous tale,
As ever was told by man,
Or ever was sung by minstrel meet,
Since this base world began."

—Mountain Bard.

It was evening, the sun brightly shone from the west, Hill, valley, and wold, in his gold beams were drest,

The tempest was hush'd, and Loch Moy,* like a child,
In a cradle of flowers lay placid and mild;
No sound stirred the forest, nor voice in the hall,
And the flag of Clan Chattan scarce waved o'er the wall,—

Like a soft gleam of sunshine across a dark sky,
Was that calm, peaceful scene, in the valley of Moy.

But the warder's grim face dark forebodings exprest,
As often he turn'd his wild eyes to the west;
And hark! 'tis the pibroch arouses the glen,
The tramping of horses, the shouting of men,
Hill, valley, and pass, are awaken'd to life—
Clan Chattan returns from the red field of strife.

Let the slogan† resound, and the fiery cross gleam,
Afar over mountain, and valley, and stream,
From bleak Mealfuarvonie,‡ to the peaks of Kintail,§
Each Grant grasp thy claymore, and buckle thy mail;
Is no fire in thine eye? Yes, but bootless it burns,
For a prisoner, thy chief, with Clan Chattan returns,
And the young heir of Alvie,|| and Margaret his bride,
Are bound to the saddle, and ride by his side.

The dark chief of Moy, he smiled like a fiend,
As he heard the portcullis behind them descend.
"To the dungeon," he cried, "with the chief and his heir,

To the feast in the hall, carry Margaret the fair,
Though she slighted me once, yet this maiden so coy,
Shall now know the power of the chieftain of Moy."

In a tower of the castle was Margaret immur'd,
Where daily his love-suit the chieftain preferr'd;
But all her return was but anguish and tears,
And the pleadings for mercy she poured in his ears.
At last he affected a wish to comply,
And pronounced a behest, that one only should die—
"Thus far, maid, I grant thee, then calm your sweet voice,

And go, between father and lover make choice.
If your choice be your father, to-morrow shall see Him released, and returned to Glenmorriston free;
But if your fond heart should of Allan approve,
To-morrow shall see you restored to his love."

* Loch Moy—A beautiful small lake in the glen of Moy, twelve miles from Inverness. Its length is about one mile and a half, and its breadth half a mile. A forest of birch surrounds it, which in summer gives it an enchanting appearance. The lake contains two islands, on the larger of which are still to be seen the ruins of an ancient castle, which, in the fourteenth century, was the fastness and family seat of Macintosh, the chief of the powerful Clan Chattan, and which was the scene of the barbarous incident related in the ballad.

† Slogan—The war-cry of the clans. Each clan had its peculiar "slogan." That of the Grants was "Craig-Ellachie," the name of a rocky eminence in their country. It was also the place where the clan assembled, when summoned to arms by the "fiery cross."

‡ Mealfuarvonie, or Maulfuarnhonvie (literally, the height of the cold moor). A mountain which rises 3200 feet above the level of the sea, and is near the eastern extremity of the Grants' country.

§ "The peaks of Kintail," from Ceann da shail (the head of the two seas). An eminence in the Macrae's country, on the south-western extremity of the country of the Grants.

|| "Alvie," probably from "Alleibh, the cold island, or 'Ealabhi,' the lake of swans, which latter derivation is countenanced by the fact that Alvie Loch has from time immemorial been visited by swans in the spring season. Alvie, Avimore, and the whole district known by the name of Strathspey, lying partly in the shires of Inverness and Moray, was the most ancient territory belonging to the Grants.

Fair Margaret was speechless, yet fain would implore,
But the tyrant was gone, and she sank on the floor.

With wailing and tears to their dungeon she hied,
And long they consulted, but could not decide;
At last the old chieftain his daughter embraced,
And her hand in young Allan's he tremblingly placed;
With a look of despair mixed with rage and with pride,
"Be the tyrant's doom mine, then!" he frantically cried;
"Be it yours, noble Allan, while youth is your own,
To live for one deed, and for one deed alone;
But a deed of such glorious vengeance I claim,
As may leave not a stain on our honour or name.
Come, swear by this hand, the hand of your bride,
And thus I unite, where but death may divide.
Warder, go! let my words to your chief be exprest,
The Grant of Glenmorriston bides his behest."

Fair dawned the morning, o'er mountain and bower,
As sleepless sat Margaret alone in her tower;
For fearful forebodings her mind had oppress'd,
And shadowy phantoms had reft her of rest.
All silent as marble, as motionless still
She sat, till aroused by the pibroch shrill;
The clanking of armour, and footsteps she hears,
And the chieftain of Moy in her presence appears.

"Come forth, lovely maiden, for, true to my word,
To the youth of your choice you shall now be restored;
Come, hasten, look here! let me share in your joy,
Pray, what think you now of your beardless boy?"
He said, and, oh! horror!—both father and heir
Suspended, and bloody, in death they were there!
One wild look she gave, one motionless stare,
And fell at his feet with a scream of despair.
"Thus, thus," cried the fiend, "does the chieftain of Moy,
Tame chiefs that are haughty, and maids that are coy:
Away with the lady—she'll learn by to-morrow,
To favour my suit, and to lessen her sorrow."

Again through her lattice the morning beams play,
But she heeds not, nor knows not the night from the day;

But she laughs, and she talks with the spirits unseen,
And sings of sweet bowers, and fields that are green;
To the red-breast that chirps on her small window sill,
In a sweet voice, but fitful, she sings wild and shrill.

SONG TO THE REDBREAST.

"Kind blythesome Robin, oh! come, wilt thou rest
Thy gentle head on my burning breast;
Come, listen, oh! listen to my behest,
For oh! I am weary and sad, unblest,
For Allan, my love, to the church has gone;
Go, tell him, sweet Robin, I follow anon.

"Yet stay, Robin, stay, till I tell you this,
You will find my love in his bridal dress,
With his yellow hair, and his comely face,
All bathed in blood—the unholy race
Of the hills have laid him to sleep alone,
But tell him, sweet Robin, I follow anon.

"Now, gentlest Robin, thou wilt repair
To where the nettles grow o'er his lair;
Thy song be the broken notes of despair,
And with thy wailing fill the air,
And flutter around his mossy grave-stone,
And tell him that I am coming anon.

"Oh! he was beautiful, oh! he was brave,
And oh! he was faithful, to me he gave
This bright wedding ring; and all that I crave
Is only to share in his peaceful grave;

For there to our bridal bed he has gone,
Haste, fly, Robin, tell him I follow anon.

"Oh! strong is the walls of this tower so hie,
But soon I'll be happy, sweet Robin, as thee;
And thou at our blissful meeting shall be,
To lull us to sleep with thy minstrelsy.
Then haste—away—to my love begone,
And tell him, oh! tell him, I follow anon."

She ceased, and the notes so wild and clear,
Fell sad on the tyrant chieftain's ear,
And again he opened her prison door,
To talk of love, as he talked before.—
She fixed her gaze on his visage grim,
While shook like the aspen her every limb:
As a tiger springs from the yielding ground,
She past him sprung with a single bound,
And she madly shrieked with wild delight,
As she flew to the rampart's dizzy height;
Then turning round, with uplifted hand,
She screamed, "Ho! fiend, black chieftain, stand,
Pursue one step, and your bed shall be
The bed of the lake below, with me.
Hark! hark! the blood of my murdered sire
For vengeance cries from Clagnahayre,*
And the vengeance of his child shall follow
Your steps, like a ghost, o'er height and hollow;
And still this curse in your ear shall cry,
"A bloody death shall you childless die!"
This said, "My Father, I come," she cried,
And down she plunged in the foaming tide.

"CHRONICLES OF THE CANONGATE."

No. V.

THE records of the burgh of Canongate are by no means so important in a historical point of view as might perhaps have been expected. They supply, however, some interesting notes of the proceedings of the authorities during the prevalence of the plague in the sixteenth century. The following minute of council, appointing visitors for the various quarters of the burgh, is the first we find in reference to the pestilence:

"Vicesimo Octobris anno 1568.

The quhilk daye the bailleis and counsall ordainit the persouns vnder-writtin visitors of the housss and persouns dwelland wtin the quarteris following euerye daye to visie quha is seik and quha is haill diligentlie euerie mornyng To wit James hart baillie George barbour Robert Mr and Johnne Watsoun for the first quarter begyuand att Leyt wynd fute and passand to Johnne patersoun bout The second quarter fra Johnne patersoun to Cuthbert fergusson The visatouris thair of Johnne Schort baillie Johnne hunter James Graye and Robert purvis The third quarter fra Cuthbert fer-

* "Clagnahayre."—This malediction was signally fulfilled a short time after. In the month of June, 1378, as the Monroes of Foulis were returning from a predatory incursion, they offered the chief of Clan Chattan a share of the booty, as use and wont, for the liberty of passing through his country. The haughty Macintosh, however, demanded the whole, when a bloody conflict ensued at the Point of Clagnahayre, and the savage chief was slain. The Monroes then returned to his castle of Moy, which they reached by means of rafts of wood, cut from the adjoining forest, and put the whole of the inmates unmercifully to the sword.

gussoun passand to Sanct Johnnis croce on baithe the sydis of the gait The visatouris thair of Thomas hunter, baillie, Johnne Achiesoun, Williame broun and George Skaithwne."

About this time there were what were called "extentaris" [assessors] chosen for the support of the poor. It appears that the affected were taken to "the hill," without the burgh, where suitable accommodation was no doubt provided for them, until their recovery:

"Quarto Novembris, anno 1568.

The quhilk daye It is statuit and ordanit be the bailleis and counsall thatt na maner of baxter nor na wthir Traffikar being suspectit of the pest put furthe on the hill and clengt and thairefter brocht in wtin this burche vse na change trafik nor [] in na maner of waye for the space of fourtie dayis eftir thair incoming of the hill and als thatt na Inhabitar wtin the samyn maltman baxter brouster fleschers or onye wthir trafikar or craftsman quhatsemevir haifand onye vevors. to sell hant frequent or vse thameselvis wt onye persoun or persouns suspect of the said seiknes nor that nane of thame ressaif onye siluer fra siklyik persouns bot thatt thaye ressaif it in ane uesthell and skaid the samyn thatt it maye be purifeit fra all conta-geousnes certefeing the saidis persouns that gif onye of thame sal happin to do the contrare and thairbye to be infectit or onye wther nychtbour in thair default in maner fairsaid thaye incontinent [forthwith] thaireftir sall suffir the panis of deithe for ye samyn wtout ferther [] of Judiciall Law."

"decimo die mensis Januarii, anno 1568.

The quhilk daye it is statute and ordanit be the bailleis and counsall thatt na Inhabitar wtin this burch tak vpon hand to Luge onye stranger in thair housse bot that thaye incontinent eftir the said stranger be ressavit to luge in thair saidis housss cum and schaw the samyn to the bailleis of this burche swa that the persouns names be knawin be thame vnder the paine of deid."

These measures were no doubt stringent enough, though this should not surprise us, when we consider the consternation which prevailed in our own time when the cholera appeared amongst us.

Of the other historical notabilia of the sixteenth century, we have scarcely a glimpse. In the treasurer's accounts for 1572-3 there is the following entry:

"To James Brouklaye for rowing of the staines of the croce quhen the English cannonnis come to sege the castell—xviijd."

The council had—on the 10th October 1572—ordained "Johnne Hart Thesaurer to vpput and big sufficientlie the corce and quhatt expensis he makis thairvpoun salbe allowit to him in his comptis."

These entries refer to the civil war between the friends of Mary and the partisans of the Regent Mar, when the castle of Edinburgh was invested by an English force under Sir William Drury. The author of the "Historie of James the sext," relates that "the Regent, Johnne Erle of Mar, for beseageing of the toun of Edinburgh, cawsit nyne pece of ordonance, great and small, be brought to the Cannogait, to have assailzeit the east port of the toun; bot that place was not thocht commodious, wherefore the gunnis war transportit to a fauxburg of the toun, callit Pleasands; and thairfra they laid to thair batterie aganis the toun walls, whilk began the tent of September, and shot at a platfurme whilk was erectit upon a housheid, pertaining to Adame Fullartoun."

The meetings of the council were held within the Tolbuith, which building is repeatedly mentioned amongst the earliest of the records in a manner that attests the antiquity of the building:

"Vndecimo decembris, anno 1567.

The quhilk daye it was concludit be the bailleis and counsall to pursue quhatsumevir persoun that is knawin or brutit wt the breking of the tolbuith of this burcht the tyme of the furthe lathing of Jonet robertsoun being werdit wtin the samyn for adultrie, and ordanis the thesaurer to delyuir to Cuthbert fergusson xls. to be expenss for lettres and officers in pursuit of the said caus and the said Cuthbert to mak compt vpoun his debursing."

In the treasurer's accounts for 1572-3, the following item occurs:

"To sax pynonis [pinions?] att the bailleis command for taking down of the lintall stane of the auld tolbuith windo—iijjs vid."

The authorities were very tenacious of the privileges of the burgh. None but freemen burgesses were permitted to exercise any calling within its boundaries:—

"Quarto Decembris 1567.

The quhilk daye the bailleis and counsall staituit and ordanit that na maner of craftismen nor maltmen be admittit stallangearis earlier nor the feist of Witsoundaye nixt to cum nor sufferit to use onye of the saidis craftis without thai be admittit be the saidis bailleis and counsall but that thaye betuix and the said feist mak thameselvis friemen and be admittit burgesses and paye thame burgeschip thairfoir conforme to the act and ordinance maid thairanent," &c.

The letters t and c in the Canongate records of this period are so precisely similar, that the sense of the word alone decides what they are. Stallangear or Scallangear is explained by Jamieson in his "Dictionary of the Scottish Language," as "one who sets up a stall for selling his goods during a market." "The word," he adds, "in Dumfries, denotes a person, not a freeman, who is allowed to carry on business, for a small consideration to the corporation to which he belongs, for the term of a year, in the same manner as freemen do."

The supervision of the magistracy comprehended all matters. The importation and selling of wine was the subject of special attention:—

"decimus octavo die mensis
Septembris anno 1568.

"The quhilk day it is statute and ordanit be the bailleis and counsall thatt na maner of Inhabiter w^t in this bruchte ventaris or topparis of wyne tak vpoun hand to sell onye derar wyne fra this daye furth nor xvid the pynt vnder the painis of xviij. of vnlaw sa oft as thaye or onye of thame failze vnforgevin and gif onye of the saidis Inhabitaris be fund contravening the said act and ordinance thryis the contravenar thairfoir sall tynce his fredome and sall on na wayis be sufferit to vent wyne fra that tyme furthe unto the tyme he be of new admittit be ye saidis bailleis and counsall vnder ye panis of escheatynge of ye saidis wynis that sal happen to be ventit be thame in the meane tyme."

The rouping of the "wyne say," which seems to have formed part of the common good, was a matter of considerable importance:

"secundo decembris
anno 1568.

"The quhilk day the bailleis and counsall eftir the rolping of thair wyne say for this present zeir w^t ane consent and assent hev sett the samyn to George barbour and George Skaytwne for the space of ane zeir fra thair entrie ilk entrie wes and began at the first incumming of the first schip that come hame this zeir w^t new wine and swa to continew quhill the hamecoming of the first schip w^t new wyne the next zeir payand thairfoir sax merks sax s. viiid monye at the ische [close] of the said zeir and for suir payment thairfoir to be maid att the said terme Johnne hunter thesawrer is becomin cautionar and scourtie thairfoir and the saidis George and George obleist thame and thair airis to frei and releif the said Johnne hunter anent the said scourtie and payment for the said sowme."

The "wyne say" appears to have been a large vat, let for the use of the various importers of wine. It is curious that we do not find the word say in Jamieson's Dictionary. It means, in Ayrshire, where the word is common, a large sort of boyn, or tub. Another minute still more decidedly show that the "wyne say" was burgh property:

"Quarto Maii 1570.

"The quhilk daye the bailleis and counsall hes sett thair wyne say for this present zeir quhill the nixt vantage for sax markis monye to thair officer."

The wine trade seems to have been a matter of very considerable importance in the burgh, if we may judge from the number of laws enacted, in respect to age, price, and quality, for regulating the "vending" of it.

COLONISATION OF ULSTER BY JAMES I.

THE IRISH SOCIETY AND THE CITY COMPANIES.

SOON after the accession of James I. to the throne, the entire suppression of the rebellions of O'Neil, O'Donnell, and other northern chieftains, and the possession of the greatest part of Ulster, which the confiscation of their lands ensured to him, left him full freedom to carry into vigorous operation, on a limited scale, a scheme that he had long cherished, of regenerating the country, and identifying it in institutions, laws, civil and religious polity, habits of industry, domestic economy, and customs, with Great Britain. Some of his predecessors, especially Elizabeth, meditated such a scheme; but they failed, from various reasons, to give it effect. James, seeing the causes of former failure, skilfully avoided them. In former reigns, grants of lands given to individuals, especially in Munster and Leinster, were so large, and accompanied by so few stringent stipulations, that they defeated the objects they were intended to promote. Many of the old settlers forgot the terms of the contract by which they held their possessions, built castles, and fortified houses in the richest portions of the country, assumed a semi-royal authority, and drove the natives, whom it was the wish of their rulers that they should protect and civilise, into the recesses of the woods and glens. Thus they dragged out, in many cases, a wretched existence, without industry or security, hatching conspiracies, and occasionally sallying out to plunder or destroy the property of the English, who in their turn inflicted terrible retribution. Thus, in place of harmony and social improvement, feuds and barbarism were propagated; and it is a remarkable fact, that this anomalous state of society brutalised both classes alike. But James designed to produce, by an equitable distribution of property and power, and by an impartial dispensation of the imperial protection, such a complete amalgamation of both races as would tend to their mutual and permanent benefit—make the English more friendly to Ireland, and the Irish more industrious, happy, and loyal to England. He consulted the most experienced and judicious counsellors who could offer him practical suggestions, but the most sagacious and efficient of his advisers was Sir A. Chichester, the lord deputy of Ireland, from his intimate knowledge of the localities, of the habits and manners of the people and their chiefs, and of their wants and their wishes. Having then, mainly by his advice, formed his plan, he pursued it resolutely. His first step was to abolish the ancient laws and customs by which the natives were bound, knowing that their existence would be an insuperable barrier against the introduction of his measures. By their Brehon laws every crime, even murder, was punishable only by fine, called Eric, which was levied according to the rank of the criminal or the sufferer. After Fermanagh, the territory of the M'Guire, had been made an English county, Sir W. Fitzwilliam, the lord deputy, sent word to M'Guire that he was about to send a sheriff into his district to execute the royal commission. M'Guire answered he would be glad to receive him, but requested to know, in case his head should be cut off, what Eric should be demanded, in order that he might be prepared to have it levied on the district. By the law of gavelkind, all the land of every kind of a sept was divided after his death among his male children, illegitimate as well as legitimate; or the superior chief could make a new distribution as he liked among his descendants. Hence there was no fixed tenure of property, no incentive to industry, no encouragement to agriculture, to which alone they could trust (in the general absence of trade) for subsistence. No man was stimulated to till or plant when he had no security for the perpetual enjoyment of the fruits of his labours himself, or of the power of transmitting it as he pleased. Even the office of chieftain was not necessarily hereditary, for by the law of tanistry, (i. e. thaneship or chieftainship) it was conferred by the election of all the members of the clan. These elections were often carried by fraud and bloodshed. Though the chieftains had almost absolute power, yet they mainly derived their income from established dues contributed by the clan, or from oppressive exactions. Thus it appears that there were no definite laws of property, and but few of the elements of personal or national prosperity.

His next step was to take all the property of the country under his own jurisdiction—to require the surrender of all the private estates then held by those who had not incurred attainder. These he regranted to the original possessors, subject to such regulations as he deemed it necessary to impose, so as to prevent all future oppression of the people. In fine, he abolished all former privileges, and by doing so, removed all clogs on industry, and allowed no authority or power to exist, save those of the monarch and the law.

His third step was to have a survey taken of all the forfeited property in the province; to have the best sites selected for towns and villages; and to prepare the way for the introduction of courts of judicature.

Having thus laid the groundwork, he erected his plan. He divided the planters into three classes—1st, English or Scotch; 2d, Servitors, or those who had served the English Crown in a military or civil capacity in Ireland; and 3d, Native chieftains and inhabitants, among whom (as an example of his conciliatory spirit) were included many who had taken part in the preceding rebellions. These latter were allowed the privilege of selecting as tenants whomsoever they liked from their own religion and country. Servitors were allowed to select their tenants from England or Ireland, provided they did not admit recusants, or those who refuse to take the required oaths to the British crown; but the British undertakers were obliged to confine themselves to English or Scotch tenants. The Irish settlers were obliged to fix their residences in the open country and the most unguarded places, where they lived under constant inspection, and from the nakedness of their position were compelled to be pacific. The positions of the greatest strength and command were assigned to the British, thus reversing the state of things in the south in the reign of Elizabeth, and guarding against evil consequences, as the Irish could not form their hostile plans unseen on the mountains, or in the woods and glens, and then rush on the British located on the plains. To the Servitors were assigned the stations of the greatest danger and advantage to the service of the Crown, from their knowledge of the country and the people; and to enable them to perform this service they were allowed a body of guards and maintenance for them.

As there were three classes of settlers, so there were three portions of all the sequestrated property through the six counties. The first proportion consisted of 2000 acres; the second, of 1500; the third, of 1000; and each settler was allowed one lot, and one only. One half of the whole forfeited land in each county was divided amongst the smallest proprietors; and the other half among the two other classes of proprietors; and to prevent disputes, or the chance of favouritism, the settlements were to be granted by lots; and further, to make allowances for waste lands, as bogs, glens, &c., a new mode of measurement, since known as the Irish plantation measure, was adopted. These grants were all made to the occupiers and their heirs forever.

The undertakers of 2000 acres were to hold of the king in capite—were to build a castle, and enclose a strong court-yard, called bawn, as a defence against incursions, within four years—were to plant upon their lands within three years forty-eight able men of English or Scotch birth, to be reduced to twenty families—to keep a demesne of 600 acres in their own hands—to have four fee farmers on 120 acres each—six leaseholders on 100 acres; and on the rest, eight families of husbandmen, cottagers, and artificers. The undertakers of 1500 acres were to hold by knight's service, and were to erect a house and bawn within two years. The two latter classes were proportionably under obligations similar to the first class, and all the conditions of the grants were rigorously enforced, under certain penalties. An annual rent from all the lands was reserved to the Crown for every 60 English acres; 6s. 8d. from the British undertakers; 10s. from servitors; and 13s. 4d. from the Irish natives. But for two years they were exempt from such charges, except those natives who were already on the lands, and not subject to the expense of removal.

All were bound to reside within five years after the date of their patents on their settlements, either personally or by agents approved of by the state, and maintain an armed defence. The British undertakers and the Servitors were not to alienate their lands to the mere Irish, lest their lands might in process of time fall into the hands of those who might refuse allegiance to the British Crown, or to demise them to persons who refused to take the necessary oaths of supremacy, &c. They were under obligations to let their lands to tenants at determined rents, on leases of less than 21 years, or three lives. Their tenants' houses were to be constructed in the English style, and be united in villages for the greater security. They were empowered to erect minor courts of judicature, and grant tenures. The old natives to whom estates were granted in fee simple, to be held in socage, had the same privileges and were placed under the same obligations. They were required to grant leases at certain rents, and on the same terms as other undertakers, to take no exactions from them, and to oblige them to forsake their Scythian mode of wandering for pasture for their cattle (which was called creaghting), to dwell in villages, and to conform to the English course of life for the purposes of civilisation.

The corporation of London was induced to co-operate with the King in this great undertaking, and accepted, under his stipulations, of immense tracts of territory in the county of Derry. In avowing his sense of the importance of this corporation, he said, "When my enemies hear that the city of London hath a footing in Ireland, they will be terrified at looking into it as the back door of England and Scotland." (He alluded to assistance given by the Catholic powers on the Continent to the rebel chiefs, and by so doing thought they could surprise the kingdom of England on the rear.) The corporation undertook to expend £40,000 on their portion of the settlement; and, independently of erecting many villages and minor towns, to build the cities of Derry and Coleraine. This they did most nobly. These two towns are glorious memorials of their liberality and spirit. In order to support the charge of keeping up a necessary force for the protection of the settlement, he instituted the order of baronets, which was to be an hereditary dignity, and was to be conferred on a number of not more than 200, each of whom was, on taking out his patent, to pay into the Exchequer a sum sufficient to maintain in Ulster 30 men at 8d. a-day.

The settlement granted to the corporation was the most important, both in the extent of territory granted, and its influence to this day. Having estimated the necessary outlay at £40,000, they determined to divide it into twelve parts, to be distributed by lot among the twelve principal companies, who were to pay each a proportional part of the outlay, and receive a due proportion of the income. In case any one of the principal companies did not pay its proportion, then other inferior companies were to be united with it, so as to make up the deficiency. No one principal company subscribed its full proportion of £333, 6s. 8d. except the Grocers and Merchant Tailors, who exceeded their full proportion, the excess being joined to the contributions of the defaulters. In all 55 companies subscribed, and thus made up the full sum. In order to conduct the plantation with greater efficacy, a society was formed, consisting of a governor, a deputy-governor, and 24 assistants, constituting a sort of board of control and management. This is known as the Irish Society of London, and was incorporated in 1613. Charles the First arbitrarily destroyed this society, and usurped the whole of the estates to himself. But the estates and the functions of the society were restored by Cromwell, and Charles II. confirmed by charter all the possessions and rights which the city originally enjoyed. For a long time, from mismanagement, from granting long leases at a nominal rent on the payment of fines, or from declining to expend the outlays, and giving the encouragement to tenants necessary from time to time; in a word, from swerving from the conditions of the grant, the settlement was allowed to run to waste. The society, however, has of late actively taken up the question of the improvement of these estates, and is using every effort to compel, if not induce, the companies to do their duty to the occupiers, by expending a great portion of their incomes on improvement. Notwithstanding the mismanagement or neglect of some of the companies, the value of the property has risen from the time of the original grant to the enormous amount of "one hundred fold." What would it not become under a better system of stewardship, and under a more judicious proprietorship, which, by dealing more liberally with the tenant, would reap ample profit for itself? Four of the companies have alienated their lands by letting them in perpetuity, and, therefore, cannot now be held responsible for their management—the Haberdashers, Goldsmiths, Vintners, and Merchant Tailors. The Skinners (who possess the largest tracts, and, if well managed, the most profitable), and the Salters have let their lands on terminable leases, which in a few years will expire. The remaining sixth, Clothworkers (whose lands lie on the river Ban at an average distance of three miles from the town of Coleraine), the Grocers (whose lands lie within five miles of Derry), the Fishmongers (whose lands lie at a distance of about twelve miles from it), the Ironmongers and Mercers have their estates in their own hands. Of these the Mercers alone, it appears from the last report of the society, feel the obligations imposed by the original grant, and the duties which they owe to their successors, and to the interests and welfare of their tenantry. There has been a dispute of long standing between the society and the companies as to the extent of the society's power in the disposal of the companies' revenues in improvements on the estates, the companies averring that the society are only their trustees, answerable to them for all their revenues, without possessing any discretionary power of applying any portion of them to the benefit of the estate, or any other public purpose; while the society contend that, by virtue of their own charter, and the terms of the original grant, they have the power of expending as much of the revenues as is expedient for improvements and useful purposes, and they are responsible to the companies only for the surplus. In the case of the Skinners' Company, Lord Langdale decided, in 1838, in favour of the society.

But it was not only in reforming civil society—in introducing secular civilisation—in modelling the rights of property on a secure and useful basis, and in promoting peace, industry, and prosperity in Ulster, that James did that province great and lasting service. He was equally alive to the interests of religion. The Church was in a state of utter decay; he revived and strengthened it. When he undertook the regeneration of the province, the incomes of most of the bishops did not yield competent maintenance for men of learning or station, in consequence of the inroads previously made on the revenues of the Church, and the apathy or the cupidity of the new undertakers; and the clergy were even in a more miserable condition. The benefices were some of them retained by the bishops in commendam, or sequestration, and some were filled by men of immoral lives. The flocks were generally abandoned, the churches were in ruins, and divine service was rarely performed except in the towns. To remedy these abuses, he ordained that the lands previously belonging to the Church should be restored, that compositions should be made with new undertakers for the sites and the erection of churches and dwellings for the clergy, threatening that if the landowners refused to comply they should lose their grants. He compelled the bishops to relinquish their impropriations and parochial tithes to the incumbents, who were to enjoy, besides, glebe lands, varying from 60 to 120 acres, according to the size of their parishes. Each allotted property was made a parish, containing a parish church. To provide for a good succession of priests, he established and endowed free schools in the chief towns. He also gave large grants of land to the University of Dublin, together with the advowson of six parishes, three of the largest and three of the middle proportions, in each county. In addition to all this he incorporated several towns, and granted right of representation in Parliament.

THE LORD MARR'S ORDERS.

ANCIENT GUNS—THE ARMORY AT CASTLE GRANT.

THE degree of perfection to which our English artizans have now brought the art of gun-making can hardly be surpassed; and we look back with an interested eye on the specimens—preserved in armories and in the cabinets of the curious—of this kind of manufacture that were imported, centuries ago, from Germany and Spain. Fire-arms are said to have been introduced into Britain about the year 1471; and fifty years later they were used at various sieges on the Continent. It would, however, appear, in one instance at least, that the gun found a place, amongst other weapons of warfare, in the halls of our Highland chiefs at an earlier period than either of the dates alluded to.

Amongst several ancient guns in the spacious armory at Castle Grant, in Strathspey—the seat of the honourable family of Grant of Grant for upwards of eight hundred years—there is a well preserved gun which bears the following Latin inscription:—

“Dominvs . Iohannes . Grant . Miles . Viccomes . de . Inuernes . M . E . Fecit . In . Germania . Anno . 1434.”

Assuming that this curious piece of continental workmanship came into the possession of the Laird of Grant, at the time specified in the inscription, we find that it has been retained in the family for upwards of four centuries. The stock is of singular and antique construction. It reaches almost to the mouth of the barrel, and the butt is ornamented with figures of men on horseback and animals of the chase, &c. The barrel is four feet two inches in length; and the calibre about six or seven eighths of an inch. The delicacy of finish, and richness of mounting, are surprising, when it is considered that this interesting relic was manufactured in the middle ages. It was no doubt deemed of exquisite workmanship, and of great value, by the various Lairds whose property it successively became. From its narrowness of bore, and length of barrel, it is calculated to drive a bullet to a great distance; and we can easily conceive what deadly effect it must have had in the hands of the redoubted Sheumas nan Creach, when marching home from the low country with some scores of beeves, and the rightful owners following on his track. In the entrance room of Castle Grant there hangs a half-length portrait of the renowned Sheumas, painted in 1645. His appearance is mild and unassuming, and noways in keeping with his undaunted and enterprising character as the leader of an intrepid band of clansmen, bent on plunder and rapine. For his cattle-lifting propensities he was held prisoner in Edinburgh for a considerable time. It is, moreover, very probable that the gun in question did some service, in various pursuits, after the neighbouring clansmen—especially the Lochabermen, who made frequent incursions into Strathspey with the view of driving away the bestial on the Laird's property. The armory, however, contains a much more formidable gun than the one we have been describing, but of later manufacture, and which, tradition says, was also successfully used against these depredators. This huge piece is known by the appellation of "The Lady's Pocket Pistol." It is some seven or eight feet in length, and the bore is of proportionate width. The strength of an able-bodied man is hardly sufficient to raise this monster gun; and it is accordingly provided with a rest, which was stuck into the ground, and the gun laid upon it, when a steady and deliberate aim was desired. Various other guns, in the same collection, are also similarly furnished. Additions seem to have been made to the armory by the various Lairds down to the time of Sir James Grant of Grant, the father of Lord Seafield, the present proprietor. Towards the end of the last century, this patriotic gentleman raised and equipped a regiment at his own expense; and the muskets and other paraphernalia then used form the largest portion of the collection, which includes several Spanish guns. There are, besides, a number of old pistols, some of them bearing date "1701." They contrast curiously with the pistols of our own day. It might interest some to learn the price given in "Scots monie," by the "Vice-Comes of Inverness," for the remarkable piece which bears his name; but this cannot be ascertained without reference to the family papers, where the fact of its purchase may be stated. LOCHMORE CASTLE.

PARISH OF HALKIRK—CAITHNESS-SHIRE.

LOCHMORE CASTLE is situated about eight miles above Dirlot. It stood just on the bank of the loch, hanging over the first current of the river out of it. In that place the river is very narrow, and very deep, and withal very current. It is said, by report, to have been built and inhabited by a personage called Morrar na Shean, that is, Lord of the Game or Venison, because he delighted in these rural sports. It is said also that there was a chest, or some kind of machine, fixed in the mouth of the stream, below the castle, for catching salmon in their ingress into the loch, or their egress out of it; and that, immediately as the fish was entangled in the machine, the capture was announced to the whole family by the ringing of a bell, which the motion and struggles of the fish set agoing, by means of a fine cord that was fixed at one end to the bell, in the middle of an upper room, and at the other end to the machine in the stream below. This is by no means improbable; for in these days, when the salmon were more plenty than they are now, and had a free course, that stream and that loch must have been swarming with fish; and it would be so still, had not our modern inventions prevented it.

This Morrar na Shean, according to report, was very anxious and impatient to have a son to inherit his estates and honours; but he had only three daughters successively, at which he was so disappointed and enraged, that he maltreated the mother and the daughters; and the mother, dreading more and more her husband's displeasure and ill usage of herself and the infants, detached them privately to a place where, without his knowledge, they were reared up into very beautiful and accomplished young ladies, all along amusing the barbarian husband and parent with the laudable pretext that they were dead. Morrar na Shean, at last despairing of having any more children, and making a vast regret that he had no child at all, his lady availed herself of the favourable opportunity, presents him with his three daughters, and thereby converts his rage and discontentment into a transport of joy and surprise. The happy snare disarmed him of his terrors; the charms of his daughters infused a complacency through his whole frame. The interview is a scene of love, heightened by a happy mutual disappointment; and he thanks God that his estates would not be under the belt of one man, as he called it. They are soon disposed of in marriage; the eldest to a Sinclair from the Orkneys, the second to a Keith, and the last to one of another name, but of some rank.

This story is wild and romantic, but is by no means irreconcilable to the savage notions and barbarous usages of these dark and superstitious times. It may not be altogether according to the original fact, but is exactly the current tradition of the neighbourhood. It may be too much exaggerated by the embellishments of fancy; yet, we are persuaded, it is founded on some event of this nature that has taken place in these times, otherwise it would not have been so currently and so sacredly transmitted from age to age by oral tradition. Who this Morrar na Shean was, we cannot find; but we suspect that he was one of the Harolds, who had one of his seats at Brawl, and retired occasionally to his hunting-seat at Lochmore for his amusement; for this reason he was called by the mock name of Morrar na Shean, i. e. Lord of the Venison or Game, because he loved the one for his table and palate, and the other for his sport and amusement. It cannot be expected that we can ascertain the era when this wonderful story happened, though we doubt not, had we access to the archives of the old families in the country, but we might trace it out, at least by way of induction. Suffice it, that it has the appearance of a very old story, and that it is very probable that these marriages gave the Sinclairs and the Keiths, who came over here more immediately from the Orkneys, the first footing in Caithness, where, in a short time, they grew so great and powerful; and to make this still the more probable, there was a Keith a viceroy, if we recollect aright, in the Orkneys, under the Danish monarchy, before any of that name, and perhaps of the name of Sinclair, had a footing in this country.—Caithness Chronicle.

LEGEND OF THE DEVIL OF ARDROSSAN.

SIR FERGUS BARCLAY of Ardrossan was inordinately addicted to horse-racing, and carried his exploits into all the neighbouring countries of Europe. His success in these pursuits was so great, and he became so famous, that all competition with him seemed hopeless. This, in the spirit of the times, was ascribed to an enchanted bridle, which it was believed he possessed in virtue of a secret compact with the devil; and hence his alarming soubriquet—"The Devil of Ardrossan." At last, however, as ill luck would have it, this instrument of the baron's sporting infallibility was, by chance, or treachery, transferred to the head of a rival's horse, and thus he saw his power depart from him, and his sun of glory set for ever! Leaving him, no doubt, to exclaim with Macbeth,—

"Accursed be that tongue that tells me so,
For it hath cow'd my better part of man!
And be these juggling fiends no more believed."

How the Baron comported himself, or bore this trying disclosure of his secret, seems unfortunately, from some cause or other, to be pretermitted in the story. But the final terminus of his career is thus tragically related:—Leaving home on a distant journey, he gave strict injunctions to his lady regarding the care of his only son, a youth of tender years; in particular, that the young man should not be permitted to mount a spirited horse, of which he was exceedingly fond. During the father's absence, however, the youth had found means to obtain the horse, and unhappily riding out, was thrown from the animal and killed on the spot. This, of course, could not be concealed, and on Sir Fergus's return home, such was the ungovernable violence of his feelings, that in a paroxysm of rage he slew the unhappy mother of his child! There is another version of the story, which says that she was not the mother of the unfortunate boy, but the second wife of his father, by whom she had an only child, a daughter; and accordingly it is surmised that, desirous of the succession to the estate opening to her own offspring, she was not altogether sakeless of the death of young Barclay. Be this as it may, all future happiness was now reft from the miserable Sir Fergus. He retired with a favourite servant to the opposite island of Arran, and there, at the lone tower of Kildonan, ended his wretched days. A remarkable allusion to Ireland occurs in the story, while he sojourned here; and the manner of his death was this:—He had a presentiment that, should he ever set foot on Irish ground, he should no longer live. It so happened, that some Irish boats calling there had left a quantity of sods, which they had brought with them, on the beach; and the baron chancing, as he passed, to tread on them, inquired how they came there. Being told, he exclaimed, his end was now come, and giving orders regarding the disposal of his corpse, he died that same night. He commanded that his body should be sewed up in a bull's hide, and buried within sea-mark. This was punctually attended to by his faithful servant; but the sea afterwards washing off the sand, the body floated across the channel to the shores of Ardrossan, and landing immediately under the walls of the castle, was taken up in its sere-cloth, and finally interred within the adjoining chapel.

In this brief tale, the termination of the ancient barons of Ardrossan seems pretty distinctly shadowed forth; and the historical fact of the fate of Sir Fergus Barclay, at the battle of Arscoll, may be the foundation of the whole.

The original parish church of Ardrossan stood close by the castle, and though long removed, its site is still to be traced. Within its area lies an ancient tombstone, which tradition appropriates as that of Sir Fergus Barclay. On it is sculptured the figure of a man at full length, with two shields of arms laid over him—one appears to represent the royal arms of Scotland, being the Lyon rampant—the other is probably the escutcheon of the deceased. Before the building of the new town, this was an exceedingly secluded spot, and the superstitious dread which was entertained for the sanctuary of "the Devil of Ardrossan," was very great. It was believed, that were any portion of the "moulds" to be taken from under this stone, and cast into the sea, forthwith should ensue a dreadful tempest to devastate sea and land!

Some fragments of the castle of Ardrossan still remain on a beautiful eminence overlooking the splendid harbour, and are encompassed on one side by a row of elegant villas of recent origin. It was long the principal residence of the Lords Montgomerie and Eglinton; until the time of the civil war, when, as we are informed, it was demolished by Cromwell's army. In an account of the district, written 200 years ago, the following curious description and anecdote of it occurs:—

"Ardrossan castell, so named in respect it is situated on a swelling knop of a rock running from a tounge of land advancing from the mainland in the sea, and almost environed with the same; for roas in the ancient Brittick tounge signifies a biland or peninsula. This castell is very strongly and weil built, having in it many rouses, and a spring of fresch watter, which makes it the more strong. In this castell there is a tower, named the red tower, and in it a vault called Wallace's lardner. For this castell being in the possession of the English, Wallace used this stratageme:—He set a house hard by a fire, that those who kept the castell, not suspecting any fraud, came out to the reskeu of the house, which they imagined by accident to have taken fire. But Wallace, with a weil armed company, gives them a very hote welcome, and kills them every mother's son; and furthwith forces the castell and wins it. In this deep vault in the bottom of the red tower, flang he the carcatches of these English, which to this day gave it the name of Wallace lardner.

"There is one thing to be admired in the fountain of fresch watter, which is in a vault in this castell; for it, like to the sea, ebbs and flows two severall times each 24 hours.

Its banks to pass, doeth tweiss assay,

And tweiss againe reiteirs each day.

The reason is, from the ebbing and flowing of the salt sea, which environs the rock whereon the castell stands, and at each surge, with horrible repercussions, regorges the fresch watter, not letting it isseu from its spring, and so makes the fountain swell. This castle was for many ages possessed by the Barclays; for in a charter of Sir Richard Morvell, lord Cunningham, to the monastery of Kilwinning, Richard de Barclay, dominus de Ardrossan, is a witness. Now it belongs to the Earls of Eglinton."

The above is an essay to restore a mutilated poem inserted in a note to his Preface, by the Editor of the Second Volume of the Spalding Club Miscellany, "as preserving the name of an author who, it is believed, has not hitherto been noticed by any historian of Scottish poetry." The poem originally occurs in some half-register, half-common-place-books of the sixteenth century, kept or collected by Walter Cullen, "wicar and reder of Aberden." The keeping of this register does not seem to have devolved upon the reader in virtue of his office, although the facility it afforded of acquiring the necessary information may have suggested the idea, for we find the kirk-session purchasing his "Bookes of Baptisme, Mariage, and Buriall" from his daughter, after his death. This being the case, as the above mentioned Editor remarks, "the keepers even of public and official registers in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries so often inscribed verses on the spare pages of their records, that there need be no surprise at the miscellaneous contents of Walter Cullen's register, designed as it was for his own private use." The few following extracts will give some idea of the Reader's Miscellany.

"Meggye Emsly, pwir woman in Aberden, departtit the xxii day of Februar, the yeir of God 1574 yeiris."

"Johne Ewyne, burgis of Aberdene, was conwykett for false coyne, and hayngitt, his heid cut-

* Lythis—Ladies? † Instead of?

tit fray his body, the xxvi day of Agwist, the yeir of God 1574 yeiris."

"Johne Giddy, sumtyme ane gray feir in Aberdeen, departtit the xx day of November, the yeir of God 1575 yeiris."

"On Wednesday the xiiij day of November, the yeir of God 1577 yeiris, was sene at ewin ane blaissin starn, quhilk stuid in the wast, and continywat that nycht, to the gryt admeratioune of the pepill."

"Johne Wschartt, cordinar, departtit the xiiij day of Merche, yeir of God 1588 yeiris, quha was slayne be James Paterson, hangman of Aberden, the said James hayngit, and his heid sett on the Portt thairfoir."

"Ane lipar boy, in the Lipa Howiss of Aberden, departtit the xviii day July 1589 yeiris."

"Ebarbara Card, wiche, was bryntt on the Hedownis Hill, the xviiij day June 1590 yeris."

These, along with several poems, some incidents of Scotch history, and a host of births, marriages, and deaths, form the Register-book of Walter Cullen. Of Nicolsoun, the probable author of the above poem, we can gather nothing. The words printed in brackets, the inverted comas, and the punctuation, we have supplied according to our best understanding of the drift of the author.

CURIOUS RECOVERY OF AN ANCIENT MS.—At the late meeting of the Cambrian Archaeological Association, the Dean of Hereford mentioned that there was a treatise on music belonging to the cathedral of Hereford; the date of the document was 1260. Its modern history was curious, and he was happy to state that he had been the means of recovering it for the cathedral. This document having been missed from the library of the cathedral, he was conversing with Mr Hawes, Lutanist to her Majesty, who told him he had a curious ancient treatise on music, and, upon it being produced, it proved to be the identical missing document. Mr Hawes had purchased it in Drury-lane for five shillings.

MARSHAL MACDONALD.—"We [Montreal Herald] learn that Mr Macdonald, late an officer in the British army, and an inhabitant of this city, has been declared heir to the Dukedom of Tarentum, and the property attached thereto. This dukedom is, we believe, in Italy, and was created by Napoleon in favour of the celebrated General (Marshal) Macdonald. Mr Macdonald's good fortune was announced to him by his excellency Lord Elgin."

"So may desert in arms be crowned."

Such are the freaks of fortune. The son of an obscure fugitive from the field of Culloden becomes a duke and Marshal of France, shedding lustre on the rank he had obtained by his bravery in the field, by his wisdom in the council, by his stratagetic skill, and, above all, by the moderation, mildness, and unspotted integrity of his character in public and private life. Him, Napoleon long neglected; and yet, on his misfortunes occurring, he found Macdonald alone faithful among the faithless of his supporters. Macdonald maintained his stern principles of integrity to the last, and evinced his affectionate love of his fatherland by a visit, in his old age, to the stormy Hebrides, and by liberal largesses to his kin and clan. Now, an emigrant from these remote isles, probably pinched in his means, and oppressed by remembrances sad and decent pride, finds himself suddenly elevated from a lone, obscure retreat to a ducal coronet and a peerage of France!

ORIGIN OF THE BARONETAGE OF SCOTLAND AND NOVA SCOTIA.

THE order of Baronets of Scotland and Nova Scotia, respectable as is the position now held by its members, may be traced to certain originating circumstances, rather derogatory, it must be owned, to the historical importance of the body. From the time that James VI. of Scotland attained to the throne of the three kingdoms, the poor monarch was never left for one hour at peace by his primary subjects of the north. They seemed to think that the Eldorado of which he had become master, was a prize in which they were fully entitled to share; and they accordingly pressed him with incessant demands for gifts, grants, and gold, till they almost drove him crazy. In vain did he issue proclamation on proclamation, forbidding the needy Scots to cross by land or sea the line of the borders; the invaders were not so to be daunted. It must not be supposed, nevertheless, that all of them thus acted from barefaced and unjustifiable cupidity. On the contrary, many were fair and honest creditors, simply claiming the payment of debts long ago incurred by the king to them or theirs, while others with equal reason demanded the fulfilment of promises made in requital of past services. Be this as it may, the subjects of his "aunciente native realme" of Scotland gave to King James a vast deal of annoyance, after his ascent of the English throne. They were his "whaup in the raip" as he himself would have said. Many were the schemes, as already observed, which he fell upon to check the mischief, but without success. In his latter days, however, he did finally hit upon a notable plan for the removal of the evil, though it came too late to ensure his own personal ease. This plan consisted in the establishment of the "Baronetage of Scotland and Nova Scotia."

During the century preceding the reign of James, the Spaniards and Portuguese, then the most daring and successful of naval adventurers, had been engaged in exploring the Atlantic, Pacific, and Indian Oceans, and had conquered vast tracts of country in the Americas and in the East, where, in due course, they founded extensive and lucrative settlements. All this was done on the plea of spreading the Christian religion, and the victorious conquerors had always laid their mighty conquests at the feet of the Pope. His holiness, while granting absolution for all the bloodshed which had been caused, very naturally acknowledged the compliment paid to him, by formally investing the sovereigns of Spain and Portugal with unlimited sway, (always vicariously, or under himself,) over the far lands which their subjects had respectively conquered. Now, British navigators had been far from lying idle during the same era. They had made very considerable discoveries in North America and elsewhere; and it appears to have at length struck King James, that he, Defensor Fidei, the head of the Protestant Church, might imitate the example set before him very happily, and moreover, even improving thereon, kill two, if not more birds with one stone. It was not convenient, certainly, for the English monarch to give away his regal supremacy over entire countries, as the Pope did; but there was nothing to prevent his granting, to whom he chose, certain allotments of land in the far regions conquered by the British arms, and so promoting the first and most important end of settling these territories. By such grants the king saw that he might very comfortably stop the mouths of many obstreperous claimants upon his bounty. But then, there required to be additional temptations thrown in the way; and, as the majority of those for whom James was continually called on to provide consisted of the younger branches of honourable and respectable northern houses, his majesty devised the alluring scheme of a new order of baronetage, to be specially connected with Scotland, and to be formed on the model of that which, urged by nearly the same motives, he had already created for the settlement of Ulster. A territorial grant, and a titular honour to every receiver of such grant, were to be held out as new inducements, and they were "strong inducements both." But there was yet a third purpose to be served. One of the Caledonian leeches who stuck most staunchly to the purse of the poor king in those days, seems to have been Sir William Alexander of Menstrie, for a long time principal secretary of state for Scotland. To gratify this personage, King James had assigned to him the office of Lieutenant-General of the British Crown in North America generally, and the special lordship and superiority of the province of Nova Scotia under the crown, with plenary powers to settle the country, erect towns, administer justice, and so forth. But Sir William seems speedily to have found this to be somewhat of an empty honour, the accounts of Nova Scotia in those days being by no means so seductive as those given of the balmy and gold-veined regions, settled by the Spaniards and Portuguese in the south of the new world. Accordingly, emigrants were not forthcoming, and

Observe how admirably the king and the privy council of Scotland arranged matters on this occasion, so as to attain the various ends which his majesty had in view, and, above all, how dexterously it was contrived to gratify Sir W. Alexander by pecuniary advantages, as well as to allure others into the enterprise by most liberal grants of lands, honours, and privileges. The following extracts are from the original records:—

"And whereas we are given to understand that the countrey of New Scotland being dividit into twa provinces, and eache province into severall dioceses or bishopriks, and each diocese into thrie counteys, and eache countey into ten baronys, everie baronie being thrie myle long upoun the coast, and ten myle up into the countrie, dividit into sex parochies, and each parochie contening sax thousand akars of land, and that everie Baronet is to be ane Barone of some one or other, of the saidis baroneis, and is to haife therein ten thousand aikeris of propertie besydis his sax thousand aikeris belonging to his burgh of baronie, to be holden free blanche, and in a free baronie of your Majestie, as the Barones of this kingdom, for the onlie setting forth of sex men towards your Majestie's Royal Colonie, armed, appareld, and victualld for two years, and everie Baronet payeing Sir William Alexander Knight ane thousand merkis of Scottis money, only towards his past charges and endevoiris, therefore our humble desire unto your Majestie is, that care be taken by suirtie, actit in the bookis of Secret Council, as was in the plantation of Ulster, that the said number of men may be dewlie transported thither with all provisions necessarie; and that no Baronet be maid, but onlie for that cause; and by some suche ane particular course onlie as your Majestie shall appointe. And that articles of plantation may be sett forth for encouraging and inducing all others who have habillitie and resolution to transport themselves hence for so noble a purpose."

This is a liberal enough scale of grants, it will be admitted on all hands; and the provision for Sir William Alexander must be felt to be a most ample one for that age, the Scottish merk being in value about thirteen shillings sterling. Sir William, however, appears to have persuaded the king soon after to give him a chance of getting a little more money by the affair. The old secretary had bethought him that there might be many wealthy and untitled landholders in Scotland, desirous of buying the dignity of baronet, without having any wish either to go out to Nova Scotia personally, or to send out men there—or indeed to trouble themselves further about the matter in any way. Accordingly, the king, doubtless on due prompting, signified his pleasure by royal letter, dated March 1625, that should any "Baronet choose rather to pay two thousand merks than to send out six men," then the affair might be so arranged with the concurrence of Sir W. Alexander. Though it is added that the six men were to be raised upon a portion of these funds, the thing looks very like what we now-a-days call a "job."

King James died within a few days after writing the preceding missive, and it was left to his son, Charles I., to create the first or "Premier" Baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia, which he did on the subsequent 28th of May 1625. Sir Robert Gordon of Letterfourie, whose descendants yet survive, was the personage on whom the honour fell; and the charter in which his rights are laid down formed, with slight alterations, the regulating model for all similar occasions. It is a most extraordinary document, and shows how wondrously bountiful men can be in giving away what may barely be called their own. Supposing the rights of discovery and seizure, however, to have made Nova Scotia fairly the property of the British crown, it is fearful to observe the state of bondage into which the baronets were empowered, by charter, to plunge all the other emigrated inhabitants, and to what an extent they were privileged to engulf in their own maws all the possible produce of the country. The claims of ultra-feudalism were nothing to those recorded in the following resumé of the rights and immunities granted to the Nova Scotian baronets:—

1st, Territorial.—A grant of sixteen thousand acres of land, to be incorporated into a full, entire, and free barony and regality for ever, to be held of the kingdom of Scotland in blench farm, for payment yearly of one penny, if asked only; the said regality to extend three miles in length alongst the sea-coast, and six in length inland, with gifts of benefices, patronage of churches, fisheries, huntings, minerals, mines, pearls, jewels, offices, jurisdictions, and power of pit and gallows (to-wit, heading and hanging at will), as plenary as had ever formerly been enjoyed by whatsoever noblemen under the crown of Scotland; also, with express power of planting the said regality, and of transporting thence from Scotland, or any other parts, persons, goods, and chattels, &c.

2d, Seignorial.—The right and liberty to erect cities, towns, villages, corporations, burghs of barony, &c.; of making and appointing captains, commanders, leaders, governors, mayors, provosts, bailies, justices of the peace, constables, &c.; of making such particular laws, ordinances, and constitutions as should be deemed expedient for the good order and police of the regality, with the heritable justiciary and sheriffship of the same; the power of judging and discerning in all causes as well civil as criminal, within the bounds; of holding courts of justiciary, sheriff courts, courts of free regality, and baron and barony courts; also of appointing their officers, and of exacting and appropriating all escheats, amercements, &c.; also of imposing and levying tolls, customs, anchorages, &c. &c.

3d, Commercial.—The right of erecting free ports, harbours, naval stations, &c., of building ships, craft, vessels, &c., as well for war as merchandise; of importing and exporting from and to Scotland or any other country, wares, merchandises, and commodities of whatever description, for payment of the sum of five pounds Scots money of custom for every hundred pounds only, without payment of any other custom, impost, or duty of any kind; also of imposing and exacting five pounds for every hundred, on all goods imported into Nova Scotia by the colonists, and ten per cent. on all imported by foreigners.

4th, Legislative.—The right, either personally or by deputy, of a suffrage and vote in framing all and sundry the laws to be made concerning the public state, good, and government of the realm of Nova Scotia, in all assemblies, parliaments, synods, councils, and conventions, to be called together, convened, or held for that end; and that no person or persons whatsoever, who should not be heirs of the said baronies of regality, should have vote or suffrage in framing whatsoever laws concerning the said realm, without the advice, counsel, and consent of the Baronets.

5th, Dignitorial.—Precedency above Barons, and next immediate to Lords.*

This charter, it will be seen, grants numerous despotic seigniorial rights which had long been practically abolished or disused in the mother-country, and indeed gives to each petty baronet, within his own territory, an amount of power far exceeding that of the King of Great Britain himself within his realm.

Not many years afterwards, the very granter of this charter lost his royal head for attempting to exercise but a tithe of the powers and privileges here accorded by him to others!

The creation of the order of Nova-Scotian Baronets was now fairly begun; and, in the course of a few weeks, nine other similar titles and grants were conferred. By looking at the list, we shall soon note the foresight of Sir W. Alexander, in taking the "two thousand merks" in hard cash. Such great landholders as Campbell of Glenorchy, and Wemyss of Wemyss (both raised to the peerage soon afterwards), whose names are on the roll at this date, never could have dreamt of a colonial excursion in person to Nova Scotia; but they were no doubt willing enough to pay for a fixed hereditary title, in place of remaining commoners, or holding the rank of knighthood dependent for renewal in each generation, on the king's pleasure. As such like parties were not baronets of the colonising kind, and yet were desirous, no doubt, to take seisin of their purchased grants in Nova Scotia, old Sir William, always provident, had his remedy prepared. He had had it laid down in the formula of the charter, that "the realm of Nova Scotia, and original infeftment thereof, is holden of the kingdom of Scotland, and forms part of the county of Edinburgh." Argal, to take seisin and instruments of possession "on the Castle Hill of Edinburgh," formed a cure for every difficulty, and served the desired purpose as well as if the baronets had indulged in a trip to the actual site of their new possessions.

From this time forward, all things went swimmingly on with the new order of titled dignitaries. During the reign of Charles I., from the erection of the order in 1625 to the year 1649, one hundred and twenty-two baronets were created in all. More than one hundred of these received the stipulated territorial qualification, and sixty-four of them took seisin at the gate of Edinburgh castle. So far, therefore, the show of making the order serve the purpose of a great colonising fraternity continued to be kept up during the time of the first Charles. But, in reality, the whole was but a show. We believe, that, of the hundred and twenty-two baronets mentioned, scarcely one (if one) ever set foot in Nova Scotia, even the seisin-takers going through that process seemingly as a mere formality. In truth, there appears to have been but one personage who made a serious personal attempt at that time to settle in the colony; and that party was the eldest son of Sir W. Alexander. He had been out there before the erection of the baronetage, and it was ostensibly to recompense in part his outlay that the order was created. One of the few emigrative expeditions to Nova Scotia, in the reign of Charles I., occurred in 1630, and is mentioned in Balfour's Annals, as consisting of "fourteen ships, furnished with men, women, children, and all necessaries. They had with them two hundred and sixty kine, and other live cattle, for their use at their arrival." Most of the men were "handicraftsmen of good quality and substance."

On the whole, it will be apparent that the order failed altogether to answer the colonising ends for which, professedly, it was mainly intended. As regards the remuneration of Sir W. Alexander, created latterly Earl of Stirling, that personage must have received large sums, if, as is most probable, the two thousand merks were originally paid with exactitude. The fees of the first 122 baronets, counted in full, would amount to above £150,000 sterling. Suppose a third to be deducted here for outlays and casualties, the remainder would still form an enormous sum for those days.

If the order failed to serve its ends in the days of Charles I., of course its increase, as well as progress, may be understood to have totally ceased in the time of Cromwell. Charles II., on his restoration, recommenced the creation of baronets freely, finding it, no doubt, an easy way of recompensing, at least with nominal honours, the Scottish adherents of his father and himself in their adversity. But the title remained an honour, and nothing but an honour, ever after the days of the first Charles. The territorial grants were thenceforward made to no new members; and we presume that the successors of the Earl of Stirling lost the right both to the 1000 merks with the "sex men," or the 2000 without the "sex men." During the period of Cromwell's sway, in truth, commerce and enterprise prospered greatly, and numerous parties moved voluntarily across the Atlantic, to whom royal edicts were but a jest. When Charles II. was restored, Nova Scotia obtained its share also of the down-fallen puritans. In short, independent settlers got their footing so firmly established in the country, that the English Monarch never attempted to renew the arbitrary allotments of his father, nor ventured to intermeddle with the ordinary slow, but sure course of colonisation. The same remark may be made as to all of the succeeding sovereigns of Great Britain before the Union, at which epoch the creation of baronets of Scotland and Nova Scotia came to a close, as did likewise the creation of Peers (proper) of Scotland. About 280 baronets had been created in all; and nearly 170 or 180 successors to the original titles still exist, and hold, as is well known, a most respectable middle place betwixt the nobility and the gentlemen-commoners of our country.

Such is something like a fair sketch of the rise and progress of the order of knights-baronets of

* Barons in this clause must be understood to signify what the Scots call Lairds, not Lords of Baronial rank, or Peers of Parliament.

Scotland and Nova Scotia ; and in the way related was the roll of the order closed, and its leading ostensible objects departed from or defeated. After all, the scheme of King James was one indicating no little address and knowledge of mankind. That singular, but shrewd monarch, as observed, had three ends to serve ; firstly, the proper colonisation of Nova Scotia—for we may allow him patriotism enough to have desired to see this new portion of his dominions set well a-going ; secondly, the satisfying, in a decent manner, of the countless and importunate claimants on his bounty from his “auncients native kingdom ;” and, thirdly, the provision of a fair competence for his “auld and trustie servante,” Sir W. Alexander, or rather the suggestion of a mode by which the superiority granted over Nova Scotia could be made most available to that deserving gentleman. The scheme, we repeat, was well planned, and combined in all its parts—dignities, and the prospect of emoluments, being thrown aptly and strongly into the foreground. But fate and the course of civilisation were against the project, and accordingly, long ere the list was closed, a baronetcy of Nova Scotia became, as it now is, a mere titular dignity.

It will be remembered by many that an attempt was made of late years to revive the claims of the Scottish baronetage to their original landed rights in Nova Scotia. Few prominent members of the order took any share in the business ; and of those who did so the plea was, that the statutes and royal missives according such rights had never been repealed. We are afraid that the miserable remnant of the military knighthood of St. John, which still exists in some nook of the world, might call for the cession to them of their old island domains of Rhodes and Malta, nay of part of the Holy Land itself, with as much feasibility as attends such a claim on the part of the Scottish baronetage to Nova Scotia. An attempt to fit out a colonising expedition, which never took place, and regarding which some unhappy exposures of individual parties were made, put an end to the new Nova-Scotian proposition for the time—probably for ever.

By the way, we cannot close this notice of the history of our Scottish baronetage, without mentioning that many of the titles usually admitted into almanack lists are held by their existing claimants upon very doubtful grounds. There are numbers who certainly can trace their unbroken descent from the original receivers of the charters, and whose claims are beyond all dispute ; but there are also not a few cases where a baronetage is held at this day upon no better authority than that of a service-jury's decision, and where no charter, nor paper of any kind, has been adduced in corroboration. We know one instance, where the mere evidence of a few old men and women, recounting the hearsays derived through several generations, led to a servicerhip at law, and settled on the claimant what is now a most respected title. As the possession of a baronetcy confers no real privileges whatever, legal, social, or political, such transactions have usually passed without observation. The order itself, too, has been careless in looking into doubtful claims, and has allowed probabilities and possibilities to take the form and place of realities.

Enough on this theme, however. It is as a point in the history of titular dignities, not without its share of amusing interest, that we have thus long dwelt on the origin and progress of the Baronetage of Scotland and Nova Scotia.*

WILLIAM HAMILTON OF GILBERTFIELD.

THE name of Hamilton of Gilbertfield, as he is styled, is less familiar to the reader of Scottish poetry than we think it ought to be. True, the effusions of his muse which have been preserved, are not so numerous as to entitle him to prominence amongst the versifiers of his country ; but, from the few pieces known to have emanated from his pen, it cannot be denied that he possessed a considerable vein of poesy. Scanty, however, as are his writings, the particulars of his long, and for some time active life, are still more limited. His ancestors, a branch of the ducal family of Hamilton, owned the lands of Ardoch, near Kilwinning, from an early period. Andro Hamilton, third son of Robert, fifth laird of Torrance, obtained a charter of them from the Abbot of Kilwinning. He was also, by royal charter—15th July 1543—appointed “Principal Porter and Master of Entrie to our Sovereigne Lady, and her Governor of all her Palaces, Castles,” and other strongholds, during life. Captain William Hamilton, father of the poet, acquired the property of Ladyland, near Kilwinning, about the middle of the seventeenth century. Shortly afterwards he “biggit a new house, of twa stories, with sklates,” in lieu of the old castle of Ladyland, which he demolished ; and which had been the residence of Hew Barclay, who, entering into a conspiracy to overturn the Protestant religion in Britain, and having taken possession of Ailsa Craig, about 1593 or 1597, as a preliminary step towards effecting his object, rushed from the rock into the sea and was drowned, rather than allow himself to be captured. A portion of the “new house,”—now the old mansion—still remains, bearing the name of the proprietor, with the date 1669. Captain Hamilton was one of those who refused the Test Act in 1684, and was in consequence disarmed. He fell in action against the French, during the wars of King William. He married in 1662, Janet, daughter of John Brisbane of that ilk, by whom he left two sons, John, his heir, and WILLIAM, the subject of our brief memoir. The precise date of either of their births is not known. It is presumable, however, that the latter was born sometime between 1665 and 1670. He entered the army early in life, and served many years abroad. He rose, however, no higher than the rank of lieutenant, which commission he held “honourably in my Lord Hyndford's regiment.”

* For some very singular notices as to the “Baronets of Nova-Scotia,” and “pretenders or assumers of such dignities,” we refer the reader to a recent publication, entitled,—Nova Scotia Baronets and British-American Association.—Report of the Action of Damages for Alleged Libel, Broun (soi disant Sir Richard) against the Globe Newspaper. With Introductory Remarks relative to the above Scheme and the “Illustrious” order connected with it.—8vo, Edinburgh, Thomas G. Stevenson.

On retiring on half-pay, he resided at Gilbertfield, in the parish of Cambuslang. Whether the property was his own does not appear. His being styled "of Gilbertfield" would imply that it did, though it may have been adopted merely in contradistinction to Hamilton of Bangour, who was a cotemporary. "His time (says a writer in the *Lives of Eminent Scotsmen) was now divided between the sports of the field, the cultivation of several valued friendships with men of genius and taste, and the occasional productions of some effusions of his own, in which the gentleman and the poet were alike conspicuous. His intimacy with the author of the Gentle Shepherd, three of his epistles to whom are to be found in the common editions of Ramsay's works, commenced in an admiration, on Ramsay's part, of some pieces which had found their way into circulation from Hamilton's pen." This was not the case. At all events the correspondence began with Hamilton. These familiar epistles, as they are termed, are highly creditable to the poetical talent of both parties; yet, without depreciating the merit of Ramsay, we think the superiority may be justly awarded to the Ayrshire poet. His verses are characterised by an easy flow of composition, not possessed by those of Auld Reekie's much-famed bard. The correspondence took place in 1719. Though the epistles "are to be found in the common editions of Ramsay's works," and have lately been reprinted in the People's Edition by the Messrs Chambers, we venture to say they are comparatively unknown. In this belief we shall take the liberty of copying Hamilton's introductory letter entire:—

"O famed and celebrated Allan,
Renowned Ramsay, canty callan,
There's nower Highlandman nor Lowlan,
In poetrie,
But may as soon ding down Tamtalan,
As match wi' thee.

For ten times ten, and that's a hunder,
I hae been made to gaze and wonder,
When frae Parnassus thou didst thunder,
Wi' wit and skill,
Wherefore I'll soberly knock under,
And quat my quill.

Of poetry the hail quintessence
Thou hast suck'd up, left nae excrescence
To petty poets, or sic messens,
Though round thy stool
They may pic crums, and hear some lessons
At Ramsay's school.

Though Ben and Dryden of renown,
Were yet alive in London town,
Like kings contending for a crown,
'Twad be a pingle,
Whilk o' you three wad gar words sound
And best to jingle.

Transform'd may I be to a rat,
Wer't in my power but I'd create Thee upon sight the laureat
Of this our age,
Since thou may'st fairly claim to that
As thy just wage.

Let modern poets bear the blame,
Gin they respect not Ramsay's name,
Wha soon can gar them greet for shame,
To their great loss;
And send them a' right sneaking hame
Be weeping-cross.

Wha bourds wi' thee had need be wary,
And learn wi' skill thy thrust to parry,
When thou consults thy dictionary
Of ancient words,
Which come from thy poetic quarry,
As sharp as swords.

Now, though I should both reel and rotte,
And be as light as Aristotle;
At Edinburgh we sall hae a bottle
Of reaming claret,
Gin that my half-pay siller shottle
Can safely spare it.

At crambo then we'll rack our brain,
Drown ilk dull care and aiking pain,
Whilk often does our spirits drain
Of true content,
Wow, wow! but we's be wondrous fain
When thus acquaint.

Wi' wine we'll gargarize our craig,
Then enter in a lasting league,
Free of ill aspect or intrigue;
And, gin you please it,
Like princes when met at the Hague,
We'll solemnize it.

Accept of this, and look upon it
Wi' favour, though poor I hae done it:
Sae I conclude, and end my sonnet,
Wha am most fully,
While I do wear a hat or bonnet,
Yours—Wanton Willy.

POSTSCRIPT.

By this my postscript I incline
To let you ken my hale design
Of sic a lang imperfect line,
Lies in this sentence,
To cultivate my dull engine
By your acquaintance.

Your answer, therefore, I expect,
And to your friend you may direct
At Gilbertfield: do not neglect,
When you have leisure;
Which I'll embrace wi' great respect
And perfect pleasure."

Who can fail to trace in these lines the germ of the more celebrated familiar epistles of Burns? This is particularly the case in the Bard's first letter to Lapraik, where we have the social proposal of Hamilton to drink a bottle of "reaming claret," and have a set-to at "crambo" with Ramsay at Edinburgh, thus reiterated:—

"But Mauchline race or Mauchline fair,
I should be proud to meet you there;
We's gie ae nicht's discharge to care,
If we forgather,
And hae a swap o' rymin' ware,
Wi' ane anither.

The four-gill chap, we's gar him clatter,
An' kirsen him wi' reekin' water;

Syne we'll sit down an' tak our whitter,
 To cheer our heart;
 An' faith, we've be acquainted better
 Before we part."

Ramsay, in reply to Hamilton, pays a high compliment to his genius—

"Sae roos'd by ane o' weel kend mettle,
 Nae sma' did my ambition pettle,
 My canker'd critics it will nettle,
 And e'en sae be't:
 This month I'm sure I winna settle,
 Sae proud I'm wit.

When I begoud first to cun verse,
 And could your Ardry Whins rehearse,
 Where Bonny Heck ran fast and fierce,
 It warm'd my breast;
 Then emulation did me pierce,
 Which since ne'er ceas't.

May I be lickit wi' a bittle,
 Gin of your numbers I think little,
 Ye're never rugged, shan, nor kittle,
 But blyth and gabby;
 And hit the spirit to a tittle
 Of standard Habby."

It would thus appear that to the few and now almost forgotten productions of Hamilton, who was the senior of Ramsay by at least sixteen or twenty years, we owe the poetical emulation of the author of the Gentle Shepherd. The pieces alluded to by the latter, are the "Last Dying Words of Bonny Heck, a famous Greyhound in the Shire of Fife," and "The Life and Death of the Piper of Kilbarchan." They appeared in Watson's "Collection of Comic and Serious Scots Poems, both Ancient and Modern," printed at Edinburgh in 1709. The verses on "Bonny Heck" possess no great merit, yet, as they are rare, a specimen may be gratifying:—

"Alas! quo' bonny Heck,
 On former days when I reflect!
 I was a dog much in respect
 For doughty deed:
 But now I must hing by the neck,
 Without remeud.

What great feats I hae done mysel':
 Within clink o' Kilrenny bell,
 When I was souple, young and fell
 But fear or dreud:
 John Nees and Paterson can tell,
 Whose hearts may bleed.

At the King's-muir and Kelly-law,
 Where good stout hares gang fast awa',
 So cleverly I did it claw,
 Wi' pith and speed,
 I bure the bell before them a',
 As clean's a bead.

I wily, witty was, and gash,
 Wi' my auld farrant pauky pash,
 Nae man might ance buy me for cash
 In some respect,
 Are they nae then confounded rash,
 That hangs poor Heck?

Now honesty was aye my drift,
 An innocent and harmless shift,

A kail-pat lid gently to lift,
 Or am'ry sneck;
 Shame fa' the chafts dare ca' that theft,
 Quo' bonny Heck.

But now, good sirs, this day is lost,
 The best dog in the East-nook coast:
 For never ane durst brag nor boast
 Me for their neck;
 But now I must yield up the ghost,
 Quo' bonny Heck."

The elegy on the Piper of Kilbarchan is much superior and better known. It is valuable as recording several customs of our forefathers now forgotten:—

"—Wha will cause our shearers shear?
 Wha will bend up the brags of weir,
 Bring in the balls or good play meir,
 In time o' need?
Hab Simson cou'd, what needs you speer?
 But now he's dead!

So kindly to his neighbours neist,
 At Beltan and Saint Barchan's feast,
 He blew, and then held up his breast,
 As he were weid;
 But now we need not him arreest,
 For Habbie's dead!

At fair he play'd before the spearmen,
 All gaily graithed in their geir-men;
 Steel bonnets, jacks, and swords so clear then,
 Like ony bead:
 Now wha shall play before such weir-men,
 Sin Habbie's dead?

At Clark-plays when he wont to come,
 His pipe play'd timely to the drum,
 Like bikes of bees he gart it bum,
 And tun'd his reed:
 Now all our pipers may sing dum,
 Sin Habbie's dead!

And then, besides, his valiant acts,
 At Bridals he won money placks,
 He bobbed aye behind fo'ks backs,
 And shook his head:
 Now we want mony merry cracks,
 Sin Habbie's dead.

He was convoyer of the bride,
 With kittock hinging by his side:
 About the kirk he thought a pride
 The ring to lead:
 But now we may gae but a guide,
 For Habbie's dead!"

The piper, in former times, was an essential adjunct on the "hairst rig." "To the poetical enthusiasm thus excited and kept alive," says the writer already mentioned, "we are probably indebted for many of those airs and songs which have given Scotland so unrivalled a celebrity, while the authors of them remain as unknown as if they had never existed." At bridals, too, it seems, the piper convoyer or accompanied the bride. The only other poem apparently by Hamilton, in Watson's Collection, is an "Epitaph on Sanny Briggs, nephew to Habbie Simpson, and butler to the Laird of Kilbarchan." It is in the same strain as the elegy on the piper, and equally graphic:—

Alake for evermore and wae !
 To wha shall I, when drouthie, gae ?
 Dool, sturt, and sorrow will me slae,
 Without remeed:
 For hardship ; and alake-a-day :
 Since Sanny's dead :

Weel did the master-cook and he,
 With giff-gaff courtesie agree,
 With tears as fat as kitchen fee,
 Draught frae his head :
 Alake-a-day ! though kind to me,
 Yet now he's dead :

It very muckle did me please,
 To see him howk the Holland cheese :
 I ken the clinking o' his keys
 In time o' need :
 Alake-a-day ! though kind to me,
 Yet now he's dead :

In 1722, Lieut. Hamilton published an abridgement, modernised, of Henry the Minstrel's Life of Wallace. It was, however, considered an injudicious undertaking, and brought him neither profit nor fame. From Gilbertfield, the poet, towards the close of his days, removed to Latterick, in Lanarkshire, where he died "at a very advanced age" on the 24th May 1751. He married a lady of his own name—probably a relation—by whom, it appears from the parish records of Kilbirnie, he had a daughter baptised Anna on the 16th of June 1693, so that he must have entered the matrimonial state at an early period of life. Whether he left any issue is unknown. The Hamiltons of Ladyland, however, are not without descendants. The brother of the poet, having sold the property to the ninth Earl of Eglinton, about 1712, proceeded to the north of Ireland, where he purchased an estate, which was subsequently disposed of by his son and heir, William, who, returning to Scotland in 1744, bought the lands of Craighlaw, in Galloway. The lineal representative of the family, William Hamilton of Craighlaw, is, or was lately, an officer in the 10th Hussars. He was one of the protesters against the Veto Act of the General Assembly in 1839.

JOHN TAMSON'S WALLET.

Who John Tamson was, is not known with certainty. We are inclined to think that no particular individual was meant, but that the whole is an allegory. Dunbar, it is well known, wrote a poem addressed to the king, every stanza of which concluded with the line, "God, gif ye war John Thomson's man ;" which the learned Pinkerton imagines to be a corruption of Joan Thomson's man, thereby implying or insinuating that in any controversy between Joan Thomson and her man, the grey mare was the better horse ; a fact which, though it cannot now be decided, is not unlikely. We have ourselves heard a neighbour dropping casually into a company already assembled, welcomed with the expression, "Come away, we're v' John Tamson's bairns." We have, however, glimpsed in vain at parties using the phrase, as to the precise meaning attached to it, or whence they derived it ; the nearest approach to an explanation being that extorted from a Leith porter, who declared that it was the same as if he had said, "we're a' penny pies ;" but when asked again what he meant by such a statement as the latter, which was even more extravagant than the other, he declared, like the gravedigger in Hamlet, that he could not tell.

The first verse of the song is as follows :—

"John Tamson's wallet frae end to end,
 John Tamson's wallet frae end to end ;
 And what was in it ye fain would ken,
 Whigmaleeries for women and men."

Now, our idea of the meaning of this is, that the wallet was the Roman Catholic Church in Scotland, and that John Tamson was the Pope. This will be more clearly seen from what follows :

"About this wallet there was a dispute,
 Some said it was made o' the skin o' a brute ;
 But I think it was made o' the best o' bend,
 John Tamson's wallet frae end to end."

There was a controversy, that is to say, as to the purity of the church ; which we all know to be historically true.

"This is the way the wallet went on,
 It carried some kail to the kirk for John ;
 But they a' ran through, before it was kenne'd,
 John Tamson's wallet frae end to end."

The poet means to say that the people became disaffected and left the church before any suspicion was excited in the minds of the priesthood.

"This is not a thing a wallet should do,
 Either to John, or me, or you ;
 So he turned it inside out to mend,
 John Tamson's wallet frae end to end."

Alluding to the efforts at repressing some of the more public scandals of the church, by the dignitaries.

"Do ye ken how the wallet lost its life ?
 John filled it with stanes to leather his wife ;
 But she rave it to rags, or ever he kenne'd,
 Aye, and leathered John Tamson frae end to end."

The wife is the Christian public, or church universal, which is the spiritual bride of the Pope ; and the allegory as to the catastrophe is so simple and so completely in accordance with the universally known facts, that explanation is unnecessary.

Without pressing our explanation as the only one that can possibly be given of this difficult song, we leave it to your better judgment to decide whether it is not at least exceedingly apt and probable. C. C. S.

[C. C. S. appears not to have seen the notice of "John Thomsoun's Man" in No. 2 of the Journal. The conclusion he arrives at in reference to the "Wallet," derives some support from an allusion in Rabelais' Gargantua, a strong and broadly humorous satire on the Romish Church, first published at Lyons in 1532. Gargantua is represented as being educated under the care of the "Sophisters," or monks ; and, at a succeeding period, as having been purged with "anticyrian hellebore" (the Holy Scriptures), under Protestant divines. Under the first of his tutors Gargantua learns only to eat, drink, and play at several games, by way of varying his amusements, or to fill up the intervals betwixt his meals. In the translation by Urquhart and Motteaux, Gargantua is thus pictured after dinner :—

"Then blockishly mumbling with a set on countenance a piece of scurvy grace, he washed his hands in fresh wine, picked his teeth with the foot of a hog, and talked jovially with his attendants. Then the carpet being spread, they brought plenty of cards, many dice, with great store and abundance of checkers and chess-boards. There he played."

A list of no less than 217 games follows, among which occurs—"JOANE THOMSON," and "Earle Beadie." Some of the other games are thus named :—The Fib; Reynard the Fox; Nivini-nack; Even or Odd; The Charming of the Hare; Trudgepig; The Unshoeing of the Ass; Gossip lend me your sack; Nicknamrie; The Sanct is Found; The Quoits; Nine Pins; The Hat Bowles; Rogue and Ruffian; The Whirling Gigge; Hide and Seek, or are you all hid; The Hobgoblins; St. Cosme I come to adore thee; Fair and Softly passeth Lent; Shoggyshou; Blind Man's Buff; Jack and the Box; Ho the Distaffe; Hinde the Plowman; Bo-peep; The Cornish Chough; &c.]

"CHRONICLES OF THE CANONGATE."

No. VI.

THE price of commodities was regulated by the magistrates :—

"Decimo octava die mensis die Novembris anno 1568.

The quhilk day It is statuit and ordanit be the bailleis and counsall of this bruche that na Inhabitars wthin the samyn baik onye breid fra this daye furthe bot that the four peny laif be weil baikin and dryit guid and sufficient stuf and keip the mesouris and paik of xxii. vnceis and that all wther breid to be baikin be thame les and mair keip the paik conforme thairto and that na browstaris nor dry tapetaris sell onye deirar aile nor vid. the pynt vnder the panis of xviiiis. for the first falt the second confiscatioun of breid and aile that salbe apprehendit the second and last falt spanyng from the occupatioun for evir and siklyik that na inhabitaris wthin this bruche ventaris of wyne bye na new wyne derar nor that they maye sell the samyn commounlie to all our soueranis leigis for xvid. the pynt vnder the pane of the vnlaw of vi l i to be vptaikin of thame quha dois in the contrar sa of as thaye faille but favour and that thaye sell na deirar new wyne fra this time furthe bot for xvid. the pint vnder the pane of fyf pundis."

Of the sanitary state of the community, some idea may be formed from the fact that swine were permitted to run loose on the High Street prior to 1583, when an attempt was made to put down the nuisance :—

"Octavo Novembris anno 1563.

The quhilk day the bailleis and counsall convenff hes statuit and ordanit that all maner of personnes inhabitantis within this burch haveand ony swyne that thai keip the samyne in fastnes swa, thai cumm nocht on the hie street and gif thai be fund in ony yaird or nychtbouris skaith It salbe

The records of the burgh afford occasional glimpses of the more noted portions of its ancient boundaries—as in the following minute :—

"Quarto Augusti anno 1568.

The quhilk daye the bailleis and counsall ordanis thair thesaurer to caus amend sufficientlie the pairt of the wattir yett and to caus mak ane sufficient lok and key thairto withe ane key and lok to the port and yett passand in to the abbaye knok and als to caus big vpe the fute of raa cloce and ye rowme passand to the justice clerk croftis," &c.

The "wattir yett," or gate, was the principal opening from the east, not only to the Canongate, but to the city of Edinburgh itself. All public entrances were made by it—and many of the state prisoners, on their way to the place of execution, passed through it, the "observed of all observers," in the melancholy procession. The water gate, and the "port and yett passand in to the abbaye knok," have long ago been removed. Another minute occurs in reference to the port of the abbey :—

"Sexto decembris anno 1568.

The quhilk daye The Bailleis and Counsall ordanit Johnne huntar thesaurer to caus amend ye port and yett passand in to the abbaye kirk sufficientlie in tymer work and Irne work and to caus hing ane lok thairvpon and als to caus big vpe the fuit of Ra cloce, and to cast ane stank att the slope yatt cumis fra the Justice Clark landis to the abbaye on the southe syid of this bruche."

Various acts of council regulate the elections and meetings of the authorities. The council—in 1567—consisted of four "auld baillies," three deacons, two treasurers, and four councillors. On the 4th October of that year, "It is statuite and ordanit be the bailleis and counsall foirsaid that in all tymes cuming the Counsall convene and assemblill ilk xiiij dayis anis viz. on Furisdaye att nyne houris begynnand on Furisdaye nixt to com the xiiij daye of October instant and swa to continew ilk persoun that failleis under the pane of the onlaw of viijs unforgevin sa oft as thaye failye." On the 23d October "It was statuit and ordanit be the bailleis and counsall that in all tymes cuming this ordour be taikin anent the cheising of baillies That is to say vpeun Fuirisdaye befor the heid Court of Michelmes the new Counsall to be choisin be the auld and on the Tyisdaye thaireftir and immediatlie befor the heid court the auld and new counsallis withe the diaconis to cheise the bailleis and the rest of the officiaris swa thaye be all of the kirk of God and that the nummer of the Counsell be yeirlie xliij persouns comptand the twa auld bailleis withe the new gif thaye happin to be chargit withe the diaconis."

The magistrates of the Canongate, like those of most other burghs at the same period, did not labour in the public service unrewarded, as appears from the following minute :—

"Decimo sexto Octobris 1572.

The qlk daye the counsall consentis and hes ordanit that the baillies have for this present zeir for thair labouris and travell in thair offices euerie exceeding thair nummer to be delt equallie amangis thame provvding always the saidis baillies be diligent in the inbringing of the rest of the saidis burgeschips to the commoun guid and profit."

With the Reformation came a greater strictness in the observance of the Sabbath. For example, on the 10th of January 1568, "It is statuit and ordanit be the bailleis and counsall that na maner of persoun inhabitat wtin this brucht ventaris of wyne hostaris or topstaris of aill nor wtheris quhat-somer vir thoill or permit onye maner of persone or of preiching fray this daye furthe vnder the pains of fourtie s. to be vptane of the man and wyif quha sicht the saidis tavernaris houss sa of as thaye faillis but favouris."

There are several minutes in reference to the property which had fallen to the share of the Canonicate at the Reformation. On the 17th February 1568, "The bailleis and counsall ordanis thair officers to pas and warne the fewarris of all and sundrie
the landis sumtyme pertenand to umqll maister Thomas hays now callit the laidie land foundit to to cum bringing wt thaim thair few charteris and infeoffmentis of the saidis landis to be sene and considerit be the saidis baillies and counsall as effairis."

The education of youth appears to have been early attended to by the burgh of Canongate. The High School is mentioned in a charter by James V. in 1529, and several notices of it occur in the burgh records:

(5 April 1580.)

"The quhilk day compeirit Gilbert Tailleur scholmaister and renuncit and dimittit his gift burgh in teiching of the youth and farder induring the saidis bailleis and counsall will allanerlie

"Decimo sexto Junii anno 1584.

"The quhilk day the haill bailleis and counsall

ing to the marks being in the hands of the abbot and convent of the petty commouner By and attour the said xx li to be payit be thair said thesaurer on witsunday and martinmas."

Like most other burghs and towns in former times the Canongate had its "minstrel" in the shape of a bigpiper. Repeated notices of this official are to be found in the treasurer's accounts:—

"To Robert Wetherspowne quhilk wes warit on the pyper claise xs

For making of the pyper claise and pasmentis

1573-4.

"To ane new pyper befor James now our pypare 1576.

Item the samein day gevin to James Selkirk officiar, to pay for thair disunion† that playit on

Item for twa stickis to the swasche viij d"

The pyper appears to have been superseded by a drummer in 1587. On the 31st December, in that year, "the bailleis and counsall agreeit with Johnne Thomsone flescheour to serve and pas throw this burch with his drum at four houres in the morning evin for the space of ane year heir-after for the auld dewtie and fund James Eistounne cautiounne that he sould keip his hour wind and weddar servand under the panes of unlaw sa oft

LONDON IN 1560.

(Abridged from "The Pictorial Times.")

In 1560, the Virgin Queen had just ascended the throne of England. The fires of Smithfield were scarcely extinct, and judges and councillors had not as yet had time to accommodate their consciences to the court creeds of religion and politics. There were no newspapers, coaches, standing armies, or national debt;—no colonies, no poor's rates or excise. There were no patriots in the House of Commons, and no traders amongst the Peers. Teetotallers had not yet come into existence, because the China trade had not been established, and ginger beer was unknown; and whatever brandy was used, was certainly not of British manufacture. There was no native literature.
To live was no doubt a tough struggle with thousands; but folks believed that there was room enough on the earth for the whole human family, for no Malthus had taught that nature and industry had been over-producing, and that the poor man was a social evil.

The metropolis had not ventured out of town further than to the village of St Giles, where stands the hospital erected for lepers, by Matilda, wife of Henry I., about the year 1117. At a later period, the gallows, that remedy for the incurable, was transferred here from Smithfield; and when the great civilising machine was again removed to Tyburn, the hangman's prey were always baited with a bowl of ale at the hospital. Passing along eastward, by the side of the fields of Holborn, with a peep at Chancery Lane, near which, on the site of what is now called Southampton Buildings, stood the magnificent palace of the Knights Templars, where Ben Jonson worked as a bricklayer, and where is still to be seen the beautiful gateway, completed, as we are told, almost at the sole expense of Sir Thomas Lovell, about a quarter of a century before, which, with the Hall of Lincoln's Inn, the Stone Buildings, and New Square, comprise all the architectural features of the locality, we come to Ely Place, the famous residence of the Bishop of Ely, and then one of the most magnificent mansions of the metropolis. It was built in the latter part of the eleventh century, and the chapel, dedicated to St Ethelreda, is still open for divine worship. The famous garden, from which the "tyrant Gloster" requested a dish of strawberries on the morning when he struck off the head of Hastings in the Tower, is the site of what is now known as Hatton Garden, Elizabeth having procured the transfer of the house and grounds to her favourite, Sir Christopher Hatton, the celebrated "dancing chancellor." The mode in which her Majesty obtained the coveted possession from the bishop, Dr Cox, is somewhat amusing. Sir Christopher, who was never backward in making use of court favours, had requested her to intercede for him; and as royal requests were then, as now, held to partake of the nature of commands, the "dancing" lawyer obtained a grant from the bishop of the gatehouse of the palace, except two rooms used as prisons for those who were arrested, or delivered in execution to the bishop's bailiff, and the lower rooms for the porter's lodge, the first court-yard within the gatehouse to the long gallery dividing it from the second, the stalls thrice the long gallery, with the rooms above and below it, and some others, fourteen acres of land, and the keeping the gardens and orchards for twenty-one years, paying at Midsummer Day a red rose for the gatehouse and gardens, the bishop reserving to himself and his successors the right of free access through the gatehouse, walking in the gardens, and to gather twenty bushels of roses yearly. These concessions, it might be supposed, would have satisfied the favourite, but they only served to whet his avarice. The Queen was soon induced to write again to the bishop, desiring him to execute an instant conveyance of the premises to herself, until he or his successor paid to Hatton £2000, the sum he had spent on "improvements," as well as covenanting to reimburse him for whatever he might afterwards expend upon the property. This was too much for even episcopal forbearance, and the bishop replied "that they should want an orchard and grounds, and that they should be too much straitened, but that in his conscience he could not do it, being a piece of sacrilege. That when he became Bishop of Ely, he had received certain farms, houses, and other things, which former pious princes had judged necessary for that place and calling. These he received by the Queen's favour from his predecessor, and that of these he was to be a steward, not a scatterer. That he could not bring his mind to be so ill a trustee for his successors, nor to violate the pious wills of kings and princes, and in effect rescind their last testaments. He put the Queen in mind of that rule of nature and of God, not to do that to another which one would not have done to one's self; and that the profit of one is not to be increased by the damage of another way; he told her that he could scarcely justify those princes which transferred things appointed for pious uses into uses less pious." But Elizabeth was not to be moved from her purpose, and the poor ecclesiastic, after enduring great persecution, was forced to surrender, upon condition that the property should be restored whenever he could satisfy the claims of Hatton, who ultimately died, it is said, of grief, when the Queen took it into her head to demand payment herself of certain monies which she had lent him. But we must pass to Smithfield. The annals of this place are unhappily amongst the darkest portions of our national history, but the practice of extirpating belief by fire was going rather out of fashion in 1560. At this period it was still used as a theatre for the display of martial prowess, and was getting into repute more for the sale of beasts than the slaughter of men. Thirty years after, the number of cattle sold in Smithfield was 67,500. It is now above 200,000.

From hence we pass on to Clerkenwell, where straggling houses occupy the site of the magnificent priory of St John's, which was burnt by the commons of Kent and Essex in 1381. St John's Gate is the sole relic left to attest the greatness of the once powerful knights of St John, the heroic defenders of Rhodes, and bulwarks of Christendom. To St John's Gate, now a tavern, Johnson did early reverence, as being in his day the printing-office of Cave. The next halting place in our way is the Charter House, which was founded by the chivalrous Sir Walter Manny, in the time of Edward III., whose biography invests the history of that period with such touching interest. Wearied of the gauds of ambition, he brought over to England, in 1371, twenty-five monks of the order of Benedictine, who being originally established at Chartroux, a village in France, obtained for their convents the name of Charter houses. The site of the building erected in the present instance was a piece of consecrated ground, which Stow says, "remained till our time by the name of Pardon Churchyard, and served for burying such as desperately ended their lives, or were executed for felonies, who were fetched thither usually in a close cart bayled over, and covered with black, having a plain white cross thwarting, and at the fore end a plain St John's cross, without and within a bell ringing by shaking of the cart, whereby the same might be heard when it passed; and this was called the priory cart, and had the privilege of sanctuary." After having been made a burial-place for the multitude who perished of the plague, it was at last covered by the present Charter House, about 1372, and the inmates lived on quietly till the fatal moment when Henry VIII. demanded the surrender of their resources and the renunciation of their faith. The prior, Houghton, together with the superiors of two other charter houses, and two religionists who had formerly belonged to the foundation, were drawn and quartered at Tyburn, for refusing to acknowledge the king's supremacy, and the head of Houghton was set over the gate of his own monastery. But neither the punishment nor the ghastly spectacle could shake the resolution of the brave men over whom he had worthily presided. They steadfastly imitated the prior's example, and in the following month several others were consigned to the gibbet, cut down whilst still living, and their bowels torn from the quivering bodies, after which their limbs were set up in different parts of the city. A recreant monk was appointed as the gaoler of the survivors, who exhorted them to die not for the cause, but to live long and live wise, to subject themselves to their noble prince, and get his gracious favour by doing their duty to his grace. Finding entreaties to be of as little avail as menaces, the apostate monk proceeded to cut off the supplies of provisions. He complained to his employer Cromwell, that the inmates, regarding not the increase of their number nor the decay of benevolence and charity, persisted in "having plenty of bread, and ale, and fish given to strangers in the buttery, and at the buttery door, and as large distribution of bread and ale to all their servants and to vagabonds (travellers) at the gate as was then used, which cannot be." The rites of hospitality were therefore suspended, the remainder of the monks were imprisoned, until at last six were induced, by suffering, to conform; and ten, the survivors of the once wealthy establishment, were kept in prison, until all but one died; "the traitors being dispatched by the hand of God," as one of their tormentors observed. The last relic of the Charter House monks was brought to the scaffold, and the rich prize fell into the hands of the rapacious Henry, by whom it was bestowed upon two of his servants, and from them it passed into the hands of Sir Edward North. The queen was brought here within two days after her accession, and again resided in the Charter for several days in 1561. The building was then purchased by the Duke of Norfolk, who rebuilt a great portion of the place, and made it his chief residence. It was here that he plotted to marry the Queen of Scots, and overthrow the throne of Elizabeth, but being betrayed by the discovery of the key to the cipher of his letters, under the tiles of the roof, was brought to the block in 1572. Subsequently the Charter House fell into the possession of Thomas Sutton, an eminent merchant, whose patriotism, exerted in matters of finance, is said to have delayed the sailing of the Armada, and who bequeathed the house, with various magnificent estates, to form an hospital for the maintenance for ever of scholars and poor gentlemen. Forty-five of the former are now provided with an excellent education, and in due time sent to the university, where twenty-nine exhibitions of £80 per annum, are distributed amongst them, and eighty pensioners are handsomely lodged and fed, with an allowance of £25 a-year for clothes.

The next noticeable edifice is the priory or hospital of St Bartholomew, which was founded by the energetic efforts of a monk of surpassing ability in the reign of Henry I., and at the time of the Reformation was of great importance; the grant to Henry VIII. including the "mansion house, fifty-one tenements lying within the precincts of the said close, five other messuages and tenements, water from the conduit head at Canonbury (the country residence of the Priors of Islington), and lastly the fair of St Bartholomew." The mansion and gardens of Canonbury, are still in existence, the former, once the residence of Elizabeth, is now occupied as a boarding-house. The choir of the priory is the parish church of St Bartholomew, and the celebrated fair is extinct. In 1560, the Blackfriars, introduced by Mary, had just been driven out, and the hospital devoted to its present uses. Following the course of the city wall, we pass by the Cripple-gate, at this time the name given to an entrance to the metropolis. We see the common and field of Finsbury, where, in the time of Ben Jonson, the archers used to come to shoot. To get to Moorgate, the pedestrian crossed over the fields which separated it from the Old Jewry, where the Windmill Tavern presented rare attractions. Alhallowes contained a house of entertainment known as Cole Harbour, a retreat for spendthrifts. Lothbury was famous as the resort of the dealers in metal. Bedlam was outside the city; and Shoreditch consisted merely of a double row of mean cottages, extending to the present church; Spitalfields could not boast of a single house; Aldgate was but a post of defence; and the Minories a large waste piece of ground. The Tower has since lost much of its former attraction. At this time, it had ceased to be a royal residence; but it was still the scene of all the great occasions of state, the treasure house, the prison, and the place of high council. It was from her confinement in the Tower, that Elizabeth was called only the year before to ascend the throne, and the hard lesson which her sister taught was not lost. The Duke of Norfolk, condemned for plotting to marry the hapless Mary of Scotland, lost his head on Tower Hill; and an inscription, dated 1564, records the captivity of the last descendant of George Duke of Clarence, the brother of Richard III., who both found a grave in its gloomy precincts. A history of tyranny might be written in the biographies of its inmates. The rich Jew tortured for his wealth, and the brave Scot or Welshman murdered for their independence; the foreign prisoner captured in war, and detained often in chains until he could procure ransom; the turbulent noble or defeated rival hurried at once from the cell to the scaffold. Henry VI. and his son Edward, Clarence, and the infant Edward V. with his brother the Duke of York, Anna Boleyn, and Lady Jane Grey, patriots, nobles, kings, priests, soldiers, lawyers, and men of letters, the list might swell out till the appalled student would cry "no more of horrors, let me hear of men and not of fiends." We willingly leave the subject, rich as it is in historic recollections, and making our way along Gracious (Gracechurch) Street, and along the narrow thoroughfare where the "Lombards" carried on their business of money changing, with a glance at Escheppes (Eastcheap), not yet rendered famous by the genius of Shakespeare, we hasten to old St Paul's, a structure as famous in its day as the building which now occupies its site. It was begun on the ruins of the original cathedral in the 11th century. Looking down the hill on the valley of the rapid Fleet river, with its vessels lying at anchor, we pass into the cathedral on the morning of a festival. We enter, and at once are fixed in amazement at the scene of enchantment suddenly visible, an apparently endless perspective of lofty arches lost in the distance in a luminous mist or confused blaze of many streams of light, great numbers of persons in many-coloured dresses moving to and fro, solemn sounds at once press upon and bewilder the attention. As we gaze more steadily, that wonderful perspective becomes more clear, until at last, for nearly seven hundred feet, we can follow the range unbroken from the tessellated marble pavement below to the roof with gilded groins above, of arches upon arches, and of the dim but richly painted windows at the top. The glorious vista is terminated by a rose window of great size, but appearing from hence scarcely larger than the flower from which it borrows its name, whilst its colours, revelling in the intensest of dyes, appear mingled into one glowing but nameless hue. There seems to be no end to the wealth that has been lavished upon the place. Gold, silver, rubies, emeralds, pearls, begin to lose their value from their profusion; add the croziers of the seventy priests who are performing services in different parts of the building. The crowding figures of nobles, warriors, citizens, ladies, and labourers arrayed in all kinds of materials, satin, damask, cloth of gold and silver, and stout broad cloth of English wool, and some idea may be obtained of St Paul's in 1560. Its history from the period of the foundation down through the time when six bibles were chained in the cathedral for public use to its destruction by the great fire, is matter for the pen of the antiquary, and so hurrying along byways, the sites of which will remain ever memorable, we pass through Temple Bar to the Strand. "The bridges" here are swept away, though their names are preserved in Ivy Bridge Lane and Strand Bridge Lane opposite the end of Newcastle Street. There are houses on both sides of the way. Essex House, anciently the outer Temple, was the residence of the unhappy favourite of Elizabeth, and with Durham Place and Harbour Street, presented its embattled pile towards the Strand.

The May Pole stood in front of the spot now occupied by St Clement's Church, and on the ground, forming Arundel, Norfolk, Savoy, and Howard Streets, rose the stately mansion and grounds of Arundel house, the town residence of the Howards. The memorials of old London abound in this vicinity. The Savoy carries us back to the days of John of Gaunt; and in Strand Lane is a bath which was used by the Romans. The gateway of Lyon's Inn, now in Holywell Street, marks the site of a portion of the Inner Temple, and the birth or death places of eminent men hallow the entire locality. In our onward journey the air seems filled with the spirit of the past. St Martin's Lane had not yet grown to be the resort of abandoned characters, where, in the words of Jonson, the "quarrelling lesson was read, and the seconds were bottle ale and tobacco." We pause before Charing Cross, the centre of the humble village of Charing. In 1554, a stirring incident, as narrated by Stowe, invests the scene with living interest. Sir Thomas Wyatt had taken arms against Mary, and was advancing on the city. The same night (February 6th), about five of the clock, a trumpeter went about, and warned all horsemen and men-at-arms to be at St James's Field, and all footmen also to be there by six of the clock next morning. The Queen's scout on his return to the court declared Wyatt's being at Brentford, which sudden news made all in the court wonderfully afraid. Drums went through London at four of the clock in the morning, commanding all soldiers to armour, and so to Charing Cross.

Wyatt, hearing the Earl of Pembroke was come into the field, he staid at Knightsbridge until day, where his men being very weary with travel of the night and the day before, and also partly feeble and faint, having received small sustenance since their coming out of Southwark, rested. There was no small ado in London, and likewise the Tower made great preparation of defence. By ten of the clock the Earl of Pembroke had set his troop of horsemen on the hill in the highway above St James's; his footmen were set in two battles somewhat lower and nearer Charing Cross, at the lane turning down by the brick wall from Islington ward (St Martin's Lane), where he had also certain other horsemen, and he had planted his ordnance upon the hill side in the meantime. Wyatt and his company planted his ordnance upon a hill beyond St James's, almost over against the park corner; and himself, after a few words spoken to his soldiers, came down the old lane on foot, hard by the court gate at St James's, his men marching in good array. Cuthbert Vaughan and two ancients turned down towards Westminster. The Earl of Pembroke's horsemen hovered all the while without moving, until all was passed by, saving the tail, upon which they did set and cut off; the other marched forward in array, and never staid or returned to the aid of their tail. The great ordnance shot off freshly on both sides; Wyatt's ordnance overshot the troop of horsemen. The Queen's ordnance, one piece struck three of Wyatt's company in a rank upon the heads, and slaying them, struck through the wall into the park; more harm was not done by the great shot of either party. The Queen's whole battle of footmen standing still, Wyatt passed along by the wall towards Charing Cross, where the said horsemen that were there set upon part of them, but were soon forced back.

At Charing Cross there stood Sir John Gage, lord

chamberlain, with the guard and a number of others, almost a thousand, the which upon Wyatt's coming shot at his company, but at the last fled to the court gates, while certain pursued, and forced with shot to shut the court gate against them. In this repulse the said lord chamberlain and others were so amazed that many cried treason in the court, and had thought that the Earl of Pembroke, who was assaulting the tail of his enemies, had gone to Wyatt, taking his part against the Queen. There was running and crying out of ladies and gentlemen, shutting of doors and windows, and such a shrieking and noise, as was wonderful to hear. The upshot was, that Wyatt, lacking the daring of a bold rebel, surrendered; but never, perhaps, since the day when the Cross was erected by the first Edward to its final overthrow by order of the Long Parliament, had a more exciting scene been witnessed at its base. But we must resume our journey, and retracing the way eastward by the water side, scarcely linger for a moment to gaze upon the church of Blackfriars and the palace of Bridewell, at this time but recently built for the special accommodation of the Emperor Charles V. It was in the Blackfriar's church that Wolsey and Cardinal Campeggio pronounced sentence of divorce between Henry and Queen Catherine; and where, by just retribution, Wolsey was himself sentenced to degradation and ruin. Queenhith and Billingsgate still retain their ancient characteristics, and are but little altered even in appearance.

The Thames was spanned by a single bridge, the old edifice which had remained substantially the same, as when first erected in 1209, though like the celebrated weapon of the Highlander it had borne much reparation. It had nineteen piers, protected by an equal number of starlings, as these trowel shaped masses of masonry were termed. The space left for passengers was rather narrow, and there were but three openings through which a view of the river could be obtained. Over the central pier stood the chapel of St Thomas à Becket, a famous building, which continued to be used for divine worship down to the very date of the Queen's accession. The front to the street, which was thirty feet in length, was divided by four buttresses, crowned with crotched spires, into three compartments, of which the central one contained a large arched window, and the other two, the entrances into the chapel from the street. The interior consisted of an upper chapel, and a crypt, the latter of which was about twenty feet in height, and the vaulted roof of which was supported by clustered columns of great elegance, having an entrance from the river by means of a flight of stairs leading from the starling of the pier, as well as others from the upper rooms and from the street. Both apartments were lighted by rows of arched windows, looking out upon the water. Between the chapel and the Southwark end of the bridge stands the drawbridge, which formed one of the piers, and at the north end was the tower upon which it was usual to place the heads of persons executed for treason. The chapel was afterwards converted into a haberdasher's shop, and the heads were removed to a gate at the Southwark entrance. Blackening in the sun or bleaching in the frost, had been here exhibited to the gaze of the multitude, the dauntless countenance of Wallace, the head of the father of gallant Hotspur, and those of the twin martyrs, Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More. The head of Fisher having been kept a night for the inspection of Queen Anna Bolyn, was parboiled, prickt upon a pole, and set on high upon London Bridge, amongst the rest of the holy

Carthusians' heads that suffered death lately before him. "And here I cannot omit to declare unto you," says the old chronicler, Hall, "the miraculous sight of this head, which after it had stood up the space of fourteen days upon the bridge, could not be perceived to waste or consume, neither for the weather, which was then very hot, neither for the parboiling in hot water, but grew daily fresher and fresher, so that in his lifetime he never looked so well, for his cheeks being beautified with a comely red, the face looked as though it had beheld the people passing by, and would have spoken to them. Wherefore the people coming daily to see this strange sight, the passage over the bridge was so stopped with their coming and going, that almost neither cart nor horse could pass, and therefore at the end of fourteen days the executioner was commanded to throw down the head in the night time into the river of Thames, and in the place thereof was set the head of the most blessed and constant martyr, Sir Thomas More, his companion and fellow in all his troubles, who suffered his passion the 6th July next following." To pass over the narration of the equally wonderful preservation of the chancellor's head, which after being exposed for some months "had not diminished its lively colour," and the details of gorgeous processions of kings and prelates, and joustings and rare passages of arms between gallant knights and nobles, which, from time to time, made the old bridge the centre of attraction, we cannot help transcribing the account of the skirmish fought by Jack Cade for its possession in 1430. The Kentish leader presented himself at the gates, which were opened to him by the Londoners on Thursday evening, July 2, and, as he passed over at the head of his men, cut asunder the ropes of the drawbridge with his sword; but, on the following Sunday, the mayor and aldermen having rallied the better sort of citizens, the bridge was recaptured, the rebels, after a desperate resistance, being driven over into Southwark. But their leader exhibited no want of courage or warlike capacity; for Stowe tells us that, as soon as he received the intelligence, "he went to harness, and assembled his people, and set so fiercely upon the citizens, that he drove them back from the stoups (or posts) in Southwark, or Bridge-foot, unto the drawbridge, in defending whereof many a man was drowned and slain. . . . This skirmish continued all night, till nine of the clock on the morrow, so that sometime the citizens had the better, and sometimes the other; but ever they kept them upon the bridge, so that the citizens passed never much the better at the bridge-foot, nor the Kentishmen no further than the drawbridge, thus continuing the chief fight to the destruction of much people on both sides." Hall asserts, however, that the Londoners were several times beaten back "as far as the stoups at St Magnus' Corner," that is, quite to the northern extremity of the bridge. He and other authorities also state that the rebels set fire to some of the houses on the bridge. "Alas!" he exclaims, "what sorrow it was to behold that miserable chance, for some desiring to eschew the fire, leaped on his enemy's weapon and was killed; fearful women, with children in their arms, amazed and appalled, leapt into the river; others, doubting how to save themselves from fire, sword and sword, were in their houses suffocate and smothered." At last both parties, faint, weary, and exhausted, ceased to rest them all the next day; and on the following day the king's pardon was proclaimed. The street on the bridge was the Pater-noster street. The three bibles, the chapel, and the church, were signs of respectable publishers; the sign of the white lion, the lamb, and breeches, and the lock of hair, betokened the various callings of the worthy shopkeepers, and "dangling and creaking away must have made work enough among those on London Bridge, especially when the wind was high, and must have added not a little to both the noise and terrors of the thoroughfare." The street was not finally pulled down till about the year 1760.

Happily the beautiful chapel of St Mary Overy is still in existence, with its rare monuments of Gower, the brother of Shakespeare, and Philip Massinger. It is not necessary to describe the sports of the bull and bear garden, albeit they gladdened the leisure hours of the maiden Queen; and now we are at the limits of the ancient metropolis in 1560. Its broken streets and dark thoroughfares—its uncleansed filthiness and haunts of unpicturesque wretchedness—its rude manners and almost naked civilisation would have made it somewhat unpleasant as a dwelling-place for a mechanic of the nineteenth century, even though it was the home of Shakespeare and of genius.

Such was London only three centuries since; how strangely the picture contrasts with the London of the present. Does the comparison mortify or exalt us? We are accustomed to speak of this city as the greatest in the universe, and the boast is not an idle one. Our greatness is not akin to the greatness of the past, but it is actual and visible. Petty communities in the olden time have crowded upon the area of an English county, monuments of intellectual grandeur, which seem to have been erected by the aid of a mortgage upon human genius through all futurity. Poets, whose strains still seem to us the native language of the immortals, lived when our country had no place in the world's history; and nearly all which we are accustomed to venerate and feebly copy, existed at a period of remote antiquity. But were it possible to concentrate within the walls of a single city every memorial which society would wish to preserve, still in our estimation modern London might claim supremacy. It is the home of Power, the metropolis of all the strengths. Our faculty of doing is transcendent. The greatest efforts of material force hitherto achieved appear but recreations when compared with the wonders which might be wrought by the use of the means already within our grasp; and this consciousness, which every Englishman carries with him to every corner of the globe becomes intensified in London. We take the stranger, whom it is thought needful to impress with lofty ideas of our greatness, not to St Paul's, for that is excelled; nor to Westminster Abbey, for that was the work of an age with which the men of this generation affect to have nothing in common; nor to the Museum, for that is but the gleanings of the countless harvests reaped by the labourers whose very dust has long since perished; nor do we point to tattered banners or warlike trophies, for other nations have dared and done as well; but we place him in a doorway in Cheapside two hours before noon, and bid him look on till his mind takes in the character of the scene. Two rushing tides of life, every single billow containing within itself all the constituents which, united, make up the stream of that mighty ocean which for six thousand years has rolled on to eternity, flow ceaselessly by him. A procession in the streets, which seems as if a congress of the human race was about to be held, stuns with its noise, and bewilders him by its vastness; and when he has been carried a day's journey, east, west, north, and south, without stepping outside the belt which binds in an unfraternal embrace the members of this strange family, the work is complete. His sense of individuality is almost gone; the organ of self esteem is nearly obliterated. He feels that he is but the smallest atom in a system which needs not his presence to carry on its highest operations. The aggregate might overawe him, just as the sea, which is made up of small drops, fills the philosopher with thoughts of immensity.

EXTRACTS FROM A MS. IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM, RELATIVE TO THE ANCIENT NOBILITY OF THE NORTH.

THE following account of the Scottish nobility is found in one of the MS. volumes of the Harleian Collection, in the library of the British Museum. The manuscript is entitled, "The present state of the Nobilitie of Scotland, as it was certified unto William, Lorde Burleigh, Lord Treasurer of England, in anno 1578," and it contains similar particulars respecting most of the Peers.

To obtain a knowledge of the state of Scotland, and the disposition of influential parties there, was an object of great solicitude with Queen Elizabeth. The cause of Protestantism had been secured in England, and the friends of the Reformation were anxious regarding its progress among their Scottish brethren. The Lords of the Congregation had deposed the unhappy Mary, and proclaimed her infant son, whom to preserve from Popish influence they placed in the castle of Stirling, under the guardianship of the Earl of Mar, where he remained until 1577.

George, fifth Earl of Caithness.—"The Earle of Catness is a Sinkler, about 60 years of age, in religion here unto a papiste, verie rich and of greate partye; he rulethe in both Catness and Southerland as Sheriffe by inheritance with greate force and oppression. Of late he married his daughter to the Earle of Arral, a man of like condition to himselfe. He litle careth either what religion or authoritie be used, but whollie followeth his own profit, makinge alwayes faire wether with them in authoritie and bestowinge oftentimes for the same, very liberal guiftes on them.

"Alexander Earl of Southerland, by surname a Gordon, about the age of twentie-five yeares, and . . . to the Earl of Lennexe, is a good protestante; he favoreth wholy the Kinge and is his nere kinsman. He is but poore and much oppressed by Catnes; wholie governed by his wife, and of no great partye. He married the Earle of Huntlie's sister, who was first married to the Earle of Bothwelle, and after divorced upon contract with the Scottishe Queene.

"The Lord Lovett, a Frossart beinge nowe within age, is in the tuitione of the Earle of Athele, his grandfather by his mother.

"The Earle of Athele and Montroise is a Stuarde, of the age of 45 yeares, and is a papiste and cheefly by his wife's means, for many hope that hereafter he will be a protestante, when occasion for the wealth of his country shall serve. He greatly favoreth the King, and is the cheefe and head of the confederates for the maintenance of the Kinge; he is riche and of greate possessions, partie and friendship, and is accounted subtil and wise.

"The Earle of Argyle is a Cambel. He possesseth the county of Morray in the right of his wife, and Argyle by himselfe. He is a good protestante, a whole favorer of the Kinge; he is riche and of greate possession, partie and friendship; he is much advised by his wife, but his friendes have greate hope and expectation of better prooffe in him. He is especially well liked of all that are about the Kinge. Yfe the contentiones betwixt him and Athele were ended, he would be of the faction that presse to maintane the Stuardes against the Hamiltone. His lands do cost much upon Ireland.

"The Earle of Huntley is a Gordon, and is about 15 yeares of age, and in the tuition as yet of the Regent. There is goode hope of his goode prooffe. His mother was daughter to the Duke of Hamilton. Adam Gordon his uncle continueth still under bond in Galloway.

"The Lorde Furbasse of Thilk, he is a Furbasse and is a protestante and a favorer of the Kinge, yet of no greate substance nor partye, for he is in deadly feude with the Gordons, and is chiefly assisted by the tenants of the Earle of Marre, dwellinge nigh the Furbasses' land."

These scraps may appear of little interest, but all additions to family or national history are useful. Burleigh's informant was evidently a spy, and may have been engaged in deeper concerns during the reign of that plotting sovereign, Queen Bess.—Caithness Chronicle.

COCKBURN THE "BORDERER."

On the Meggat Water, at its embouchure into St Mary's Lake, surrounded by high and steep hills, are the remains of what was once the stronghold of this celebrated freebooter. It was called Henderland Tower. When James V., in 1530, made an excursion to the border, to restore peace to the "debateable land," Cockburn fell a victim to the royal vengeance—justice it could not be called, and the deed is still regarded by the peasantry of the district as one of unjustifiable tyranny. On the king and his armed followers reaching Henderland Tower, a message was sent to Cockburn that he was wanted immediately. The borderer, being at dinner, returned for answer that he would not stir, were it the king himself who wanted him, until he had finished his repast. The messenger was forthwith sent back to say that it was the "king himself" who wanted him, and that he might prepare for instant death. Thus taken by surprise—his followers being absent, and surrounded only by his wife and family—the knife with which he had been eating dropped from Cockburn's hand, for well he knew the object of the royal visit—and without being allowed a moment's preparation for death, he was hanged over his own gateway. His body was buried on the top of a little knoll on the other side of the tributary brook which flows past the ruins, and a "through-stone" marks the spot, which was lately enclosed and planted by the proprietor. The stone has an inscription round the edges in the old Saxon character, but, being overgrown with moss, it cannot be deciphered. It stands much in need of the renovating chisel of an "Old Mortality." It is said that the borderer's wife would also have met a similar fate, had she not, warned by a domestic, fled to a dark cave at the foot of the water-fall in the ravine above the tower, where she lay concealed till the danger was over.

When last we visited the scene, which is well worthy the attention of the antiquary and tourist, we gathered a beautiful white variety of the "Blue Bell of Scotland" from the grave of the borderer—and, as we culled it, could not help indulging in the poetic idea, that nature had planted that sweet flower there to mark her sympathy for the victim of unconstitutional power. The water-fall, where the wife of Cockburn took refuge, is peculiarly picturesque. It is about twenty feet high, though it cannot be seen until the visitor is close upon it.

LETTER FROM SIR JOHN CLERK, BART., TO JAMES ANDERSON, THE EDITOR
OF THE DIPLOMATA SCOTLÆ.

THE following fragment of a letter, from Clerk of Pennycuik to Anderson the antiquary, has been copied from the original, which is so much defaced as in many places to be illegible. The writer was the ancestor of the present baronet, and of the late Lord Eldin and William Clerk, the clever, but eccentric, and not very sweet tempered clerk of the Jury Court. It is understood that a very curious diary by Sir John, or some other member of the family, is still preserved at Pennycuik; at least the late Mr William Clerk mentioned this to be the case, and stated that, it was so very curious, he would advise the publication, did it not contain many very funny stories about the folks in the country, which might be offensive to the present representatives:—

Sir,
Your welcome letter came only to my hands * * * after I came out of the parliament, wher I was * * * the dean of Faculty is out of Town. I gave * * * to Pittmedden and Sir Robert Sibbald, who make (their compliments) to you and to Dr Smith. The latter had frequently heard of the statuts on Ecclesiæ Scoticanæ, but it was so delet, and in such ill order, that he would not send it. This morning I was with Thirlstane, one of the curators of the Librarie, who had a returne from Mr Colt, another of the Librarie's keepers, that this forenoon he should order Mr Thomas to transcribe a fair copie, which himself should review, if he wer not under Physick; but that it should be transmitted with Tuesday's post. This I instantly undertooke to see done, and that I should acquaint you. He told me he is much indebted to the Dr's civility, and I promise myself great satisfaction in his returne, which I may have on Monday Morning when I come to town, and shall have subject for new enquiry. It is odde enough that the 13th Chapter of Bede, first booke, is wanting in the manuscript. You have made very good progress in the first chapters. I have no doubt Madno Comes in Madeth Comes Atholix, who is a witness in the foundation in the Abbacie of Scoone, as I remember Archbishop Usher mentions one Esigurd dux or count; and so it may be Comes vel consul; and I remember those who treat of the Earl say he was valiantly styled Eorlman or Alderman, which has some affinity with the other. Perhaps something of this may be found in Selden's titles of honour, but this will be best understood by the Doctor. I entreat you look narrowly to the seals of our ancient kings, if they have a shield triangular, with the double tressure and Scottish armes on the left of the king on his back. Mr Nisbett assures me he has seen several of King William's so, and particularly one of that king's to the Earl of Winton's predecessor. If this be true, there being no new occasion for K. William to bear the double tressure, its lyke his predecessors have done the same, and in my opinion would be a mighty argument for the ancient league * * * Catalogue of honour gives the double tressure * * * to Malcolme Canmore * * * had good authority for this; it * * * Sir Robert has also undertaken to speak to Mr (Harry ?) Maule, and to Mr Sutherland, who has one or (two such ?) medals, for a copie. I have received one from the (Bishop of ?) Carlisle (who is) very obleiding, with a promise of * * *

A MEMORIAL OF THE RARE AND WONDERFUL THINGS OF SCOTLAND.

[From an early Geography.]

AMONGST many commodities that Scotland hath common with other nations, it is beautified with some rare gifts in itself, wonderful to consider: As for example, in Orknay the ewes are of such facundity, that at every lambing-time, they produce at least two, and ordinarily three. There be neither venomous nor ravenous beasts bred there, nor do live there, although they were transported thither.

In Zelland, the isles called Thula, at the entering of the sun in Cancer, the space of twenty days, there appear no night at all. Among the rocks grow the delectable Lambre, called Succinum, with great resort of the mertirck, for costly furrings. In the west and north-west of Scotland, there is a great repairing of the Erne, of a marvellous nature, the people are very curious to catch him, and punze his wings, that he fly not; he is of a hudge quantity, and a ravenous kind, as the hawks, and the same quality: they do give him such sort of meat, in great quantity at once, that he lives contented therewith 14, 16, or 20 days, and some of them a month, their feathers are good for garnishing of arrows, for they receive no rain nor water, but remain always of a durable estate, and incorruptible: the people do use them either when they be a hunting, or at wars. In the most of the rivers in Scotland, beside the marvellous plenty of salmond and other fishes gotten, there is a shelfish, called, the horse-mussel, of a great quantity, wherein are ingendered innumerable, fair, beautiful and delectable pearls, convenient for the pleasure of man, and profitable for the use of physick: and some of them so fair and polished, that they may be equal to any oriental pearls. And generally, by the providence of Almighty God, when dearth and scarcity of victuals are in the land, then the fishes are most plentifully taken for the support of the people. In Galloway, the one half of loch Mirton doth never freeze. By Inverness, the loch called Lochness, and the river flowing from thence into the sea, doth never freeze: but on the contrary, in the coldest days of winter, the loch and river do smoke and reik, signifying unto us, that there is a mine of brimstone under it, of a hot quality. In Carrick are kine and oxen, delicious to eat, but their fatness, is of a wonderful temperature: all other comestable beasts fatness, with the cold air doth congeal: by the contrary the fatness of these beasts is perpetually liquid like oil. The wood and park of Cumbernauld is replenished with kine and oxen, and those at all times, to this day, have been wild, and of a wonderful whiteness, that there was never among all the huge number there, so much as the smallest black spot found to be upon one of their skins, horns or clove. In Kyle is a rock of the height of 12 foot, and as much of breadth, called, The deaf Craig: for although a man should cry never so loud to his fellow, from the one side to the other, he is not heard, although he would make the noise of a gun. In the country of Strathern, upon the water of Farge, by Balward, there is a stone called, the Rocking-stone, of a reasonable bigness, that if a man will push it with the lest motion of his finger, it will move very lightly, but if he address his whole force, he profits nothing, which moves many people to be wonderful merry, when they consider such contrariety. In Lennox is a great loch, called Loch-lawmond, 24 miles in length, and in breadth 8 miles, containing the number of 30 isles: in this loch is observed three wonderful things; the one is fishes, very delectable to eat, that have no fins to move themselves withal, as other fishes do. The second, tempestuous waves and surges of the water, perpetually raging, without winds, and that in the time of greatest calms, in the fair pleasant time of summer, when the air is quiet. The third is, one of these isles, that is not corroborate, nor united to the ground, but hath been perpetually loose, and although it be fertil of good grass, and replenished with nolt, yet it moves by the waves of the water, and is transported, sometimes towards one point, and other whiles towards another.

In Argyle is a stone found in divers parts, the which laid under straw or stubble, doth consume them to fire, by the great heat that it collects thereby. In Buchan, at the demolished castle of Slanis, is a cave, from the top whereof distills water, which in short time doth congeal to hard white stones, the cave is always emptied.

In Lowthian, two miles from Edinburgh southward, is a well-spring, called St. Katharine's well, flowing perpetually with a kind of black fatness or oil, above the water, being frequent in those parts. This fatness is of a marvellous nature: for as the coal, proceeding (as is thought) of the parel-coal, whereof it proceeds, is sudden to conceive fire or flame; so is this oil of a sudden operation to heal all salt scabs and humours, that trouble the outward skin of man: commonly the head and hands are quickly healed by the virtue of this oil: it renders a marvellous sweet smell. At Aberdeen is a well, of marvellous good quality to dissolve the stone, to expel sand from the reins and bladder; and good for the cholic, being drunk in the month of July, and a few days of August; little inferior to the renowned water of the Spaw in Almain. In the north seas of Scotland, are great clogs of timber found, in the which are marvellously ingendered a sort of geese, called Clayk Geese, and do hang by the beak, till they be of perfection: oftentimes found, and kept in admiration of their generation. At Dumbarton, directly under the castle, at the mouth of the river of Clyde, as it enters in the sea, there are a number of Clayk Geese, black of colour, which in the night-time do gather great quantity of the crops of the grass, growing upon the land, and carry the same to the sea: then assembling in a round, and with a curious curiosity, do offer every one his own portion to the sea-flood, and there attend upon the flowing of the tide, till the grass be purified from the fresh taste, and turned to the salt: and lest any part thereof should escape, they hold it in with their nebs, thereafter orderly every fowl eats his portion: and this custom they observe perpetually. They are fat and delicious to be eaten.

THE FALL OF THE DOUGLASSES.—James Douglas, ninth Earl of Douglas. His lordship, in revenge for the late earl's death, took up arms against King James, and it cost him little more than the waving of his banner to collect an army of fully forty thousand men, with which he encamped on the south side of the Carron, to await the attack of the royal army. Owing, however, to the desertion of Hamilton and other chieftains, the troops of Douglas dissolved like a snow-wreath on a sudden thaw; and on the fearful morning succeeding that on which the Earl Douglas led out his mighty host, his empty camp scarce contained a hundred soldiers, save his own household troops. Douglas himself, in the spring of 1455, fled into England, with very few attendants. His three brothers, Moray, Ormond, and Balveny, remaining in Eweadale, maintained their followers by military licence, and harassed the adjacent country, until completely routed at Arkinholm. Moray fell in the action; Ormond was made prisoner, condemned, and executed; and of the brethren of Douglas, Balveny alone effected his escape. In the June following, a parliament met in Edinburgh, and decreed the forfeiture of Douglas and his brothers. The title of Douglas accordingly ceased; and thus fell, and for ever, the formidable power of the house of Douglas, which had so lately measured itself against that of monarchy. "It can only," to quote a beautiful simile of Sir Walter Scott, "be compared to the gourd of the prophet, which, spreading in such incalculable luxuriance, was withered in a single night." The earl was received with favour by the ruling party in England. Edward IV. granted him a pension, admitted him to the privileges of an English subject, and invested him with the order of the Garter. In 1483, having raised five hundred horse and a small body of infantry, the exiled lord advanced to Lochmaben; but the west-border men rose to repel the incursion, and the invaders were defeated. Struck from his horse, and surrounded by enemies, the aged Douglas surrendered himself to a son of Kirkpatrick, of Closeburn, and was conveyed to the royal presence; but, either from shame or scorn, turned his back on the son of James II., the destroyer of his house. A ray of pity illuminated the despotic mind of the king; he merely sentenced Douglas to the religious retirement of Lindores Abbey; while the earl's indifference manifested—"He who may no better be, must be a monk." In this retreat he died, after four years of penitence and of peace, on the 15th of April 1488.

MURDER OF THE TWO CHILDREN OF GORDON, OF ELLON.—"Edinburgh, April 29, 1718.—Yesterday evening, betwixt six and eight, one Mr Robert Irvine, governor to James Gordon of Ellon's children, having gone out of the town, with two of his sons, under pretence to take a walk towards the Water of Ledth, did most barbarously cut the throat of one of them, being about eight years of age; calling to his brother (who was about nine years), to run away for he was gone, which he did; but the villain pursuing, overtook him and cut his throat likewise. Thereafter he endeavoured to drown himself, but perceiving people running up to apprehend him, he, with the same knife, cut his own throat, but not mortally, being prevented by the people walking thereabout, who seized him, before he effected his design. After which his wound was steech'd, and he was brought up prisoner on a cart to our main guard."—The cause of this murder was the knowledge the children had accidentally acquired of the immoral conduct of the teacher, who, being taken "red hand," was immediately convicted and executed.

WILLIAM DUNBAR.

It is by no means surprising that the authors of many of our old lyrics are unknown, when so few particulars have been preserved of the personal history of DUNBAR, the chief of all our earlier poets. His poems were only "first collected" and published by David Laing, to whom the admirers of Scottish literature are greatly indebted, in 1834;* and, but for the manuscript collections of Bannatyne, Maitland, and one or two others, the probability is that, though Dunbar enjoyed a high reputation during his life, very few of his numerous productions would now have been in existence. Much of this apparent neglect of a genius so gifted may be attributed to the disturbed state of the country—from the death of James IV. till the battle of Culloden in 1745—which left little leisure, and possibly as little inclination, to indulge in the pursuits of literature. After long-protracted and patient inquiry, Mr Laing, in drawing up a memoir of the poet, found little to aid him in the task beyond what could be deduced from the frequently imperfect hints thrown out in the writings of the author or his contemporaries. From this interesting sketch we shall endeavour to acquaint our readers with the leading facts brought together: and from the poems themselves give such illustrations as may tend to excite a taste for further perusal.

William Dunbar, born about the middle of the fifteenth century—not later than 1460—is believed to have been a descendant of the noble family of Dunbar, and a native of Lothian. Both of these facts are inferred from the "Flying"† between Dunbar and Kennedy, a contemporary poet. "The same branch of the attainted family," says Mr Laing, "of which he is represented as a descendant, retaining property in that district, was Sir Patrick Dunbar of Beill, in East Lothian, a younger son of George, the tenth Earl of March. This Sir Patrick identified himself on many occasions, and was one of the hostages for James the First in 1426; and it appears from an original charter, dated August 10, 1440, that one of his sons was named

* The poems of William Dunbar, now first collected. By David Laing. Edinburgh: Laing and Forbes, 1834.

† The date of this singular composition may be some few years after 1491. It neither originated nor was carried on in consequence of any personal animosity or dislike; nor does it appear that it had any tendency to interrupt the cordiality of private friendship. Such exhibitions of "illiberal fancy" were common during the sixteenth century.

William, who in all probability was either the father or uncle of the poet."

Dunbar was no doubt intended for the church. Even on his nurse's knee he was, as he says himself, amused with "Dandele, Bishop, Dandele!" and it is certain that he had the advantage of a university education. In the old registers of the University of St Andrews, the name of William Dunbar occurs among the Bachelors of Art, in St Salvador's College, in 1477; and again, in 1479, as having taken the degree of Master of Arts.

It is very probable that Dunbar, like most Scottish students at the time, studied also at a foreign university; but of this there is no evidence beyond his own statement, that he had entered the order of St Francis, and become an itinerant friar. "It is well known," says Mr Laing, "that the order of mendicants, called Franciscan, or Grey Friars, were divided into Conventuals and Observantines. The latter had an establishment at Edinburgh, endowed by James the First, about the year 1446, where divinity and philosophy were regularly taught; and here it is highly probable that Dunbar might have spent some of his earlier years." Dunbar, however, as he himself informs us, did not relish a monastic life. He represents St Francis as afterwards appearing to him in a dream, and urging him to adopt a religious habit. The poet refuses, saying—

"Gif evir my fortoun wes to be a freir,
The dait thairof is past full mony a year;
For in to every lusty toun and place,
Off all Yngland, from Berwick to Kalice,
I haif in to thy habeit maid gud chair.

In freiris weid full fairly haif I fleichit,
In it haif I in pulpet gone and preichit
In Derntoun kirk, and eik in Canterbury;
In it I past at Dover oure the ferry,
Throw Piccardy, and thair the peple teichit.

As lang as I did beir the freiris style;
In me, God wait, wes mony wrink and wyle;
In me wes falsheit with every wicht to flatter,
Quhilk mycht be flemit with na haly watter;
I wes ay reddey all men to begyle."

Kennedy in the 'Flying,' alludes to this period of Dunbar's life, and taunts him with his pilgrimage:—

"Fra Atrik Forrest furthward to Dumfreis
Thew beggit with ane pardoun in all kirkis,
Collapseis, crudis, meill, grottis, gryce, and geikis,
And under nycht quhyllis thow stail staeigis and stirkis."

Because that Scotland of thy begging irkis,
Thow schaipis in France to be a knyght of the fildis;

Thow hes thy clamschellis, and thy bourdoun keild,
Unhonest wayis all, wolroun, that thou wirkis."

How long Dunbar continued a friar is not known from his poems; nor do they furnish any hint as to the time or occasion of his connection with the Scottish Court. "At a later period," continues Mr Laing, "when we find Dunbar residing in Edinburgh, and presenting his supplications to James the Fourth for preferment in the church, he urges his claims not on account of merit, for, 'alas!' says he, 'I can do nothing but brieve (or write) ballads,' but as the just recompense to which he was entitled by long and faithful service. In one place he tells the king, that had he been so disposed, he might, in his youth, have obtained employment abroad—

'I had been bocht in realmes by,
Had I consentit to be sauld.'

In another, he urges the king to have regard, and to bestow compensation on his 'auld servitouria,' no less than on the crowd of idle and worthless characters, who daily importuned 'his grace;' and speaks of himself as one of those that

'Throw all regions bes tein hard tell,
Of quhilk my wryting witnes beiris.'

And when contrasting his own small reward with his long and 'leill service,' he adds,—

'Nocht I say this, by this countrie,
France, England, Ireland, Almanie,
Bot ala be Italie and Spaine,
Quhilk to consider is ane paine.'

These allusions to the countries visited by Dunbar, while employed in the king's service, which include the chief parts of Europe, will readily suggest the nature and character of his employment. It is well known that James the Fourth maintained a constant and friendly intercourse with the Courts of France, Flanders, Spain, Denmark, and other countries, and that such international relations were carried on by the mission of heralds, envoys, and merchants, as well as in the more solemn way of embassies to foreign courts, including that of England. The most probable conjecture then that can be offered is, that Dunbar was employed in the course of these embassies, as it was usual on such occasions to appoint 'ane clerk;' for it must be considered that the literary attainments of the clergy, who were almost the only class of men who then received any thing like a liberal education, eminently recommended them to the service of foreign negotiations."

From the "Flying" it would appear that Dunbar, in one of these missions probably, had sailed from Leith, and been shipwrecked on the coast of Zealand, where he had endured much distress. Dunbar seems to have been residing at Paris when the concluding portion of the "Flying" was written, and the mention of the Katherine as the vessel in which he made the voyage, leads, from an entry in the treasurer's accounts for July 1491, to the belief that he was in the train of the Earl of Bothwell and Lord Monypenny, then sent on an embassy to France. Mr Laing supposes that "as the ambassadors returned at the end of November that same year, Dunbar might have been left behind in Paris, during the winter season, for the purpose of crossing the Alps in the further prosecution of 'the erandis' of his royal master; for, as Kennedy says, he could not at that time cross Mount Bernard for wild beasts, nor win through Mounts Scarpear, Nicholas, and St Gedard, for the snow; and since no lord would take him into his service, he is advised to remain in Paris, with the 'Maister Burreau,' or public executioner, and assist in hanging criminals at the rate of half-a-franc a piece. But after such gratuitous advice, Kennedy thus addresses the king:—

'Hie, Soverane Lord, lat never this sinfull sot
Do schame, fra hame, unto your nation;—

words which evidently corroborate the supposition of Dunbar's having been employed in the king's service on some foreign mission."

In the year 1500, Dunbar obtained a small pension of ten pounds yearly from the king. The grant appears in the register of the Privy Seal, August 15. It was to be paid half-yearly to "Maister William Dunbar for all the dayis of his life, or untill he be promoted by our Sovereign Lord to a benefice of the value of forty pounds or more yearly!" It is probable this pension had been granted in compliance with the poet's "earnest cry and prayer" to the king,—

"Schir, yet remember as of befoir,
How that my youth is done forloir
In your service, with pane and grief,
Gude conscience cryis, 'Reward thairfor!'"

From this period Dunbar seems to have resided almost constantly in Edinburgh, and to have been retained as an attendant at court. His reputation as a versifier was then probably at the highest. Gavin Douglas, in his "Palice of Honour," thus speaks of him:—

"Of this natoun I knew also anone
Gret Kennedie, and Dunbar Fit undeid,
And Quintine with ane huttok on his heid,"

Dunbar seems to have visited England towards the close of 1501. In the treasurer's accounts, his half-yearly pension, due at Martinmas, is entered on the 20th December of that year, "quhilk was payit him aftir he came furth of England." From this, Mr Laing thinks it probable that Dunbar accompanied the ambassadors sent to England, in October 1501, to negotiate the king's marriage with the Princess Margaret—that he remained to witness the affiancing of the Princess, which took place on the 25th January 1502—and that he was "the rhymer of Scotland who received £6, 13s. 4d. in reward from Henry VII. on the 31st of December 1501, and a similar sum on the 7th of January following." It is difficult to conceive, however, the possibility of his being in London on the 31st of December 1501—or January 1502—if, as is stated, he "came furth of England" previous to the 20th of December 1501. Possibly, at the same time, there may be some mistake, clerical or typographical, in the dates.

The Princess Margaret remained in England till 1503. Dunbar wrote his poem, the "Thrissill and the Rois," on the 9th of May of that year, in honour of the union between the royal houses of Scotland and England. After the arrival of the Princess, Dunbar appears to have lived almost constantly at court, participating in its galleries, and contributing to its amusement by the productions of his muse. The poem "of a Dance in the Quenis Chahmer" sufficiently illustrates the familiar terms on which he lived with royalty and the frequenters of the Court. We can only give the two first verses :—

"Schir Jhon Sinclair begowthe to dance,
For he was new cum out of France;
For ony thing that he do mycht,
The ane fute yeld ay unrycht,
And to the tother wald not gree.
Quoth ane, Tak up the Quenis knyght:
A mirreour Dance mycht na man see.
Then cam in Maister Robert Schaw:
He laikit as he culd learn tham a;
Bot ay his ane fute did waver,
He stakkerit lyke ane strummell aver,
That hap schakellit abone the kne:
To seik fra Strivilling to Stranaver,
A mirreour Daunce mycht na man see."

Dunbar's great ambition, if we may judge from his numerous petitions to the king, was preferment in the church. "The most singular instance," says Mr Laing, "of all his supplications, is perhaps that in which he represents himself under the character of a worn-out steed, or an old grey horse, which deserved to be turned out to pasture, and to have shelter provided during the winter season. Attached to this poem is the following reply to the petition, in the form of a mandate addressed to the treasurer by his majesty; but whether the words were actually written by the king himself, or added in his name by Dunbar, as an ingenious mode of enforcing his request, the reader must be left to his own conjecture. In modern orthography the lines are:—

"After our writings,* Treasurer,
Take in this grey horse, Old Dunbar,
Who in my aucht, with service trae,
To lyart changed is his hue;
Gar house him now against this Yule,
And busk him like a bishop's mule:
For, with my hand, I have indost,
To pay whate'er his trappings cost."

It is singular that the desire of Dunbar's repeated prayers was never granted by the king. He performed mass before his majesty for the first time in 1507—but hope was still deferred in reference to his views of a church. Mr Laing supposes the king to have been unwilling to lose his presence at Court, as a reason for the procrastination. Perhaps the aspirations of Dunbar after ecclesiastical promotion were more poetical than real, and practically preferred the meridian of the palace to that of the church.

In 1507 Dunbar had his pension eiked [augmented] to £20, and in 1510 it was increased to £50. In 1511 he accompanied Queen Margaret, as appears from the description he gives of her reception in Aberdeen, on a visit to the north of Scotland. After the death of James IV. at Flodden, in 1513, his name is not found in the public accounts which have been preserved. Whether he obtained a benefice from the Queen Dowager, whom he styled, during the king's life, his "advocate bayth fair and sweet," is uncertain; but indeed almost nothing whatever is known of him. "What might have been the fate of Dunbar," says

Mr Laing "during the closing years of his life can therefore only be surmised, as we are unable even to ascertain how long he survived his royal master. Several of his poems denote the sedate and contemplative feelings of advanced age. * * *

Lyndsay, who must have been personally acquainted with Dunbar, in a poem written in the year 1530, after alluding to Chaucer, Gower, and Lydgate, as the great masters 'of Rethorick,' 'Quhais sweet sentence through Albion bene sung,' exclaims,—

'Or quha can now the warkis contrefeit
Off Kennedie with termes anroit?
Or Off Dunbar, quha language had at large,
As may be sene intill his Goldin Targe.'

From these words, and from the manner in which Lyndsay laments Bishop Douglas, who died in 1522, it may be inferred that our author's decease was previous to that of the prelate; wherefore we cannot greatly err in supposing that he died about the year 1520,† when he had attained at least sixty years of age.

Several of Dunbar's poems were printed by Chepman and Myllar, the first printers in Scotland. Amongst these were the "Goldyn Targe," the "Flyting," and the "Lament for the Makkaris." His address "To the Merchantis of Edinburgh," written, it is believed, about 1500, affords a curious picture of the metropolis at that time. Though the Modern Athens has undergone immense improvement since the exhortation and advice of the poet, it is not even yet wholly inapplicable.

TO THE MERCHANTIS OF EDINBURGH.

Quhy will ye, Merchantis of renoun,
Lat Edinburgh, your nobill toun,
For laik of reformatioun
The commone proffellit tyne and fame?
Think ye nocht schame,
That ony uther regioun
Sall with dishonour hurt your Name!

May nane pas throw your principal Gaittis,
For stink of haddockis and of scaittis;
For cryis of carlingis and debaittis;
For fansum flytingis of defame:
Think ye nocht schame,
Befoir strangaris of all estaittis
That sic dishonour hurt your Name!

Your Stinkand Seule [style] that standis dirk,
Haldis the lycht fra your Parroche Kirk;
Your foirstairis makis your houses mirk,
Lyk na cuntry bot heir at hame:
Think ye nocht schame,
Sa litill poleis to work
In hurt and sklander of your Name!

At your hie Croce, quhair gold and silk
Sould be, thair is bot crudis and milk;
And at your Trone but cokill and wilk,
Pansches, pudingis of Jok and Jame:

Think ye nocht schame,
Sen as the world sayis that ilk
In hurt and sklander of your Name!

Your commone Menstrallis hes no tyme,
Bot Now the day dawis, and Into Joun;

† He was alive in June 1517.

Cuningar men man scherve Sanct Cloun,
And nevir to uther craftis clame :
Think ye nocht schame,
To hald sic mowaris on the mounne,
In hurt and sclander of your Name!

Tailyouris, Soutteris, and craftis vyll,
The fairest of your streitis dois fyll ;
And merchandis at the stinkand Styll
Ar hamperit in ane hony came :

Think ye nocht schame,
That ye have nether witt nor wyll
To win your self ane bettir Name!

Your Burgh of beggaris is ane nest,
To schout that swenyouris will nocht rest ;
All honest folk they do molest,
Sa piteuslie that cry and rame :

Think ye nocht schame,
That for the poore hes no thing drest,
In hurt and sclander of your Name!

Your proffeit daylie dois incress
Your godlie workis less and less ;
Through streittis nane may mak progress,
For cry of cruikit, blind, and lame ;

Think ye nocht schame,
That ye sic substance dois possess,
And will nocht win ane bettir Name!

Sen for the Court and the Sessioun,
The great repair of this regioun
Is in your Burgh, thairfoir be boun
To mend all faultis that ar to blame,
And eschew schame ;

Gif thai pas to ang uther Toun
Ye will decay, and your great Name!

Thairfoir strangeris and leigis treit,
Tak nocht ouer meikle for thair meit,
And gar your Merchandis be discreit,
That na extortiounnes be proclaime,
Awfrand ane schame :

Kelp ordour, and poore nychtbouris be it,
That ye may gett ane bettir Name!

Singular proffeit so dois yow blind,
The common proffeit gois behind :
I pray that Lord remeid to fynd
That deit into Jerusalem ;

And gar yow schame!
That sum tyme ressoun may yow bind,
For to [reconqueis] your guid Name.

Some of Dunbar's moral pieces are very pretty.
The quaintness of the lines on the "Changes of Lyfe" is pleasing.

I seik about this Warld unstabill,
To find ane sentence conveneabill ;
Bot I can nocht in all my wit,
Sa trew ane sentence find of it,
As say it is dissaveable.

For yestirday, I did declair
Quhow that the tym was saft and fair,
Come in als fresche as pacock feddar ;
This day it stangis lyk ane eddar,
Concluding all in my contrair.

Yestirday fair up sprang the flouris,
This day thay ar all slane with schouris ;
And fowlis in forrest that sang cleir,
Now weipis with ane dreirie cheir,
Full could ar bayth thair bedis and bouris.

So nixt to Symmer, Wynter bein ;
Nixt eftir confort, cairis kein ;
Nixt eftir dark nycht, the mirthfull morrow ;
Nixt eftir joy, ay cummis sorrow :
So is this Warld, and ay hes bein.

Dunbar's "Lament for the Makaris, quhen he wes seik," has been often referred to by writers on Scottish literature. It records the names of several of our earlier poets who would not otherwise have been known.

I that in heill wes and glaidness,
Am troublit now with gret seikness,
And feblit with infirmitie ;
Timor Mortis conturbat me.

Our plesance heir is all vane glory,
This fals Warld is bot transitory,
The flesche is brukle, the Feynd is slé,
Timor Mortis conturbat me.

by their Scottish brethren as most worthy of praise.

¹ Flourished about the middle of the fourteenth century. He derived his title from a lordship and castle in Ayrshire. In 1361 he was one of the Justiciaries of Lothian ; and in September, 1367, was appointed a Commissioner for a treaty of peace with England. He married Egidia, daughter of Walter, Lord High Steward of Scotland, sister of King Robert the Second, and relict of Sir James Lindsay of Crawford, who had died about 1358. After Robert's accession to the throne in 1371, he bestowed on Sir Hugh Eglinton various grants of land, and in these royal charters he is designated "Dilecto fratri suo Hugoni Eglintone, militi." He died, it is supposed about the year 1381, without male issue ; his widow marrying for her third husband, Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith. Sir Hugh Eglinton's only daughter and heiress, Elizabeth, married John Montgomery de Eglinton, and thus carried his estates to the Montgomeries ; her descendants being successively raised to the dignity of Lord Montgomery, before 1449, and Earl of Eglinton, in 1507.

² No mention has been met with of a poet so named, and as this line, in the edition printed by Chepman, reads, Et eik Heryot et Wyntoun, that is, And also Heryot and Wyntoun (the Latin particle Et being generally used as a contraction for and, in the printed fragments of 1508), I am inclined to think that this name should be struck out of the list of the names of Scottish Poets.

⁴ Prior of the Inch of Lochleven, and author of The Chronicle Originale, in Scottish metre, first published by Mr Macpherson. Lond. 1795, 2 vols. royal 8vo.

⁵ There can be little doubt that this was "Maister James Achlik, servitour to the Earl of Rosse," whose name occurs in the Acta Dominorum Concilii, July 1, 1494. He appears to have been in holy orders, and to have died in the year 1497 ; as we find from the Records of Privy Council, that the presentation to the Chantry of Caithness, becoming vacant by the decease of "Maister James Auchinleck," was given by the King to Maister James Beton, (afterwards Archbishop of St Andrews ?) on Sept. 17, 1497.

There is a poem entitled "The Quair of Jelousy," preserved in the Selden MS. Arch. B. 24, which has at the end, "Explicit quod Auchin." This poem consists of 607 lines, and I apprehend it is the only specimen of his composition now existing.

⁶ This poet flourished about the middle of the fifteenth century. "His poem of the Howlat is preserved in Lord Hyndford's MS. and in a MS. belonging to Lord Auchinleck. It is a verbose work, but must have merits with antiquaries, from the stanzas describing "the kyndis of instrumentis, the sportaris [jugglers], the Irish bard, and the fulis."

¹ It has been suggested that Huchown, or Hugh, might possibly have been the Christian name of Clerk of Tranent.

² Chamberlain to Charles VII. of France.

⁴ There is one poem, "The Three Deid Powis," attributed to him in Bannatyne's MS., and first printed in Lord Hailes' collection, page 139. But this poem, and perhaps more correctly, in Maitland's MS., is attributed to Robert Henryson. The name of Patrick Johnstoun occurs occasionally in the Treasurer's Accounts during the earlier part of the reign of James the Fourth.

⁵ So little is known regarding his personal history, that we cannot ascertain the Christian name of a poet, who was thought worthy of commemoration by Lyndsay as well as by Dunbar.

⁶ Lyndsay also mentions the name of Rowl, but it is uncertain which of these two persons was the Sir John Rowl, author of the strange poem of "Rowlis Cursing."

⁷ In Bannatyne's MS. there is a poem of Judgment to come, by Walter [William] Brown, probably the person here meant.

⁸ He is said to have been scolmaister of Dunfermling, in a collection of his fables 1575 : Harleian MSS. 3865, p. 1. I suppose his office to have been that of preceptor of youth in the Benedictine convent at Dunfermline.

⁹ His compositions are also unknown.

¹⁰ The only poem of his known, the "Advyce to a Courtier," was first printed by Pinkerton from Maitland's MS.

¹¹ Walter Kennedy, with whom Dunbar had the Flying. He was of the Cassillis family, and belonged to Carrick.

"CHRONICLES OF THE CANONGATE."

NO. VII.

THE extracts we have given from the records of the burgh, in the previous numbers, afford some glimpses of the municipal and social state of the Canongate during the latter half of the sixteenth century. The later minutes of Council possess little interest. The principal event to which they refer is another visitation of the plague, which, in 1645, nearly depopulated Edinburgh as well as the Canongate. This was a period of civil war—the era of Montrose—which added greatly to the dismay occasioned by the pestilence.

A memorial of this direful visitation still remains in what is called the Morocco Land, a stone tenement on the east side of the street, near the head of the Canongate. It derives its name from the figure of a turbaned Moor, occupying a pulpit, which projects from a recess above the second floor.

"Various romantic stories," says the author of "Memorials of Edinburgh,"* a highly interesting work, "are told of the Morocco Land. The following is as complete an outline of the most consistent of them, as we have been able to gather, though it is scarcely necessary to premise, that it rests on very different authority from some of the historical associations previously noticed.

"During one of the tumultuous outbreaks by which the mob of Edinburgh has rendered itself noted at all periods, and which occurred soon after the accession of Charles I. to his father's throne, the provost,—who had rendered himself peculiarly obnoxious to the rioters,—was assaulted, his house broken into and fired, and mob law completely established in the town. On the restoration of order, several of the rioters were seized, and, among others, Andrew Gray, a younger son of the Master of Gray, whose descendants now inherit the ancient honours and title of that family. He was convicted as the ringleader of the mob, and, notwithstanding the exertions of powerful friends, such was the influence of the provost,—who was naturally exasperated by the proceedings of the rioters,—that young Gray was condemned to be executed within a day or two after his trial. The last day of his doomed life had drawn to a close, and the scaffold was already preparing at the Cross for his ignominious death; but the old Tolbooth showed, as usual, its proper sense of the privileges of gentle blood. That very night he effected his escape by means of a rope and file conveyed to him by a faithful vassal, who had previously drugged a posset for the sentinel at the Purges, and effectually put a stop to his interference. A boat lay at the foot of one of the neighbouring closes, by which he was ferried over the North Loch, and long before the town gates were opened on the following morning, a lessening sail near the mouth of the Firth, told to the watchful eye of his vassal that Andrew Gray was safe beyond pursuit.

"Years passed over, and the sack of the obnoxious provost's house, as well as the escape of the ringleader, had faded from the minds of all, save some of his own immediate relatives. Gloom and terror now pervaded the streets of the capital. It was the terrible year 1645,—the last visitation of the pestilence to Edinburgh,—when, as tradition tells us, grass grew thickly about the Cross, once as crowded a centre of thoroughfare as Europe had to boast of. Maitland relates, that such was the terror that prevailed at this period, debtors incarcerated in the tolbooth were set at large; all who were not freemen were compelled, under heavy penalties, to leave the town; until at length, 'by the unparalleled ravages committed by the plague, it was spoiled of its inhabitants to such a degree, that there were scarce sixty men left capable of assisting in defence of the town, in case of an attack.' The common council ordered the town walls to be repaired, and a party of the train bands to guard them, an immediate attack being dreaded from the victorious army of Montrose. They strove to provide against the more insidious assaults of their dreadful enemy within, by agreeing with Joannes Paulitius, M.D., to visit the infected, on a salary of eighty pounds Scots per month. In the midst of all these preparations, a large armed vessel, of curious form and rigging, was seen to sail up the Firth, and cast anchor in Leith Roads. The vessel was pronounced by experienced seamen to be an Algerine rover, and all was consternation and dismay, both in the seaport and the neighbouring capital. A detachment of the crew landed, and proceeded immediately towards Edinburgh, which they approached by the Water Gate, and passing up the High Street of the Canongate, demanded admission at the Nether Bow Port. The Magistrates entered into parley with their leader, and offered to ransom the city on exorbitant terms, warning them, at the same time, of the dreadful scourge to which they would expose themselves if they entered the plague-stricken city,—but all in vain.

"Sir John Smith, the provost at the time, withdrew to consult with the most influential citizens in this dilemma, who volunteered large contributions towards the ransom of the town. He returned to the Nether Bow, accompanied by a body of them, among whom was his own brother-in-law, Sir William Gray, one of the wealthiest citizens of the period. Negotiations were resumed, and seemingly with more effect. A large ransom was agreed to be received, on condition that the son of the provost should be delivered up to the leader of the pirates. It seems, however, that the provost's only child was a daughter, who then lay stricken of the plague, of which her cousin, Egídia Gray, had recently died. This information seemed to work an immediate change on the leader of the Moors. After some conference with his men, he intimated his possession of an elixir of wondrous potency, and demanded that the provost's daughter should be intrusted to his skill; engaging, if he did not cure her, immediately to embark with his men, and free the city without ransom. After considerable parley, the provost proposed that the leader should enter the city, and take up his abode in his house: but this he peremptorily refused, rejecting, at the same time, all offers of still higher ransom, which the distracted father was now prepared to make.

"Sir John Smith at length yielded to the exhortations of his friends, who urged him in so dreadful an alternative to accept the offer of the Moor. The fair invalid was borne on a litter to the house near the head of the Canongate, where he had taken up his abode, and, to the astonishment and delight of her father, she was restored to him shortly afterwards safe and well.

"The denouement of this singular story bears that the Moorish leader and physician proved to be Andrew Gray, who, after being captured by pirates, and sold as a slave, had won the favour of the Emperor of Morocco, and risen to rank and wealth in his service. He had returned to Scotland, bent on revenging his own early wrongs on the Magistrates of Edinburgh, when, to his surprise, he found in the destined object of his special vengeance, a relative of his own. The remainder of the tale is soon told. He married the provost's daughter, and settled down a wealthy citizen of the burgh of Canongate. The house to which his fair patient was borne, and whither he afterwards brought her as his bride, is still adorned with an effigy of his royal patron, the Emperor of Morocco; and the tenement has ever since borne the name of Morocco Land. It is added that he had vowed never to enter the city but sword in hand; and having abandoned all thoughts of revenge, he kept the vow till his death, having never again passed the threshold of the Nether Bow Port. We only add, that we do not pretend to guarantee this romantic legend of the burgh; all we have done, has been to put into a consistent whole the different versions related to us. We have had the curiosity to obtain a sight of the title-deeds of the property, which prove to be of recent date. The earliest, a disposition of 1731, so far confirms the tale, that the proprietor at that date is John Gray, merchant, a descendant, it may be, of the Algerine rover and the provost's daughter. The figure of the Moor has ever been a subject of popular admiration and wonder, and a variety of legends are told to account for its existence. Most of them, however, though differing in almost every other point, seem to agree in connecting it with the last visitation of the plague."

After the Reformation the superiorities belonging to the abbey of Holyrood had been acquired by the Earl of Roxburgh, from whom they were purchased in 1636, by the magistrates of Edinburgh. The superiorities so purchased comprehended the Canongate, North Leith, part of the barony of Broughton, and part of what was then the village of Plasencia. The purchase, which was confirmed by a charter of Charles I., cost "forty-two thousand and one hundred marks of Scottish money." The Canongate thus became subordinate to Edinburgh, and "is governed by a baron and a bailiff," who are appointed by the Council of Edinburgh.

The glory of the Canongate may be said to have departed with the court, when James the Sixth ascended the throne of England. It still continued, however, to be the fashionable quarter of Edinburgh, and enjoyed occasional glimpses of the royal presence during the seventeenth century. James the Seventh, while Duke of York, resided at Holyrood for some time—and after his accession showed every disposition to revive the declining prestige of the ancient home of his fathers. The Revolution, however, drove him into exile—and the union of the two kingdoms, in 1707, confirmed the destiny of the Canongate. Maitland, who wrote in 1753, says—"This place has suffered more by the union of the kingdoms than all the other parts of Scotland: for having, before that period, been the residence of the chief of the Scottish nobility, it was then in a flourishing condition; but being deserted by them, many of their houses are fallen down, and others in a ruinous condition; it is in a piteous case!"

THE GREAT PLENTY OF HARES, RED DEER, AND OTHER WILD BEASTS IN SCOTLAND; OF THE STRANGE PROPERTY OF SUNDRY SCOTTISH DOGS: AND OF THE NATURE OF SALMOND.

[From an early Geography.]

HAVING made this special description of the realm of Scotland:—now touching some things concerning the same in general. In the fields, and in all places of the country (except the parts where continual habitation of people makes impediment) there is great abundance of hares, red deer, fellow deer, roes, wild horses, wolves, and foxes, and specially in the high countries of Athol, Argyle, Lenn, Lochaber, Marr, and Badynoch, where is sundry times seen 1500 red deer, being hunted altogether. These wild horses are not gotten but by great slight and policy: for in the winter season the inhabitants turn certain tame horses and mares amongst them, wherewith in the end they grow so familiar, that they afterward go with them to and fro, and finally home into their masters' yards, where they be taken, and soon broken to their hands, the owners obtaining great profit thereby. The wolves are most fierce and noisome unto the herds and flocks in all parts of Scotland. Foxes do much mischief in all steads, chiefly in the mountains where they be hardly hunted: howbeit art hath devised a mean to prevent their malice, and to preserve the poultry in some part; and specially in Glenmoors. Every house nourishes a young fox, and then, killing the same, they mix the flesh thereof amongst such meat as they give unto the fowls and other little bestial; and by this means so many fowls or cattle as eat hereof, are safely preserved from the danger of the fox, by the space of almost two months after, so that they may wander whither they will; for the foxes smelling the flesh of their fellows, yet in their crops, will in no wise meddle with them, but eschew and know such a one, although it were among a hundred of others. In Scotland are dogs of marvellous condition, above the nature of other dogs. The first is a hound of great swiftness, hardiness, and strength, fierce and cruel upon all wild beasts, and eager against thieves, that offer their masters any violence. The second is a ratch or hound, very exquisite in following the foot (which is called drawing) whether it be of man or beast, yea, he will pursue any manner of fowl, and find out whatsoever fish haunting the land, or lurking amongst the rocks, specially the otter, by that excellent scent of smelling, wherewith he is endued. The third sort is no greater than the aforesaid ratches, in colour for the most part red, with black spots, or else black and full of red marks. These are so skilful (being used by practice) that they will pursue a thief, or thief-stolen goods, in most precise manner, and, finding the trespasser, with great audacity they will make a race upon him, or if he take the water for his safeguard, he shrinketh not to follow him, and entering and issuing at the same place where the party went in and out, he never ceaseth to range till he hath noised his footing, and be come to the place wherein the thief is shrewdly or hid. These dogs are called Sleuthhounds. There was a law amongst the borderers of England and Scotland, that whosoever denied entrance to such a hound, in pursuit made after felons and stolen goods, should be holden as accessory unto the theft, or taken for the self-same thief.

Of fowls, such as (I mean) live by prey, there are sundry sorts in Scotland, as eagles, falcons, goshawks, sparrowhawks, marlions, and such like. But of water fowls, there is great store, that the report thereof may seem to exceed all credit. There are other kinds of fowls, the like are rare to be seen, as the capercaillie, greater in body than the raven, living only by the rindes and barks of trees. There are also many moor-cocks and hens, which, abstaining from corn, do feed only upon hadder-crops. These two are very delicate in eating. The third is reddish, black of colour, in quantity compared to the pheasant, and no less delicious in taste and savour at the table, called the black or wild cocks.

Salmond is more plentiful in Scotland, than in any other region of the world. In harvest-time they come from the seas, up in small rivers, where the waters most are shallow, and there the male and female, rubbing their bellies or wombs one against another, they shed their spawn, which forthwith they cover with sand and gravel, and so depart away; from henceforth they are gaunt and slender, and in appearance so lean, appearing nought else but skin and bone, and therefore out of use and season to be eaten. Some say, if they touch any of their full fellows, during the time of their leanness, the same side which they touched will become lean. The foresaid spawn and melt, being hidden in the sand (as you have heard), in the next spring doth yield great number of little fry, so nesh and tender for a long time, that till they come to be so great as a man's finger (if you catch any of them), they melt away, as it were gelly or a blob of water. From henceforth they go to the sea, where, within twenty days, they grow to a reasonable greatness, and then, returning to the place of their generation, they shew a notable spectacle, to be considered. There are many lins or pools which, being in some places among the rocks, very shallow above, and deep beneath, with the fall of the water, and thereto the salmond not able to pierce through the channel, either for swiftness of the course, or depth of the descent, he goeth so near to the side of the rock or dam as he may, and there adventuring to leap over, and up unto the lin, if he leap well at the first, he obtaineth his desire, if not, he essayeth eftsoon the second or third time, till he return to his country. A great fish, able to swim against the stream, such as essay often to leap, and cannot get over, do bruise themselves, and become mazzelled; others that happen to fall upon dry land (a thing often seen) are taken by the people (watching their time), some in caldrons of hot water, with fire under them, sit upon shallow or dry places, in hope to catch the fattest, by reason of their weight, that do leap short. The taste of these is esteemed most delicate, and their prices commonly great. In Scotland it is straitly inhibited to take any salmond from the eight of September until the fifteen of November. Finally, there is no man that knows readily whereseon this fish liveth; for never was any thing yet found in their bellies, other than a thick flimy humour. In the desert and wild places of Scotland, there groweth an herb of itself, called hadder or hather, very delicate for all kind of cattle to feed upon, and also for diverse fowls, but bees especially. This herb in June yields a purple flower, as sweet as honey, whereof the Picts in times past, did make a pleasant drink, and very wholesome for the body, but since their time the manner of the making hereof is perished in the subversion of the Picts, neither shewed they ever the learning hereof to any but to their own nation. There is no part of Scotland so unprofitable (if it were skilfully searched) but it produces either iron or some other kind of metal, as may be proved through all the isles of Scotland.

THE RYDINGE OF THE STANGE.

'Hech, kimmers!' Betty Burgie cried,
'I've gotten siccan fun!
I think I'll never mair do guid,
I've lughen aae and run!

Draw in about the creepie, Jean,
Sit down, sirs, ane and a',
And I'll tell the story head and tail,
And how it did bef'.

Yon useless brat the Tailzour carl
Began to ding his wife,
And twa three o' the neighbours roun'
Hae hafins taen his life.'

'Whisht! whisht!' cried Jamie Meldrum,
'Just hear that waesome mane!—
That devil's-buckie, Fraser,
He's thrashing's wife again.

There's no an ook in a' the year
But he gangs on the spree,
And then his wee bit wifkie
Maun a' his anger dree.

To keep my ain fireside in trim
Troth a' maun stir about;
But loch! to bang a helpless thing
Wad shame a very brute!

Syne out spoke Johnie Falconer,
'Shame fa' the dastard loon!
He's fit to bring a black disgrace
Upon our landward toon.'

'It war weel waur'd,' quo' Sandy Brown—
'And needna tak' us lang—
To seize upon the cowardly carl
And gar him ride the stange!'

'Hurra! hurra!' cried ane and a'—
Nae sooner said than done!—
And for a sapling frae the wud
Full half a hunner run.

They trail'd the Tailzour frae his cloots
And set him on the stange,
And aye they rode him up an' doon
Amo' the motely thrang!

And aye the kimmers leugh, and cried,
 'Nae t' gie 'mt rough and strang,
 There's na an' o' o' parliament
 'Gains rydinge o' the stange!'

And how they gar'd him hodge and jump
 Upon the jaggit pole,
 I'm sure 'twas mair than rumple-bane
 O' mortal man coud thole!

The Tailzour like a trooper sware
 He'd bang them at the law,
 But the mob o' loons and kimmers
 Gae the tither great guffaw!

They rode him by the stan'in' stanes,
 And round the very kirk,
 And aye the Tailzour's hurdies
 Gat the tither waesome jirk.

Wi' shout and cry they bare him by
 The cordiwaner's sta',
 But case it sud be his turn neist,
 Haith! Cordy slunk awa'.

At length and lang frae aff the stange
 The Tailzour lap by force,
 And hirpled to his cloots again
 Just like a spavied horse.

And aye the kimmers leugh, and cried,
 'Ye've gotten 't het and strang,
 There's nae a cure for drunken carls
 Like rydinge o' the stange!'

I've lived in Huntly, wife and bairn,
 Twa score o' years and mae,
 But never gat the half the fun
 That I hae gat the day.

I kenna what we wives wad dee
 Wi' carls that drink and bang,
 But for the wholesome discipline
 O' rydinge on the stange!

That "riding the stange" (an operation with which most of us have no doubt been painfully familiar in our boyish days) was, at one time, considered the appropriate punishment of husbands who maltreated their wives, is fully borne out by the following curious document, the original of which is preserved in her Majesty's General Register-House at Edinburgh, from which it is copied into the 1st vol. of the Maitland Club Miscellany:—

*Petition to the bailie of the regality of Huntly for a toleration to the stange (A.D. 1734).

Unto the much honoured the Bailie of the Regality of Huntly the humble Complaint and Representation of the Under Subscribers upon Mr John Fraser Husband to Anne Johnston in Huntly

Humbly Shewing

That upon the eleventh of January Instant the Said Mr John Fraser Did under Cloud of Night Most inhumanly and Barbarously Beat and Bruise Anne Johnston his Said Spouse to the effusion of her Blood and great hazard and peril of her Life And not only then but it is his constant practice as can be attested by Severalls of the Neighbourhead who have divers and Sundry times risen from their Beds at Mid-night and has rescued her out of his merciless hands or she had been most miserably Butchered by him. And seeing your Petitioners are informed that Said Fraser has given in ane information to your Lordships against some of our good neighbours Who upon Saturday last being the twelfth instant went to his house alleading they would cause him Ride the Stange (use and wont in such cases) but to our certain knowledge with no other Design than to fright and Deter him from his villanous and cruell usage of his Said Spouse in all time coming.

May it Therefore please Your Lordships to take this our more than most Lamentable case into Your most Serious Consideration by granting A toleration to the Stang which has not only ever been practicable in this place but in most pairs of this Kingdome being wee know no act of Parliament to the contrair: Or else if Your Lordships can fall on a more prudent method wee most humbly begg Your opinion for preventing more fatall consequences, Otherwise upon the least disobliment given wee mus expect to fall Victims to our husbands displeasure from which Libera nos Domine.

Notwithstanding the averment of the above petitioners, that their "good neighbours" only went into Fraser's house "alleading they would cause him Ride the Stange," but to their "certain knowledge" only to fear him, we find the "good neighbours," when the case is brought to trial, "confessing and acknowledging their being accessory art and part in the crime lybelled," viz., that they did attack the said Fraser "in the face of the sun about three in the afternoon, tore his cloths and abus'd his person, by carrying him in a publick manner through the town of Huntly upon a tree." The bailie decerned that they should "pay five pounds sterling, in name of damages, to the private party."

It may be necessary to add, that the regality of Huntly, before which the above case was tried, was one of those feudal rights of lands granted by the king, at first in favour of the church, but afterwards to temporal favourites. The bailies, or stewards, were the deputies of those "Lords of Regality," as, although commoners, they were styled, on account of the regal jurisdiction implied by their grants. When we mention that those lords or bailies of regality could "repledge" a criminal, even from the court of the King's Lieutenant, upon merely leaving another person as cautioner, or "caution of colerathe," that the criminal so relieved should be tried before the court to which he was "repledged" within a year and day, it will be readily seen that those courts tended rather to obstruct than to further the ends of justice, and to keep the country in a lawless state, instead of promoting loyalty and good order.

DUNURE.

THE Carrick shore, in Ayrshire, presents few localities so picturesque and interesting as the small harbour and village of Dunure. For sea-bathing we know not a more inviting situation. The seclusion of the spot, and the numerous little creeks, formed by the scattered rocks, thrown, as it were, out into the sea, affording ample opportunities for immersion at all times of the tide, render it one of the most desirable marine residences in Ayrshire. Approached by land, the harbour is completely hidden until the visitor arrives within a few hundred yards of it. The hills in the rear, forming part of the high range which extends along the coast from Carrick's Brown Hill, and the abrupt and bold eminences jutting forward on each side, guard the little bay in every direction, save towards the Frith, which spreads its broad surface in beautiful expanse till arrested by the opposite shores of Arran and Cantyre. Descending from Dunduff Hill—the day a summer one, with the sun unclouded, and a breeze just enough to fill the swelling sail—the view is delightful. The eye has a wide range, from Ailsa's blue crag, to the very mouth of the Clyde. Away about mid-channel is seen some large ship, with crowded canvass, gliding gallantly along. Homeward bound, after a tedious and perhaps perilous voyage—loaded with the produce of other climes—what pleasurable sensations fill every bosom on board: home and friends to be embraced once more! Is her prow towards the ocean? Then what hopes and fears, what thoughts of "high emprise" may not alternately swell the emigrant's heart, as every breath of heaven, laden with the sighs of those he has left behind, wafts him farther from the loved cliffs of his native land! Close in shore, for the wind is from the land, numerous coasting vessels are plying in various directions—here, one is just clearing the headland towards the east, as if, by some magic influence, she were emerging from the rock itself—there, another shoots towards the west, impelled by the same breeze—while a whole fleet of fishing craft, spreading their white sails in the dazzling sunbeams, flit like sea-birds over the dancing waves. Still descending, the visiter at length looks down on the peaceful community. The number of boats, old and new, lying on the beach, together with various implements employed to entrap the unwary tribes of the deep, denote the occupation of the inhabitants—they are all fishermen. Some are engaged in repairing their damaged craft—others, seated by the sunny side of the harbour, in mending their nets; while not a few of the juvenile portion of the community are bird-nesting among the furze-covered rocks, or gathering pebbles by the shore. A stilly, dreamy quietness pervades the scene, save when the plashing oar announces the return of some of the fishermen. The houses, though few in number, wear an aspect of comfort and cleanliness, superior to many of a similar description on the East coast. Some of them, with their flower-plots in front, neatly enclosed with tarred paling, have an appearance altogether unique. The jointure house of the late Mrs Kennedy of Dalquharran, is a commodious and excellent villa, with garden and walks pleasantly arranged. What must add greatly to the health and comfort of the inhabitants is the abundant supply of excellent water. Copious springs well out in every quarter. The harbour itself is a curiosity. It is little more than a wet dock, and with an entrance narrow and unsafe, one is at a loss to conceive how the engineer, Mr Abercrombie, imagined any vessel larger than a herring-smack could sail into it unless in very calm weather; yet the work is said to have cost upwards of £30,000. This is perhaps not so wonderful, as the excavations have been made almost entirely out of the solid rock. It was intended, we believe, as a port for shipping the mineral and agricultural produce of the surrounding district; but the project failed, as well from other causes as the malformation of the harbour. The only traffic seems to be in Irish lime. There is a lime-kiln on the spot. Though rather an expensive construction for such a purpose, the harbour is admirably adapted for a fishing station. Once within its walls, the boats are perfectly secure.

A prominent object in the scenery of Dunure, and one of most interest to the visiter, is the old Castle, occupying a rocky eminence, which is washed by the sea.* It formed the original seat of the ancestors of the Marquis of Ailsa. The author of the "Historie of the Kennedys" assigns the origin of the family to the battle of Larga. According to his statement, the stronghold of Dunure was then possessed by the Danes. After the battle, on Acho's retreating, he was pursued by M'Kinnon of the Isles and his sons, who, finding that he had taken shelter in the Castle of Ayr, pressed forward to Dunure, in pursuit of one of his great captains, and there captured both him and the fort. For this service Alexander III. rewarded M'Kinnon by a grant of the castle, and certain lands around it. The following is this writer's account of the affair:—

"The Black Book of Scone sets their (the Kennedies) beginning to be in the reign of King Malcolm the Second, who was crowned in the year of God 1010 years, and was the fourscore King of Scotland. There was with the King, one M'Kenane of the Isles, who was slain by Danes at the battle of Murluk; and of him came the M'Kenane of the Isles, who 'bruiakis' (possesses) the lands of Strowordell to this hour. This M'Kenane of the Isles' succession was at the time of King Donald's reign, when the Danes got possession of the whole Isles, banished by them into Ireland, where he remained to the reign of King Alexander the Third, and then came to King Alexander before the battle of Larga, with threescore of his name and servants; and after that King Acho was defeated, he fled to Ayr, and there took shipping. The principal man that pursued him was M'Kenane, with his two sons; and after that the King of Danes was received in the Castle of Ayr, M'Kenane followed on a Lord or great Captain of the Danes, to a crag in Carrick, whereon there was a strength built by the Danes, low by the sea side; the which strength M'Kenane and his sons took, and slew the captain and all that was therein. For the which deed, this M'Kenane got the same strength from King Alexander, with certain lauds lying thereto; the which he gave to his second me, and there was the first beginning of the name of Kennedy in the mainland. On the strength and crag there is now a fair castle, which the chiefs of the lowland Kennedys took their style of, for a long space, and were called Lairds of Dunure, because of the don of the hill above that house. Of this house the rest of that name are coming."

This alleged origin of the Kennedys is considered fabulous, the name not having been known in Carrick previous to the battle of Largs, fought in 1263. In "Wood's Peerage," the descent of the family is traced back to Duncan de Carrick, in the reign of Malcolm IV., Carrick or Kennedy, as it is said, being the patronymic indiscriminately used down to the time of Sir John Kennedy of Dunure, founder of the collegiate church in Maybole, and who obtained the lands and barony of Cassillis from Marjorie, heiress of Sir John Montgomerie, Knight, of Stair. This occurred about 1373. It is seldom, however, that tradition is totally at variance with fact. The similarity in the ancient armorial bearings is presumptive that the island and mainland Kennedys were of the same stock. In the Highlands there are several small clans of the name of Kennedy—in Gaelic, M'Urick or M'Rorie—and it is rather a striking coincidence that the isolated conical mount on which the flag-staff is erected at Dunure, near the mouth of the harbour, is called Port-Rorie, evidently meaning the port of M'Rorie or Kennedy.

The immediate ancestor of Sir John Kennedy obtained a grant of the lands of Loch Doon from King Robert the Bruce; but it is somewhat remarkable that he was himself the first of the family apparently styled of Dunure. How is this to be accounted for, unless by the supposition that it had been a recent acquisition—perhaps through failure in the line of their relatives, the descendants of the hero of Largs? The family, as observed by the author of the "Historic of the Kennedys," does not appear to have been of much note in the days of Bruce and Wallace, at least none of them make any figure at that period. Several generations succeeded ere their rising greatness secured for them the popular distinction of Kings of Carrick. But whether the old chronicler is correct or not, there can be no doubt that Dunure was an early residence of the main branch of the Kennedys. The house of Cassillis, after the acquisition of that barony by Sir John Kennedy, became the principal seat, though Dunure, still maintained for its strength, continued to be a place of no small importance during the feudal conflicts in Carrick. Here, in the "Black Vault" (vault), the Abbot of Crossraguel, Allan Stuart, was subjected to a process of compulsion peculiarly illustrative of the insecure state of society at the time. The "roasting of the Abbot," as the circumstance was designated, took place on the first and seventh days of September, 1570. Various narratives are on record of this singular transaction, all agreeing in the main facts, but differing in minor particulars. Richard Bannatyne, in his "Memorials," gives a very full and graphic account of it, but the statement of the Abbot himself—contained in the Act of Privy Council, April 27, 1571—is no doubt the most authentic. The object of the Earl was to obtain possession of the Abbey of Crossraguel. At the Reformation, when a general scramble for the church lands ensued, the then Abbot, Quentin Kennedy, an uncle of his own, made over to him a few of the lands; but this not having been confirmed by the king, the next entrant, Stuart, would not, of course, acknowledge the deed. The Earl, however, determined to secure by force what fair means failed to accomplish. The following is the Abbot's version of the affair:—

"Upon the 29th day of August last bypast (1570), I, being within the wood of Crossraguel doing my leesome (lawful) business, believing no harm nor invasion to have been done to me by any person or persons; notwithstanding, Gilbert, Earl of Cassillis, Thomas, Master of Cassillis, with their accomplices, to the number of sixteen persons or thereby, came to me, and persuaded me by their flattery and deceitful words to pass with them to his castle and place of Danure, being always minded, if I had made refusal to pass with them, to have taken me perforce. And, he putting me within the same, that I should be in sure firmance, commanded six of his servants to await upon me, so that I ischewit (escaped) not, who took from me my horse, with all my weapons, and then departed, while (until) the first day of September thereafter that he came again, and required me to subscribe to him a feu charter, brought with him, made in parchment, of the whole lands pertaining to the said abbacy, together with nineteen and five years' tack of the fruits, teinds, and duties thereof, as he alleged, of the whole kirks and parsonages pertaining thereto; whereof I never having read a word of, answered it was a thing unreasonable, and that I could nowadays do, in respect the same, long before, was already disposed to the kindly tenants and possessors thereof, and to James Stuart of Cardonell; and therefore the same being furth of my hands, I could no ways grant his unreasonable desire! Who then, after long boasting and menacing of me, caused me to be carried by John Kennedy, his baker, John M'Leir, his cook, Alexander Richard, his pantry-man, Alexander Eccles, and Sir William Tod, to a house called the Black Vault (vault) of Dunure; where the tormentors denuded me of all my clothes, perforce, except only my shirt and doublet, and then bound both my hands, at the shackle-bones, with a cord, as he did both my feet, and bound my soles betwixt an iron chimney* and a fire; and being bound thereto could nowadays stir nor move, but had almost inlaikit (died) through my cruel burning. And seeing no other appearance to me but either to condescend to his desire or else to continue in that torment while I died, took me to the longest life, and said 'I would obey his desire,' albeit it was sore against my will, and for to be relieved of my said pain subscribed the fore-named charter and tacks, which I never yet read, nor knew what therein was contained; which being done, the said Earl caused the said tormentors of me swear upon a Bible never to reveal one word of this my unmerciful handling to any person or persons. Yet, he not being satisfied with these proceedings, came again upon the seventh day of the foresaid month, bringing with him the said charter and tack which he compelled me to subscribe, and required me to ratify and approve the same before notary and witnesses; which alluterlie (altogether) I refused. And therefore, he, as before, bound me, and put me to the same manner of tormenting; and I said, notwithstanding, 'he should first get my life or ever I agreed to his desire;' and being in so great pain as I trust never man was in with his life, when I cried, 'Fie upon ye! will ye ding whingaris (short swords) in me and put me off this world, or else put a barrel of powder under me, rather than to be demanded (used) in this unmerciful manner!' The said Earl hearing me cry, bade his servant Alexander Richard put a serviat (napkin) in my throat, which he obeyed, the same being performed at eleven hours in the night, when then seeing that I was in danger of my life, my flesh consumed and burned to the bones, and that I would not condescend to their purpose, I was relieved of that pain, whereof I never will be able nor well in my life time."

The Earl, finding the Abbot resolute, left him in charge of his servants, and proceeded to Cassillis. In the meantime, the Laird of Bargany hearing of the mal-treatment of his brother-in-law,* the Abbot, sent one "Dauid Kennedy of Maxsalstone, quha had been his peadge befor," with ten or twelve servants, under cloud of night to Dunure. Here the party concealed themselves in the chapel, which, though connected with the main portion of the castle, was outside the moat, at the end of the draw-bridge. In the morning, as the keepers were "opening the yett," they issued out, and entering the house, took the domestics captive, confining them, no doubt, for safety, in the keep. Not daring to venture forth with the Abbot, lest the Earl's tenantry should attack them, they despatched one of their number privately, to apprise Bargany of their situation. Before the Laird could assemble a sufficient force, however, the master of Cassillis, and his uncle, the Laird of Culzean, collected a numerous body of retainers, and surrounding the Castle, endeavoured to make good an entrance by piercing the wall of the chapel adjoining the dungeon. The men within defended themselves with much spirit. They threw down large stones from the battlements of the Castle, and breaking the roof of the chapel, compelled the assailants to desist. The Master of Cassillis is described as having been the "fraukest," or boldest in the assault. He determined to set fire to the building, threatening to destroy all within. The assailed advised him to be more moderate; but, in the words of the document from which we borrow, "no admonition wad help, till that the wind of ane hacquebute blasted his shulder, and then ceased he from further pursuite, in furie." Bargany meanwhile was not idle. He procured letters from the proper authority, charging all his Majesty's subjects to aid him against the Earl, and so great was the ferment created by the treatment of the Abbot, that he soon found himself at the head, not only of all his own retainers, but an immense gathering from Kyle and Cuninghame. Before such an overwhelming body, the master of Cassillis and his followers were obliged to retire. The besieged were relieved, and the Abbot carried, "brunt as he was," to the town of Ayr, where, at the Cross, he denounced the cruelty of which he had been the victim. Dunure Castle continued in possession of Bargany's men for some time afterwards until, a reconciliation was effected between the families. To the "brunt Abbot" Cassillis gave a certain sum annually, by way of solatium for his injuries. The Castle has been in ruins since the middle of the seventeenth century. In Abercrombie's description of Carrick, written between 1688 and 1696, it is spoken of as "wholly ruined," so that its demolition must have taken place some considerable time prior. From the calcined appearance of more than one part of the building, it was in all likelihood destroyed by fire. The barony of Dunure has been in the possession of the Kennedies of Dalquharran for a length of time back.

* Stuart was married to his sister.

ORIGIN OF THURSO.

THE antiquity of the town of Thurso cannot now be traced with any degree of certainty; but it appears from Torfæus and the Icelandic authors, who are amongst the most ancient and the most authentic of the northern historians, that it was a place of very considerable trade and consequence many centuries ago. Scarcely any thing of an authentic or satisfactory nature can now be found regarding it prior to the 10th or 11th century. The date of its first assuming the form of a town is buried within the deep shades of the forgotten past. We find mention of Thurso as a populous town in the 11th century, and Torfæus calls it, about the same date, "the town of Caithness."

The origin of Thurso, like that of other places of great antiquity, has been variously accounted for. It is said that a Saxon general, of the name of Horsa, in the 5th century, landed at the river mouth, and that from him Thurso derived its name. Its Gaelic name is Inver-Horsa; the mouth of a river or stream being termed Inver in that language—hence Horsa's river, or landing place. We learn from some ancient English historians, that when the Romans left Britain, the latter expecting no farther assistance from them, and being unable to defend themselves against the furious attacks of their fierce northern foes, the Scots and Picts, they called over the Saxons from the country of Holslein, in the lower parts of Germany, to their assistance; who arriving in Britain, in the year 449, under the command of Hengist, and Horsa his brother, joined the Britons, and with their united powers marched against the Scots and Picts, and defeated them in a battle at Stamford in Lincolnshire. Hengist was so well pleased and encouraged by this victory, and having learned that there were several strong walls or fences in the northern parts of Britain, erected by the Romans to restrain the invasions of the Scots and Picts, that, about the year 452, he advised Vortigern, king of the Britons, to send for Ochta and Abisa, his son and nephew, from Saxony, who, being well versed in the art of war, would fight against the Scots and Picts, in the northern parts of Britain, provided he would bestow on them the countries in those parts on the northern side of these walls. Vortigern, agreeing to Hengist's proposal, sent for Ochta and Abisa. They arrived in Britain soon after with a fleet of ships full of armed men, and, on being joined by Hengist and Horsa, sailed, with upwards of 40 ships, into the northern parts of the Isle, and having subdued many portions of it, settled themselves and followers therein. It was at this time that Horsa and his followers arrived in Thurso river. The Saxons plundered Caithness, and it seems that they had a bloody conflict with the natives; for, we find in the Appendix to Pennant's Tour in Scotland, 1769, by Alexander Pope, then minister of the parish of Reay, that in that parish "there is a place called Tout Horsa, or Horsa's grave, where they say that some great warrior was slain and buried; in the place is a great stone erected. Probably he was one of Horsa's Captains." And just as probable, that it is the grave of Horsa himself. From what has been now related, it is not in the least improbable, that our river was visited by this General Horsa, but that it derived its name from him is a question yet to be decided.

Another derivation of Thurso is also given by historians, which is, that it is made up of the words Thor and aa. It is spelt by the Icelandic historians Thorsaa. In that language, aa signifies a great river; and it was in this parish that the principal river in the neighbourhood, to which they had prefixed the name of their great deity, Thor, flowed into the sea: hence Thor's aa, or Thor's river. From the river, the same name extended itself to the town, which was built at its mouth, to the neighbouring bay, and to the surrounding district. The latter derivation seems to us the more probable. Caithness was inhabited previous to the landing of the Saxons, by the Picts, a race of people, originally from Scandinavia,* (this is the most probable conjecture,) and Thurso being so advantageously situated near the sea, having the best roadstead for vessels on the whole west coast of Caithness or Sutherland, and having a river well supplied with salmon and an excellent commodious natural harbour at its entrance to the sea, and surrounded by a fine country, must have been then the most populous part of the county, as we are told that was the case in the 11th century, and, consequently, would have some distinguishing name by which it would be known. Thor was the great deity of the north; it is not at all improbable, then, that they would prefix his name to such a place. And moreover, this derivation is also supported by the fact that, along the sea coast of Caithness, and throughout many of the northern and western islands, a great number of the names by which particular places are distinguished, are evidently Norse, Norwegian, or Icelandic, different dialects of the same tongue, which was spoken by a variety of tribes or nations, who, in ancient times, distinguished by their predatory attacks, and afterwards by their possession all that part of Scotland.—Caithness Chronicle.

EARL SINCLAIR.

Translated from the German of Oehlenschläger.
By Mrs HAWKER, MORWENSTOW.
Earl Sinclair sailed from Scottish land,
Across the Norway to brave;
Of Gulbrand's rocky strand,
And lay in a gory grave.
Earl Sinclair sailed the billowy sea,
To seek for Swedish gold:

our antiquarian writers consider the
to have been the ancient Caledonians.

"God speed thy warrior-hearts and thee,
And quell the Northmen bold!"

The moon beam'd in her cloudy cave,
The night winds rushed along;
And wild beneath the thrilling wave
Came up the mermaid's song:

"Home, Scottish man, my warning trust,
A doom is on thy way;
If thou shalt touch dark Norway's coast,
Thy fame is fled for aye!"

"How loathsome sounds thy boding song!
I hate thee while I dread:
Were thou my castled towers among,
The rack should be thy bed!"

He sailed a day, and two, and three,
He and his warrior band:
The fourth sun saw him pass the sea,
And touch the Norway land.

On Romsdal's shore his heart was fain
To triumph or to fall,
He and his twice seven hundred men
The trusty and the tall.

Ah, stern and haughty was their wrath,
Cruel with sword and spear;
Nor hoary age could check their path,
Nor widow'd woman's tear.

With many a death the babes they slew,
Though to the breast they clung;
And awful tidings, sad and true,
Echoed on voice and tongue.

On rock and hill the beacon glared
That told of danger nigh;
The Northman's breast was boldly bared,
The Scot must stand or die.

The warriors of the land are far,
They and their kingly lord;
Yet shame to him that shuns the war,
Or fears the stranger horde.

They move—they meet—the Yewmen host,
Their hearts are stern and free;
They gather on Bredaligh's coast—
The Scot shall yield or flee.

The Langé flows in Leydê-land
Where Kringen's Arches bind,
Thither they march, the fated band,
A silent tomb to find.

The forest holds each feeble frame
Far from the warrior-foe,
And kelpies of the waters came
And shrouded them with snow.

In onslaught first Earl Sinclair died,
And ceased his haughty breath;
Stern sport for Scottish men to bide,
God shield them from the death:

Come forth, come forth, ye Northmen true
Light be your hearts to-day!
Fain would the Scots the waters blue
Between the battle lay!

The ranks yield to that fiery storm,
On high the ravens sail:
Ah me! for every quivering form
A Scottish wife shall wail!

They came, a host with life and breath :
None, none return'd to say,
How fares the Foeman in the strife
Who wars with Norway !

There is a mound by Lange's tide,
The Northman gazes near :
His eye is bright, but not with pride—
It glistens with a tear !

"MARY SCOTT, THE FLOWER OF YARROW."

THE birthplace of this celebrated beauty, like that of Homer, has been contended for by almost every tower on the Ettrick and Yarrow. This is no doubt owing to the prevailing name of Scott in the district. Hogg, we think, it is who has assigned the locality to Kirkhope Tower. He probably did so for the purpose of transferring the reputation of "the flower of Yarrow," to the Scotts of Buccleuch, who have long possessed that fortress. But that tower is situated on the Ettrick, and, in the days of Mary Scott, was one of the fastnesses of the Scotts of Harden, who never claimed her.

All the traditions on the Yarrow agree that Dryhope Tower was the house of Mary Scott ; and we think it has the best claim to the distinction, considering the story of her ill-starred courtship and elopement with one of the "Black Douglasses," who had taken up their residence in one of the neighbouring glens, and given their name to the surrounding heights, as well as to a considerable stream that flows from the hills.

Of the personal history of Mary Scott little seems to be known, except that she was of "exceeding beauty." Only one event of her life, and that a tragic one, is recorded by tradition. Hogg's account of her is almost wholly fictitious, as an old and intelligent native of the Yarrow informed us. The single story of her life relates to her secret elopement with her lover, one of the Douglasses of Blackhouse, who, with his brothers, was in the act of escorting her to their tower, when the party were intercepted by the Scotts of Dryhope, who had suspected or been informed of the plot. The two families being at feud at the time, a deadly combat ensued, in which all the brothers on both sides were either killed or mortally wounded. A clump of birks is pointed out on the Douglas Burn, as the scene of the fatal affray —

"But the sunniest hill throws the deepest shade,
And I live to mourn that deadly raid,
When a' the blude that was dear to me,
Was sprinkled around that birken tree."

Dryhope has been one of the strongest towers on the Yarrow, second only to Newark. It belonged some time since to the Earls of Traquair, and is now the property of the Duke of Buccleuch. It stands on a slight eminence, on the rocky margin of a streamlet, within a few hundred yards of the source of the Yarrow—that is, the outlet of St Mary's Lake. Like other towers of the same era, it is square and high. Although roofless, and the whole interior an open ruin, the "donjon keep," with all the hooks and beams necessary for "strapping" prisoners "in cais of neid," remains comparatively entire.

Dryhope commands the most beautiful and extensive view of all the Yarrow or Ettrick towers, having both the lakes, four miles in extent, and the mountain-passes into Moffatdale, under the eye, on the south ; and on the west all the gorges of the western ridges, converging, meet near the tower. The peculiarly shaped, long-backed ranges, in its immediate neighbourhood, to the west and north, are the greenest and prettiest on the Yarrow ; and at sunset, in a summer evening, the sublimity and mellow beauty of the scene can hardly be surpassed.

CASTLE OF GLENMORISTON.

From Highland Sports and Highland Quarters.

BY HERBERT BYNG HALL, Esq.

THE ancient castle of Glenmoriston, or Invermoriston, on the site of which the present mansion stands, was built by John Grant, more commonly called John A'Chragan, between the years 1440 and 1450. This bold chieftain—or clansman, as he might then more properly be termed—whose name stands pre-eminent in the history of those days when bloodshed and neighbouring feuds were ripe among the clans, was the direct ancestor of the present owner, James Grant, Esq. of Glenmoriston—by courtesy or Highland custom on all occasions addressed as Glenmoriston ; indeed, when first introduced to his amiable wife, we are not quite satisfied that we did not "hope Mrs Glenmoriston was in good health," the name of Grant being quite out of the question in the glen. In the year 1715, the above ancient stronghold was burnt to the ground by the troops of the government, and the whole property of A'Chragan forfeited to the crown. Mr Grant's grandfather, however, repurchased his own estate—at least such was literally the case ; and he built on the blackened foundation a residence of wood, to replace the ancient pile of his ancestors.

The existence of this structure, however, was of short duration, for in the year 1745 the King's troops again applied the torch, and the wooden fabric blazed into light on the dark waters of the Ness, as a beacon for the gathering of neighbouring clans, that their chieftain was in danger. Such men as these, however, were not to be easily subdued by fire or sword, and once more the present interesting structure rose from the solid ruins of its ancient strength, from the remnants of which it was literally built on the ashes of its predecessors. Nevertheless, the property was once more forfeited to the crown, and the name of Glenmoriston stood prominent in the list of attainted Highland proprietors for rebellion ; but by the act, it is presumed, of some unknown friend to the family even to the present hour, his name was erased ; and from that time the heathered hills and dark mountains, fair fields and spacious domains of the Grants, were left in their peaceful possession. And may the well-known loyalty of heart, and liberality of conduct and opinion of its present possessor, secure it to him and his heirs for ages ! For any other details of this ancient family, to such of our readers who desire it, we will refer them to a pleasing little book, called "Ascanius, or the Wanderer"—a work giving rather an interesting account of the Prince's wanderings after the battle of Culloden. That will tell them something —but a visit to the glen will please them more. The present house stands on a lawn, within two gun-shots of the waters of the Ness. Nothing can be more picturesque and sheltered than its present position. To the west, the small park is encircled by the river Moriston, which, rushing over a beautiful waterfall within the pleasure grounds in the immediate vicinity of the castle, joins the lake below. The north or rear of the house is protected by lofty and wood-clad mountains, at the base of which a few houses repose, among which may be numbered a clean and comfortable little inn: the whole embowered in trees, mark the village of Glenmoriston as one scarcely surpassed even in Switzerland by the wildness and beauty of its situation.

ANCIENT UNPUBLISHED CHARTER.

GILBERT DE CLES is a witness to a confirmation to the church of the Holy Trinity of Dunfermling, by Margaret de Syreis, (Ceres) sometime wife of Michael Scot, of a donation by her husband of the lands of Gaskinienemphij. Edmond Ironside is also a witness. Chartulary of Dunfermling, p. 100. A grant of ten shillings per annum to the Monks of Dunfermling by him, occurs at p. 108. Gilbert appears with other persons, on 27th October 1230, as one of the perambulators appointed by precept from the crown to settle a dispute about marches between the convent of Dunfermling and David de Dunduff—Hostiarius—and which perambulation David confirms, p. 111. He also witnesses a settlement of a dispute between William Abbot of Dunfermling and Richard of Balwari, p. 140.

Cles is now known as Cleish, and the following charter, hitherto unpublished, is interesting not only to the topographer, but to the genealogist. The original document is very much mutilated. Some of the lacunæ are conjecturally supplied by the words or letters included in brackets.

"Omnibus sancte matris ecclesie filiis, has litteras visuris vel auditoris, Gillebertus de Cles, salutem: sonerit vniuersitas vestra, me dedisse concessisse, et hac carta mea confirmasse, consensu et assensu heredum meorum, Johanni de Petliuer, nepoti meo, pro homagio et seruitio suo, [quindecim] acras terre in territorio de Cles, scilicet, toftum abrahe, et residuum superius et inferius, ex parte australi et . . . eiusdem crofti usque ad quindecim acras . . . etas, et illam portionem prati que adiacet conti[que] . . . parte orientali et communem pasturam, ad . . . vaccas cum sequela earum, et ad sexaginta oues . . . et ad tres sues fetas cum sequela earum, infra predictam villam de Cles et extra: tenendas et habendas sibi et] heredibus suis, de me, et heredibus meis, in feudo et hereditate, libere, quiete, et pacifice, cum omnibus libertatibus [et] aisiamentis ad tantam pertinentibus tarram, infra predictam villam de Cles et extra, Reblendo inde annuatim mihi et heredibus meis, nam liberam cummi ad festum apostolorum Petri et Pauli, pro omnibus seruitiis, et secularibus demandis: faciendo et forinsecum seruitium domini Regis, quodcumque pertinet ad quindecim acras terre, si dictus Johannes mecum . . . exercitu. THE "SWASCHE."

A CORRESPONDENT, writing from Aberdeen, says:—"An error has crept into No. 8 of the Journal, which, although of small import, will look all the better of being corrected. In a note to No. VI. of the 'Chronicles of the Canongate,' it is said 'Ane swasche to our moustiris—a trumpet to our musters.' Now, 'ane swasche' is a drum, and not a trumpet; as will be obvious, if you glance a line or two farther on in the text—'item for twa sticks to the swasche.' We have all heard of drum-sticks and fiddle-sticks, but trumpet-sticks are certainly new auxiliaries to a 'concert of sweet sounds.'

"I send you this with the best feeling, for I like the 'Chronicles' very much, and have been comparing them with the 'Chronicles' of Aberdeen in some matters: for example, I find, in reference to 'minstrels,' that the Canongate was considerably before our 'braif toun' in dispensing with their Pyper; for it was not until 1631 that our council 'for dyvers respectis and considerations moving thame, dischargit Thomas Wobster, thair common pyper, of all goeing throw the towne at nicht, or in the morning, in tyme coming with his pyp.' Aberdeensmen, however, seldom do anything without a sufficient reason assigned, and our council discontinued the 'pyp,' because it was 'ane incivill forme to be usit within sic a famous burgh, and being often fund fault with als weil be sundrie nichtbouris of the toun as be strangeris.' Our townsmen, however, seem to have been fond of changes in this particular, for as early as 1566 they had 'ane Sweschman' playing upon the swesche als weil in tyme of war as in tyme of peace, and sport, and play; and in 1574 the same individual was ordered to pass 'throw all the rewis of the toune, playand upon the Almanay Quhissil [German whistle or flute], with ane servand with him playand on the Tabourine."

[We feel greatly obliged by the communication of our correspondent. Dr Jamieson, in his Scottish Dictionary, defines the word in question thus: "Swasche, s. a trumpet—Keith's History. Swescher, a trumpeter—"The common suescher." Aberd. Reg. He derives it from the Anglo-Saxon Swoeg, signifying sound in general, any musical instrument. Our correspondent will thus see that, if we are wrong, Dr Jamieson must also be wrong. The probability is that "ane swasche," in the case of the Canongate, does signify a drum; because it is difficult to see, as our correspondent remarks, the use of two sticks to a trumpet.]

A SUBJECT FOR ANTIQUARIES.

A FEW days since, while workmen were engaged in excavating the bank of the river (Clyde) at Springfield, they came upon a wooden formation, at a depth of about 17 feet below the present surface level, which, on being fairly dug out, was found to be the remains of a canoe, made of Scotch oak, of one piece, and evidently formed by scooping out the trunk of a very large tree. From the decayed appearance of the wood, as well as on account of the singularly rude and primitive nature of the construction, we have no hesitation in believing that many hundred years have elapsed since it came from the hands of an architect. Upon the whole, it is a clumsy-looking article, but must have cost the builder no small labour before his task was finished. The length of the canoe or barge, as it may be called, is upwards of eleven feet—the prow is sloped in regular Chinese style, but what has apparently once been the stern is of a heavy, uncouth formation. It is about 18 inches in breadth, and of proportionate depth, and, when afloat on the water, would be capable of accommodating two or three persons. It was found, we may explain, in a bed of sand, from which some conjecture that the course of the river has at one time ran in that direction. Be this as it may, the article is certainly a curiosity in its way, and may afford ample ground for speculation to those who think the subject worthy of their attention. We may mention that it is to be seen in the open court-yard at the River Trustees' buildings in Robertson Street, where, on Tuesday, it afforded cause for considerable surmise and conjecture on the part of the members of the trust.—Glasgow Saturday Post, Oct. 9, 1847.

SUPPOSED WORK BY GILBERT BURNET, SON OF THE BISHOP.

IN 1745, there was published, without any printer's name, "Le Chevalier de St George, rehabilité dans sa qualité de Jacques III., par de nouvelles preuves avec la relation historiques des suites de sa Naissance, par Mr. Rousset, Membre de l'Académie des Sciences de St Petersburg, &c." A. Whitehall De l'Ancienne Imprimerie du Cokpit, 1745," 12mo.

In the address to the reader it is asserted that the original dissertation was written in 1713, by Mr Gilbert Burnet, son of the well known Bishop of Salisbury, when the Chevalier and his adherents were, by the treaty of Utrecht, excluded from France. The object was to induce Queen Anne to name her brother as her successor. It seems to have been dedicated to Viscount Bolinbroke. What degree of truth there may be in this assertion, it is not easy to say; but the legitimacy of the prince required no vindication; for the attempt made to represent him as a supposititious child was ludicrous, and its partial belief at one time is only another striking illustration of the gullibility of the public, and of the ease with which it swallows the most atrocious falsehoods, when vended by political mountebanks.

HEBREW CHAIR.

INCARCERATION OF THE PROFESSOR.

IN Mr Sinclair's Memorandum of Incumbents of the Hebrew Chair, in the University of Edinburgh, laid before the Town-Council on Tuesday the 5th October inst.,

it is stated that on Feb. 2, 1694, Mr Alexander Rule, student of divinity, was elected to the office. On Nov. 6, 1702, a Mr Goodale was apportioned. But whether Mr Rule relinquished the chair, or was dismissed from office, is not said. However, from an entry in the Goal Record of May 13, 1715, "Mr Alexander Rule, late Professor of Hebrew," appears to have been incarcerated for a debt of £12, 10s. Scots (£1, 10s. sterling), and remained in prison till the 15th June following, when he was liberated by consent of his creditor. The ci-devant professor, in the autumn of the same year, was again doomed to a second visit to the "Heart of Midlothian;" for we find that, on Sept. 6, 1715, Alexander Rule, "Maister of Airts," was incarcerated at the instance of Robert Gibson, "barbar and periwig maker," for non-payment of £8 Scots (13s. 4d. sterling), and remained in "durance vile" till the 8th of December following.

BUILDING OF MARR'S WORK, STIRLING, 1570-2.—The following curious entries, relative chiefly to the expenses incurred in building Marr's Work in Stirling, occur, under date 8th November 1575, in the confirmations of the settlement of the regent Marr, who died 29th October 1572:—"Item thair was awand be the said umquhile nobill and potent lord, to his wrichtis, masonis, smythe, querriers, barrowmen, and other workmen at his Ludgeing in Striveling for the yeiris preceeding his Lordships deceis, the soun of ane hundreid, xxvi. l. xliis. iiijd. Item awine to the watchemen, porter, and gardinar of the Castell of Striveling for these feus of the Witsunday terine in anno lxxij, the soun of xxxi. lib. x."

DRUIDICAL TEMPLES IN SCOTLAND.—Several of the Druids' places of worship are still to be seen in the Highlands. Of these temples, at which the ancient Caledonians were wont to worship, the largest we have seen in the north is one in Morayshire, and those at Leys and Torbreck, near Inverness. In our own neighbourhood, above Dochmalung, there is a pretty large one, the stones of which, it is maintained by many of the peasants in the district, are said to have been, at one time, human beings, which were overtaken with judgment for dancing on the Sabbath day, and that the position of the stones exactly corresponds with the different attitudes of the dancers. Hence the name Clachan Gorach, or foolish stones.—Ross-shire Advertiser.

RESORT OF HERRINGS TO THE WEST COAST.—Thir herrings come together, as if they were under government of their own, and swim with a great deal of order as an army marching in battell aray. They enter the Firth of Clyde from the Mule of Kintyre yearly, sometime in June or July. When they first enter, they frequently come alongst the coast of Argile, and enter the Lochs, and take some time before they settle their principall residence. They come so throng that they are not visible to the fishers, but in calm weather they will swell and move the very ocean. They have some time found them on the coast of Galloway and Carrick, about Bal-lantrae, but more frequently in the Lochs on Argile side, and within Clyde at Greenock.—Description of Renfrewshire, by Principal Mr William Dunlop, of the College of Glasgow, about 1690.

ARDROSSAN.*

THE ancient burying ground of this parish is situated a short distance north of the ruins of the Castle. It has apparently been abandoned as a place of sepulture for nearly a century, and the walls with which it has been enclosed, have long since ceased to protect the consecrated ground from the intrusion of the cattle grazing around it. The foundations of the Church, which was blown down by a violent storm in 1691, may still be traced, and, from their limited extent, convey a correct idea of the thinness of the population of the parish at that comparatively recent period. In the cemetery itself, the graves indicated by the turfy mound, and the rude unchiselled headstone, are numerous, while the number of lettered monuments, in various stages of decay, is considerably greater. None, however, of these fog-incrusted memorials appear to have been inscribed with anything beyond the name, profession, and years, of those they commemorate, if we except the "Memento Mori," which precedes or ends the greater part of the brief inscriptions. There is, indeed, only one monument here, or rather but a part of one, measuring four feet three inches, by two feet, calculated in the least to excite the interest of the curious in such matters, though from its weather-wasted and mutilated condition, nothing satisfactory can be made either of its inscription or armorials. The former runs round the margin of the stone in a single line of old Saxon or Irish character, and encloses the lower half of the figure of an "armed man" in bas-relief. Over the limbs of the effigy is carved a shield, charged with a meagre animal rampant; but whether lion, libbard, wolf, or dog of chase has been meant to be represented, it is impossible now to determine. From the breast of the figure depends another shield, quartered; but of neither of the defaced bearings in these divisions, nor of the purport of the equally obliterated marginal inscription, are we competent to hazard a conjecture. We have heard it stated, and perhaps the authority is good, (though we know not the grounds upon which the statement rests,) that this monument belonged to the ancient family of Montfode of that ilk—the ruins of whose baronial residence are visible from the churchyard.

There is only another stone to be met with here bearing armorials, but several are decked with the common-place emblems of mortality—"wing'd hour-glasses, bones, and skulls, and spades"—that so long composed the tasteless staple decorations of every grade of our funeral monuments. The stone referred to bears a chevron between three fleurs-de-lis, and the circumscription, which is given as a sample of all the epitaphs in this neglected burying-ground, will, at the same time, shew that there is nothing to regret in the paucity of heraldic forms, which become altogether valueless when thus misapplied:—"Heir. lyes, the corps. of. Grizal. Bowltan. Spous. to. John. Brown. Farmer. In. Craft. Heid. In. Saltcoats. who. Deceis-ed. upon. the. 1. of. April. 1665. Memento. Mori."

After the downfall of the church, in 1691, another was constructed about half a mile to the north-east of the castle, in a more central and sheltered situation. Of this edifice, which was taken down in 1744, there remains not a vestige. The plough has, during the lapse of a century, frequently passed over its foundations, as well as over every grave that "slept in the shadow of its grace," not sparing even that of the clergyman who officiated here—a fragment of whose tombstone now forms part of an adjoining fence; and on it the name of Clarke, his office, and the dates 1737, and 1744, are still legible. The burial-place of the Weirs of Kirkhall is the sole exception to this indiscriminate desecration, though their monument is not coeval with the existence of the church. It is a small enclosure formed by a thorn hedge, and a stone wall, and sheltered by an encompassing row of ash and beach trees, from amidst the autumnal tinted foliage of which, when we visited the spot, the red-breast was trilling his notes in mournful accordance with the season and the scene. The monument is composed of two Tuscan columns surmounted by a pediment, and the inscription, which is cut in a sunk panel of black marble, between the pillars, is as follows:—

"This buriall place was erected by Hugh Weir of Kirkhall.—Dorothia Hunter, his wife, died Sept. 26th, 1787, aged 67 years. Hugh Weir died Janr. 9th, aged 72 years. Helen Ferry, wife of Robert Weir, died April 20th, 1814, aged 56 years. Robert Weir, died 31st July, 1838, in the 81st year of his age."

A headstone, to the right of the monument, informs us in similar brevity of phrase, that "Robert Boyd is interd. here. He died August

* The Parish Churches and Burying-Grounds of Ayrshire. Privately printed. Glasgow, 1848.

9th, 1823, in the 73 year of his age, and 62 of his faithful service."—The trees surrounding this place of sepulture are the only index now by which the stranger can direct his steps to this silent and sequestered spot—silent, indeed, these many years, to the voice of prayer, and the hymn of praise.

The parish church now stands in the town of Saltcoats. It was built in 1773,—the edifice erected in 1744 having likewise been so much damaged by a tempest, as to render the erection of a new building, in another, and then and still much more populous quarter, necessary. It is a very homely structure, of an oblong form, with a deep roof, and irregularly shaped window, and is still further deformed by coarse gallery stairs attached to the north side-wall, and the two gables. The south or principal elevation is broken by a slight projection in the centre, which is covered with a pediment, surmounted by a small belfry. Beneath the pediment is an obliterated sun-dial, and below it again is a stone bearing the following inscription, which, from its wasted condition, is sufficiently illegible:—"Post varios casus dum in aliis locis situm hoc Templum tum demum hic Extructum anno MDCCCLIV.

"Interjecto deinde tempore cum nimborum procellarumque sævitia in ruinas fere conuasatum funditus denuo, renovatum erat anno MDCCCLXIII.

"Et post XII annos laqueari novo exornatum, vid: anno MDCCCLXXV.—R. C."

Of the interior of the church nothing more need be said than that it is in perfect keeping with the exterior. But though thus summarily characterised, it might be deemed inexcusable to pass over unnoticed its only ornamental accessory—the model of the Caledonian frigate, suspended from the centre of the ceiling—albeit we are not qualified to give an opinion of its merits. It was "the workmanship and gift, in 1800," (as a brass plate, affixed to one of the window sides, acquaints us, "of Mr William Dunlop, late Gunner's Mate, on board his Majesty's Ship, St Joseph." In addition to this gift of a mimic warship to the kirk, it may be mentioned that the following more appropriate benefactions to the poor, are likewise recorded on the wall behind the pulpit:—

"Mr Ralph Rodger, Minister of the Gospel in Ardrossan, before the Restauration, and afterwards at Kilwinning and Glasgow, left to the poor of this parish 100 lb. Scots.

"Andrew Chalmers, Carter in Saltcoats, left his effects to the poor of this parish, amounting to Six Guineas. He died July 29th, 1763.

"Patrick M'Kindly, Shipmaster in Saltcoats, left to the poor of this parish, £5 sterling. He died February 16th, 1787, aged 69 years.

"Given by Nathl. Norflit, 5 Guineas, in memory of his Aunt, Mrs Galt of Dykes, who died 28th December, 1796."

In the densely tenanted grave-yard encompassing the church, none of the monuments, save that bearing number 4 of the following inscriptions, merit any notice, either on account of their architecture, or the delicacy of their execution; all the others being common to every country churchyard, and evidently designed by the same hands that chiselled them. The one referred to is placed against the south wall of the church, and though of the headstone class of memorials, is of white marble, and pleasingly proportioned. The other, to the memory of the Rev. John Hendry, is inserted in the north wall of the burying-ground. It is composed of a pedimented tablet and urn, surmounted by a slightly projected obelisk of dark, the other parts being of white, marble. Both of these monuments would, however, have much better answered the purpose for which they were erected—the commemoration of departed worth for ages yet to come—had their material been of judiciously selected free-stone; for though no substance can be better adapted for monuments in a genial climate than marble, yet, in this country, its delicate texture and beautiful lustre cannot long resist, uninjured, exposure to the corrosive sea-breeze, and an atmosphere surcharged with moisture, fully more than one-half of the year. The monument referred to, had it been possible, ought to have had a place within the walls of the church.

The subjoined selection comprises every epitaph, in this place of sepulture, calculated, in our humble opinion, to excite any interest by the portraiture of character, or by the tenor of its composition, to awaken sentiment, or induce reflection, [We give a few:—]

4. Erected by Thomas Boyd, Shipmaster in Greenock, to the memory of Mary Dow, his spouse, who died 21st May, 1807, aged 42.

Who liv'd a virtuous and a pious life,
And died a much regretted wife;
And of this pleasant precious vine,
Was left regretting branches nine.

6. Erected by William Miller, Merchant in Saltcoats, in memory of his eldest son, Hugh Miller, Shipmaster, who lost his life, with three others, on the night of 2d August, 1817, while going in his boat from Irvine harbour to his vessel, then lying at anchor in that bay, aged 23 years. Also, his daughter, Margaret Crauford Miller, who died 15th May, 1818, aged 18 years.

Still—still we mourn with each returning day,
Them snatched by Fate in early youth away.

7. In remembrance of Captain James Jack, of the Ship Nimrod, son of Captain Robert Jack, a youth of great talent and promise, who was ship-wrecked on Beachyhead, on his voyage from Honduras to London, the tempestuous night of the 17th Feby., 1813, when he and 11 of his crew perished, in the 20th year of his age. Robert Jack, his Brother, died at Charleston, South Carolina, 22d December, aged 17 years.

9. Erected in memory of Thomas Murray, Tanner in Stirling, who lost his life on his passage home from Dublin, on board the Eliza and Margaret of Dumbarton, that was wrecked off Ardrossan, on the night of the 21 Aug. 1810.

My glass is run, and yours is running,
Remember Death, for Judgment's coming.

10. Erected in memory of Robert Hughan, Shipmaster in Saltcoats, aged 25 years, who lost his life on the 22d January, 1819, in a generous attempt to save the crew of the Ship Trelawney, wrecked on this coast; and of Margaret Robertson, his spouse, who died May 4th, 1819, aged 22 years.

11. Erected by Margaret Moat, in memory of her husband, Samuel Farrow, Shipmaster in Saltcoats, who lost his life on the 22d January 1819, in the 32d year of his age, in a generous attempt to save the crew of the Ship Trelawney, which was wrecked on this coast. Also their daughter, Margaret, spouse to John Barclay, who died 22d November, 1836, aged 23 years and 6 months.

12. Memento Mori. Erected by David Hendry, Engineer, Ardrossan, in memory of his children, William, who departed this life 14th Decemr, 1813, aged 3 years and 1 month, and Jane, who died 10th January, 1814, aged 5 years.

Happy children, early blest :

Rest in peaceful slumbers, rest :

Early rescued from the cares,

Which increase with growing years,

Though your youth and beauty fair,

Cruel death refused to spare.

Your souls are winged to worlds on high,

And dwell with saints above the sky.

13. Here lye the corps of Jean McCun, spouse to Robert Brown, Merchant in Saltoats, who died April 30th, 1761, aged 32 years. The above Robert Brown died May 1768, aged 68 years. Here lye also David and Martha, two of their children: also Thomas Brown his grandson, who died January 13th, 1815, aged 26 years, and also Robert Brown, son of the above Robert Brown, died November 13th, 1815, aged 64 years.

Weep not, our parents, brothers, or sisters dear,

For we are not dead, but do sleep here,

Our debt is paid, our graves you see,

Therefore prepare to follow us.

"THE GREAT CAVE."

In those days which we facetiously call "the good old times," the Cummings were the lords of the richer portions of Badenoch. On Speyside, and within a short mile of Kingussie, stands the ruin of Ruthven Castle, the strength of the bold "Wolf of Badenoch," whose predecessors were little less daring and unscrupulous. The followers of such leaders would not, we may safely believe, be unwilling to follow at an humble distance the manners of their masters; and long after the power had passed from the chiefs of the race, their principles were held and acted upon by the descendants of their turbulent men of war. In the times of the later Jameses, a noted freebooter of the name of Cumming, with his eleven sons, was the scourge of Strathspey and the more distant glens of Perthshire, and long baffled the feeble efforts of the law. An artificial cave, the retreat of the band, is still entire, and is known locally as "Uamh Mor," the great cave or den. It is cut in the face of a green hill, about a mile and a-half west from Kingussie, and within two or three hundred yards of the Highland Road, (the road from Perth to Inverness.) The river Spey flows betwixt its long lines of embankment, about half a mile below; and the land rises up gradually until it terminates in the Monadhliath range. The cave is crescent-shaped, and about 100 feet from end to end; and, as the soil is so soft, it must have been formed with great difficulty. At the centre, the width is about six feet, the height about seven; but towards the ends, both height and breadth contract. At the mouth, the space will only admit of a crawling eel-like, one man at a time. From this narrow entrance, the passage is guarded by a strong door; and the walls show that the bar is made of a tree of at least three feet in circumference. At the eastern end, the cave widens to about eight or nine feet, and the roof is of a great height, so that a somewhat spacious chamber is formed. The walls of the cave are of large stones, rudely built together; the roof consists of a series of large flagstones stretching from wall to wall; and the floor is of earth or clay. To the centre of the cave there is a second entrance, by a flight of steps, that seems to have been concealed by a trap-door. Cumming and his eleven sons were all, according to tradition, tall and powerful men; and the cave was formed by them in the night time; the earth, as it was thrown out, being carefully carried down the hill and cast into a deep dark pool of the Spey. The stones for the walls and the roof were brought from a higher part of the hill; and such was the strength of the sons, it is said, that only two of them were required to carry one of the great flagstones down the hill. As a farther precaution against discovery, a booth was built over the trap-door, the other passage opening up betwixt the peat-stacks behind the house. The booth was kept by a repulsive old woman and one or two other lone females; and so effectually did her appearance and their manners estrange them from the cottars of the Strath, that few neighbours or strangers ever "darkened their door." Planning their deeds within this den, and leaving and returning under the favour of night, this ruthless family continued for years to commit crimes of the most heinous nature undetected by the authorities; and so well were their movements conducted, that not even the neighbourhood were in the secret of the cave. At length the Cummings did a deed which roused the blood of a Macpherson, in the hill-country of Badenoch, who left his home early one autumn morning, determined to find out the hiding-place of the murderers. That night, while a cold wind and colder rain scoured across the unshorn fields, a beggar presented himself at the door of the old woman's booth. A stranger was seldom warmly welcomed—a beggar was not likely to be well-received; but the beggar seemed to be so dreadfully afflicted with some internal disease, that the human Cerberus was mollified, and gave the petitioner admittance. All night long, the Macpherson (for he was the beggar) lay by the fire-side, writhing and groaning as if in great pain, while he watched the movements of the inmates, who were busily baking what seemed to the beggar an enormous quantity of cakes for two or three females. As the reeking bannocks were taken from the fire, he observed that they were put into the bottom of a standing "press"; but they were always put far down, as if the press was empty, while the heap of cakes never seemed to increase. Suspicion of the truth flashed upon the Macpherson, and shouldering his wallet, he left the hut at an early hour, as if to proceed on his begging journey, but at once directed his steps to Perth. There he gave information to the authorities; a party was sent out under Macpherson's guidance; the cave was surrounded, and the murderers summoned. Such was the odium of their names, that the form of a trial was dispensed with, and as they issued one by one from the den, they were put to death on the spot. This is the story told by tradition, and I give it without attempting to prove its truth. I have, however, visited the cave; and the story was told to me as I sat within the dark, grave-like, chamber. I may add that, to this day, according to the belief of the district, the descendants of the Macpherson who betrayed the Cummings are troubled with the disease, the pains of which were feigned by their predecessor. The cave is on the estate anciently called Raitts. It was purchased from the Macintoshes of Borlum, in 1790, by James Macpherson, the translator of Ossian, who showed his reverence of antiquity by changing the name from Raitts to Belleville! The estate is now possessed by Miss Macpherson, the daughter of the translator.

THE DEVIL'S STANE. (1)

O meek was the soul o' the monk that pray'd
At Logy-Durno's (2) shrine;
And Brako's priest was fired with zeal
When he touch'd on theme divine;

And there was a stream o' fervour deep,
And a fund o' Godly fear,
For ever pourand frae the lips
O' the friar o' Fetterneir;

And they were haly men and guid,
The chanons o' Monymusk, (3)
For they pray'd the souls o' the quick and the dead
Frae dawning day till dusk;

But Logy-Durno, Monymusk,
Or Brako, or Fetterneir,
Could ne'er, for kindness o' heart,
Wi' the priest o' Kemnay peer.

For Brako might pray for Schir Andro's soul,
Whase red blood did atone
For harrying Inneravin's lands,
And stealing "the maid o' Stradone;"

And the guid Culdees o' Monymusk
Might plead for King Malcolm's repose,
Wha vow'd to Sanct Andro their haly house
For victory o'er his foes;

But O! for lifting the downcast heart,
For helping the lowly poor,
For pouring ane balm on the troubled soul,
And soothing life's parting hour,

On a' the bonnie banks o' Don,
There wasnae ane haly man
Like him wha knelt in Kemnay kirk,
At the shrine o' our Ladie Anne. (4)

The fiend wha dwalls in the bottomless pit
Mang byrnan'd flame sud stour,
And roams the yearth like ane roarand Hon,
For wham he may devour,

Aft cast his e'e on Kemnay's priest
Wi' ane fierce and irefu' look,—
For beand the fae o' human-kind,
Its friends he canna bruik.—

And aft when he stoppit his vengefu' sight
On the tap o' Benohie, (5)
He vow'd and swore that the haly priest
A bitter death sud die!

For, far, far back in the auldien time
'Tis said that Benohie
Was ane o' the ports o' the byrnan'd pit
Whaur the wicked torment dree;

That it flared wi' fire i' the midnight sky,
And spew'd out smoke at noon,
Till its very stonien foundments
Frae its tap ran mytand doon.

And the fiend aft sat on his auld door stane
Plotting an evil deed;

And aye the tither curse was hurt'd
At the priest o' Kemnay's head!

It was the feast o' Sanct Barnabas,
I' the merry month o' June,
When the woods are a' in their green livery,
And the wild birds a' in tune;

And the priest o' Kemnay has gane to the kirk
And pray'd an earnest prayer,
"That Sathan might for ever be bound
To his dark and byrnan'd lair!"

And aye the haly organ rung,
And the sounds rose higher, higher,
Till they reach'd the fiend on Benohie,
And he bit his nails for ire.

And he lookit east, and he lookit wast,
And he lookit aboon—beneath,
But nocht could he see save the bald grey rocks
That glower'd out through the heath.

He lifted aloft a ponderous rock,
And hurl'd it through the air,—
"Twere pity ye sud want reward
For sae devout a prayer!"

The miller o' Kemnay cries to his knave,
"Lift up the hack sluice, loon!
For a cloud comes o'er frae Benohie,
Enough the mill to droon."

The boatman hurries his boat ashore,
And fears he'd be ower late;—
"Giff yon black cloud comes down in rain,
Its fit to raise a spate!"

But the ponderous rock came on, and on,
Well aim'd for Kemnay kirk,
And cross'd it field or cross'd it flood,
Its shadow gar'd a' grow mirk.

But the fervent prayers o' the haly priest,
And the power o' the sweet Sanct Anne,
They turn'd the murderous rock aside,
And foil'd the foul fiend's plan;

And it lichted down frae the darken'd lift
Like the greedy erne bird,
And there it sits in the kirk lands yet,
Half buried in the yird.

(1) This is a large rock which stands in the middle of a cultivated field near the parish church of Kemnay, Aberdeenshire, and which, tradition affirms, the Devil threw at the church from the neighbouring mountain of Bennachie, in order to revenge the good deeds of the parish priest. The parish of Kemnay is now chiefly famed for its excellent academy and parish school. In comparing this building with any other of the same class in Scotland, there is no exaggeration in using the words of Shakespeare,—"Hyperion to a satyr,"—and we only do Mr Stevenson, the teacher, justice when we add, that the internal arrangements and discipline are in just keeping with the external embellishments.

(2) The parish of Chapel of Garioch, Aberdeenshire, was anciently called Logy-Durno, and in it there were chapels at Braco and Fetterneir, the former of which was founded by the widow of Sir Andrew Leslie of Balquhain, who, having had a long feud with the Forbeses, "went to Stradone and spuil'd these lands, and brought away with him a heirship, and also a daughter of the baron of Crag of Eniravine, Cheif of the Clan Allan. She was called the Fair Maid of Stradone." Being outlawed for this act, he fortified himself on Bennachie, but was at last killed at Braco by the Sheriff of Angus.

(3) The Priory of Monymusk lay on the banks of the Don, in the parish of that name. It was founded by King Malcolm III. "In the mense time happinit King Malcolm to cum to Monymusk, and gat advertising, that at the north partis of Scotland and the Iles were confederat with thir Murrays aganis him. The king, affrayit be thir tithingis, demandit his thesaurar, gif any landis wer in thay boundis pertendand to the crown. And fra he wes advertint that the barony of Monymusk pertentit thairto, he rowit it to Sanct Andro, to send him victory."

—Beldenden's Croniklia. The priory consisted at first of Caldeas.

CHIEFSHIPS—THE CLANCHATTAN.

THE Clanchattan are traditionally said to be the descendants of a German clan, or tribe, called the Catti. This clan maintained a feud for ages with a neighbouring tribe, by whom they were ultimately overpowered, when, in the true, old Celtic spirit, they preferred exiling themselves to a degrading submission to the invader. They are mentioned by Cæsar and Tacitus; and the name Caithness, or Cattiness—the promontory of the Catti—is supposed to have been given by them to the first district in which they settled in the Highlands of Albyn.

The ultimate conquest of Caithness by the Danes, after the Catti and the other clans of the district had been nearly annihilated, by their periodical ravages for ages, induced them again to leave their country, rather than submit to the invader; and the tradition is that the remnants of these warlike clans resolved themselves into a confederation—on the same principle on which provisional battalions are now formed—under the name of Cattanich, and, in their military expeditions, obeyed one chief, while, in their civil capacity each retained its patriarchal government by its individual chief and chieftains.

The remarks, by "A Member of the Clan Chattan," in No. 6, have excited some interest. The writer quotes a number of charters and other documents in support of Macintosh's claim to the chiefship; but we must not forget that the chiefships could neither be conferred nor taken away by paper or parchment; and that, from the interference of the kings of Scotland, for the purpose of putting down chiefs and chieftains, and substituting lords and barons in their place, there can scarcely be a greater presumptive proof of the dubiety of any individual's claim to a chiefship, than to find him resting it on documents of any other description than such as may be necessary to prove his descent. All have heard of the memorable question put by the Laird of Grant to the courtier who offered to procure him a title—"Who, then, will be the Laird of Grant?" Grant, in the true spirit of the old Highland chief, valued his hereditary rank, which could neither be conferred nor taken away, far above any parchment title.

Among Highland clans, in general, there can be no rational grounds for dispute as to chiefships—for there can be only one chief of any clan, and his title is so distinct as to leave no room for doubt. For instance, the chief of the Campbells is distinguished by the title of Mac-Gillein, while the other gentlemen, or heads of houses, are Macmhi only—that is, the chief is Mac, or son of the Ceann Cinni, the head of the clan; while the others are only Macmhi (the mhi is pronounced v), son of the son of the head of the clan. Thus, Mac Dhonuill, or Macdonald, is the title of the chief of the Macdonalds; while Macmhic Aillein, Macmhic Alastair, Macmhic Raonuill, Macmhic Jain, &c., are the titles of some of the chieftains, or heads of houses, composing the clan. This rule holds good in regard to every Highland clan descended from the chief whose name has been adopted as the patronymic of the chief of his race.

But, in the case of a regular confederation of separate and distinct clans, as in that of the Clanchattan, this rule applies only to each, distinctly from the others. The Clanchattan include the Macintoshes, Macphersons, Macgillivrays, Maquens, Macphails, Macdhais, Shaws, Macbains, &c., each of whom had their separate chiefs and chieftains, by whom they were governed perfectly independent of one another. Macintosh was only their leader in the day of battle. He had no civil jurisdiction over the other clans composing the confederation. Hence the well-known adage, in reference to the peculiar jurisdiction of Macintosh, who was hereditarily a feudal, not a patriarchal leader, and had the power of pit and gallows, "Tha ne h uile la bhidhs mod aig Macintoisich," i. e. "It is not every day Macintosh holds a moat or court." This expression implies that there was something extreme in the procedure at Macintosh's courts; but that it was of rare occurrence—or, in other words, that the barbarities of the feudal system, though not unknown at the moat of Macintosh, were not of frequent infliction there.

Macintosh is therefore not entitled to be considered as the chief of the Clanchattan, notwithstanding all the charters, edicts and bands quoted by "A Member of the Clan Chattan." The power of the patriarchal chief was limited, and could not be exercised to the prejudice or disgrace of the clan, without their own consent. Hence there are extremely few instances known of the decapitation or supercedure of a chief, excepting for personal crimes, or pusillanimity; and even in the few instances in which a chief is known to have been deposed, the tanister succeeded; and the lineal descendant always succeeded the tanister in the next succession of a chief. Bands and charters are consequently no evidence in the disputed case between Macintosh and Macpherson. Unless it be proved that Macpherson is descended from Macintosh, it is difficult to conceive that he is other than the chief of his own race, or branch of the united Clanchattan: and this, we believe, has not hitherto been even attempted.

From the manuscript of a gentleman, who took great interest in the question at issue, and who had access to the family papers of the competitors for the chiefship, we give the following statement:—

Gillecattan Mor was chief of the whole clans who had been admitted into the confederation called Clanchattan, in the reign of Malcolm II. He left two sons, Muirach Mor, the eldest, and Dai Dubh, the youngest. Muirach Mor left a son, whose name was also Gillecattan, and his lineal representative, Cluny, is the chief of the clan Mhuirach, or Macphersons, as well as of the original Catti of Caithness. Dai Dubh, brother of Muirach Mor, and second son of Gille-cattan Mor, also left issue, and who are represented by Davidson of Invernahaven. The descendants of Dai Dubh are called Clandhai, or Davidson. They are the clan Kay of Sir Walter Scott, and Inch of Perth celebrity. The descendants of Muirach Mor are also called Clannhuirich, or Macphersons. Thus these two branches of the great confederation called Clanchattan, are still and always have been distinguished by the patronymic of their respective forefathers, Muirach Mor and Dai Dubh, sons of Gillochattan Mor, supreme chief of the Clanchattan in the reign of Malcolm II.

Muirach had two sons, Kenneth, the eldest, and Gillecattan, the youngest, above mentioned. Kenneth died without issue, and was succeeded by his brother, who, having previously entered into holy orders, was called the Parson. Hence the clan Mhuirich are called Clanpherson, or the clan of the parson, in English; but have always gone by the name of Clannhuirich in Gaelic. It may be remarked that the Scottish clergy, the followers of the Culdees and Columbus, or Calum Cille, were not then subjected to the See of Rome; and that the papal bull, enforcing the celibacy of the clergy, was not recognised by them at that time, nor, generally, for many ages subsequently.

The Parson, as he continued to be called, left two sons, Gilpatrick and Ewen Bain. Gilpatrick was the father of Donul Dall, the supreme chief of the Clanchattan, whose only child and heiress, Eva, married to Angus Duff, descended from a second son of Duff, Earl of Fife. As this was the first Macintosh, it may not be inappropriate to give a sketch of his history.

It is believed by many that the succession, or conquest, of Kenneth, the King of the Scots, had by no means been so complete as it is represented by some of our historians. On the contrary, that it had not been perfected until the reign of Malcolm Caumore. Hence Macbeath, who is generally held to have been a murderer, a usurper and a tyrant, is considered by some to have been a patriot-hero; and to have slain Duncan in a battle fought by the still unsubdued remnant of the Picts, in defence of their sacred liberties and independence. But, be this as it may, an army had been despatched by Malcolm against the Picts, or Moravienses, (as they are called,) by which, traditionally, at least, they are said to have been exterminated. In this army, Shaw, second son of Duncan, fifth Earl of Fife, commanded a party of the clan; and, having received an extensive grant of the lands of the exterminated or expatriated Picts, settled in the north, with his party, as a feudal lord, or vassal of Malcolm Canmore, having the government of the whole district confided to him.

This Shaw had a son, also called Shaw Duff, who succeeded his father in the government of the district, and defended the Castle of Inverness bravely against the Lord of the Isles. This Shaw Duff left three sons, Farquhar, William, and Edward. Farquhar left no issue, and was succeeded by his nephew, Shaw, the son of William. Shaw married Mora, or rather Morag, the daughter of Angus Ag, Lord of the Isles. He was succeeded by his son, Angus; who married Eva, sole child and heiress of Donul Dall, supreme chief of the Clanchattan. Shaw, in virtue of this marriage—and perhaps of his hereditary power and connection, as nephew of the Lord of the Isles—assumed the chiefship of the Clanchattan, under the stile and title of Macintoshich, or son of the first man, or leader, of the confederation, Donul Dall, to the prejudice of Ewen Bain, ancestor of the Clannhuirich, or Macphersons, who seem to have acquiesced in, or submitted to, the usurpation, during the existence of the confederation; but as chiefships were purely hereditary, and could neither be bestowed nor taken away by charters, titles, nor bands, the representative of Donul Dall has never forfeited his title to the supreme chiefship of the Clanchattan.

This Angus, the first Macintosh, received a charter from his uncle, the Lord of the Isles, who was a feudal chief, of the lands of Lochaber, Glenluy, Strathlochie, and Lochiel, which originated the feuds between the Macintoshes and the Camerons and Macdonalds, who inherited the country from time immemorial, and refused to recognise "this sheepskin grant" for many ages afterwards.

"A Member of the Clan Chattan," quoted in the Journal, No. 6, states that "the thirty men of the Clanchattan, who fought the same number of the clan Kay [Dhai] on the Inch of Perth (1396) were commanded by Shaw Macintosh, cousin-german of Lachlan, 8th Laird, he having only had one son, Ferquhard, who, from physical causes, was unable to engage in the combat."

This statement is in direct contradiction of tradition, as regards the battle, or tournament, on the Inch of Perth; which arose, not in any dispute between the Macintoshes and the Davidsons, but in a dispute between the Clannhuirich, or Macphersons, and the clan Dhai, or Davidsons, both of whom are descended paternally from Muirach Dai, sons of Gillecattan Mor. The Camerons, irritated by the perseverance of the Macintoshes, in claiming and trying to enforce the exaction of rent for lands which they considered their own, proceeded to the country of that clan, in retaliation of an incursion made by them into the district of Lochaber, on a pointing expedition, in which they were partially successful. The Camerons collected the foray, and were driving it homewards, by Invernahaven, when the Macintoshes, Macphersons, and Davidsons made their appearance, in greatly superior numbers to the Camerons. At this critical moment a dispute arose between the leader of the Davidsons and the leader of the Macphersons, as to which should command the right wing—the point of honour in clan battles, to renounce which, by the party entitled to precedence, was regarded as the very acme of pusillanimity and degradation. The enemy being at hand, Macintosh, who wanted to keep down Cluny, whose superior title to command he well knew, and whose clan was equal to both the Macintoshes and the Davidsons, rashly decided that Invernahaven should command the right wing, that he himself should lead the centre, and Cluny the left—thus putting Cluny in the subordinate position. Cluny indignantly refused, and retired from the field; but remained with his clan, as a spectator, in the vicinity.

The conflict between the clans was very obstinate and bloody; and the Davidsons and Macintoshes were nearly annihilated, before Cluny, relenting, rushed to the rescue, saved a remnant of his friends, and defeated the Camerons with immense slaughter. The Camerons were commanded by Charles McGillany, who was killed on a hill, which still bears his name, in Banchairri, about five miles from the field of battle.

Such was the origin of the feud between the Clannhuirich and clan Dhai, which led to the celebrated clan tournament on the Inch of Perth; where the right certainly prevailed—for there appears little doubt, according to our manuscript, that Cluny is the representative of Gillechattan Mac, chief of the Clanchattan in the days of Malcolm II.

CLANN SHINCLAIR—THE SINCLAIRS.

It has been maintained that the Sinclairs are not, strictly speaking, a Gaelic clan, the surname being originally from France. William, son of the Comte de Saint Clair, a relative of the Conqueror, who came over with him in 1066, settled in Scotland soon afterwards, and was progenitor of all of the name in the country. The ancient Earls of Caithness were, however, an original race, the first recorded of whom is Dungald, who flourished in 875, and Sir William Sinclair of Roslin, which was the first possession of those of the name in Scotland, having married a daughter of the Earl of Strathern and Caithness; by this early connexion with a Highland district, and holding so high a feudal position, they have fully acquired all that confers on them the rights of chieftainship.

The chief went with his clan to Flodden, in which battle he fell, with a great number of his followers, anno 1513; and so strong an impression did this event make upon them, that, to this day, no Sinclair will, without the greatest reluctance, dress in green, or cross the Ord Hill on a Monday, for in such an array, and by that road, they marched on this disastrous expedition, when so many were slain, that scarcely a family of note had left a representative of their name.

George, sixth Earl, had no children, and finding himself very deeply in debt, he executed a disposition to Sir John Campbell of Glenurchai, chief creditor, of all his property, titles, and feudal jurisdictions, anno 1672. Glenurchai thereupon took the title, and on the death of the Earl of Caithness, 1676, obtained a grant of all the possessions. But George Sinclair of Keis, heir male, was not disposed to submit to this alienation of the honours of his family, but took possession of various houses and lands. Earl John was consequently obliged to apply for military assistance, and, raising his own clan, he marched afterwards, when he encountered the Sinclairs, and obtained a decided victory; on which occasion his piper composed his piobaireachd called

"Bodach an Briogas," in derision of Sinclair, who wore trews, which has ever since been the croinneachadh, or gathering, of his clan. Having thus regained the property, he placed garrisons in the castle to secure it; but Keis, frustrated in his attempts by force of arms, prosecuted his suit in Parliament, and it was found that his claims were just, on which Sir John Campbell relinquished the object he had so keenly pursued, and was created Earl of Breadalbane, &c.

The military achievements of the Sinclairs, from the power of their chiefs, were considerable. Their feuds with the clan Gunn have been noticed in the sketch of that tribe; their misunderstandings with the Earls of Sutherland were more serious. George Gordon, of Marle, having been attacked and slain, the Earl sent 200 men into Caithness, in 1588, who ravaged the parishes of Lathron and Dunbeath, and were followed by Sutherland himself, who overran the country and besieged the Earl in Castle Sinclair, who made a long but successful defence; and to revenge this inroad, which is commemorated as Là na creach mòr, "the day of the great foray," he assembled all his clan and followers, and marched into Sutherland, severely retaliating on the inhabitants: finally, a battle took place, in which they were victorious, and returned with abundant spoil. "In exchange hereof, Alexander, Earl of Sutherland, sent 300 men into Catteyness, the same year of God, 1589, who spoiled and wasted the same, killed above thirty men, and returned with a great booty." The Sinclairs, nothing daunted, made an inroad with their whole force, and returned, "driving a prey of goods before the host;" but the inhabitants, having collected to the number of about 500, attacked the invaders at Clyne, who maintained a desperate fight until nightfall. When they reached Caithness they found Houston Mac Aodh spreading farther desolation through the unhappy country, who retreated so speedily as to elude the pursuit of the Sinclairs. These mutual "harrieships" are said to have been congenial to Highland feelings! We can only say, in the words of an old seanachai, that, if so, "there was good mischief in those days!" The Sinclairs were in arms in 1745, and ready to join Prince Charles with 500 men; but the disaster at Culloden induced them to disband as the most prudent step.

President Forbes says that, in 1745, Mòr 'ear Gal' ao', as the Earl of Caithness is called in Gaelic, could raise 1,000 men; but in the late war with France double that number were enrolled.

The Armorial Bearings of the Earl are.—Quarterly: first az. a ship at anchor, oars in saltire, within a double tressure flory counter-flory, or, for the title of Orkney; second and third, or, a lion rampant gules; fourth, az. a ship under sail, or for that of Caithness, the whole surmounted by a cross engrailed dividing the quarters, sab., for Sinclair. Crest, a cock proper. Supporters, two griffins proper, beaked and membered or. Motto, "Commit thy work to God."

The Suaichentas, or Badge, is a branch of conis, whins, or gorse, ulex Europæus.

Among the numerous cadets of this noble fa-only must be noticed the Sinclairs of Ulbster, related to the illustrious house of Sutherland. In 1603, George, Earl of Caithness, made a disposition to his much beloved cousin, Patrick Sinclair, of the lands of Ulbster, and his brother John succeeded, from whom the present Sir George Sinclair, Bart., is ninth in descent. His venerable father, the late Right Hon. Sir John, a distinguished senator and statesman, has been pronounced one of the greatest benefactors to society; and he did more, by individual exertion, to improve the county of Caithness, than all the former proprietors together. With the true spirit of a Highland chief, in 1794, he raised a fencible regiment, and he was the first who extended the services of these troops beyond Scotland. He shortly afterwards raised another, and each was 1,000 strong, a proof of his enjoying a degree of respect and influence which very few men of much higher rank and more extensive possessions could boast of! The uniform of these fine battalions was a military Highland bonnet, with trows and scarf plaid of a handsome dark tartan. Sir John was induced to adopt this mode of dress, from having been misled by a silly paragraph which appeared in the "Scots Magazine," referring the origin of the kilt to a very recent period, an opinion which he subsequently repudiated. His superintendence of the publication of the originals of the poems of Ossian, is a labour for which "the clans" are under a peculiar obligation, as it removed the doubts of many on that much contested subject.

The figure chosen to illustrate the Sinclairs is a Highland girl, and that she is unmarried we see indicated by her hair being bound with the stem, or snood. She is also bare-footed—the want of covering being no mark of low circumstances, but agreeable to a practice still very common. Her gown is of a blue, home-made manufacture—a mixture of linen and wool, which forms a very economical and pretty material. A plain scarf, of about three yards in length, is worn over the head, falling down gracefully before. This was usually fastened by a brooch of silver, brass, or copper, on the breast, and ladies were wont to indicate their political principles by the manner in which it was worn.—From Logan's Clans.

LIST OF ARMS IN THE CASTLE OF KILCHURN, IN 1689.

THE original MS., of which the following is a copy, was found among the miscellaneous papers of a deceased legal practitioner in Renfrewshire. The present owner of them cannot tell how it came into his possession. The list is highly curious:—

The date of this list is little more than a month subsequent to the battle of Killiecrankie, which

* It may have been in the service of the Viscount of Dundee.

† My Lord, perhaps, was the Earl of Breadalbane.

ander McNaughtan, of that Ilk. "Malcolm" married was fought on the 27th July, 1689. The signature is in Breadalbane's own handwriting. He was John, first Earl of Breadalbane, son and heir of Sir John Campbell of Breadalbane. He took part with the Government, though he sent 500 men to join the standard of the Pretender, in 1715; and the memorandum of arms left in the Castle of Kilchurn was probably on his placing it in the hands of Government, to be garrisoned by the royal troops. It was so garrisoned as late as 1745. He had the sobriquet of John Glas in Gaelic, being of a grey or light complexion. In the eventful times in which he lived, he acquired distinction by his sagacity. Being a principal creditor of George Sinclair, sixth Earl of Caithness,* whose debts are said to have exceeded a million of marks, he obtained, by charter under the Great Seal, 1673, a reversion of that nobleman's estate and title, on undertaking the burthen of his debts; and on his death, 1676, without issue, thus became seventh Earl of Caithness. The title, however, he did not long enjoy, the Privy Council having soon found, on the authority of a reference from Parliament, that George Sinclair of Keis, heir-male to the last Earl, had a right to it; and he accordingly took his seat in Parliament as Earl of Caithness, 15th July, 1681. Sir John Campbell, thus dispossessed, obtained, four weeks afterwards, the creation, by patent, 13th August, 1681, of Earl of Breadalbane and Holland, Viscount Tay and Paintland, Baron of Glenorchy, Ormelie and Wick, with the precedence of the former patent, 1677, and remainder to either of his sons by his deceased wife, Lady Mary Rich, that, by writing under his hand, he at any time of his life might think proper to nominate, and the issue-male of such son so nominated; failing which, to his own issue male; failing which, to his nearest legitimate heirs-male; failing which, to his nearest heirs whatsoever.

The Earl, who concurred in the Revolution of 1688, undertook, by his influence with the clans, viz. £12,000 to reduce the Highlands, which King William, with great expense, had endeavoured to effect in vain. The Earl of Nottingham wrote afterwards, calling upon him to account for the money. "My Lord," replied Breadalbane, "the Highlands are quiet, the money is spent, and that is the best way of accounting among friends." He was deeply implicated in the massacre of Glencoe, and imprisoned in consequence, but discharged without trial. He was a suspected person in 1715, having sent 500 of his clan to join the standard of Mar, and was required to surrender, but no further notice was taken of his conduct. "It is odd," says Mackay, "he lives long enough, but he is a Duke; he is of a fair complexion, has the gravity of a Spaniard, as cunning as a fox, wise as a serpent, and slippery as an eel." He died at the age of 64.

Kilchurn Castle we have a concise but comprehensive account in Fullarton's excellent Gazetteer of Scotland.

Kilchurn Castle, a noble relic of feudal ages,

* See Account of "Clann Sinclair," p. 151.

near the head of Loch Awe, under the impending gloom of the majestic Bencruachan, which rises in rocky masses abruptly from the opposite shore of the lake. Amid the grandeur and variety which that fine lake derives from its great expanse, and the lofty mountains with which it is surrounded, it cannot be denied that Kilchurn Castle forms its leading and most picturesque object,—

'Is paramount, and rules
Over the pomp and beauty of a scene
Where mountains, torrents, lakes, and woods unite
To pay it homage.'

There is no other ancient castle in the Western Highlands that can compete with it in point of magnitude; and none, even throughout Scotland at large, can be compared with it for the picturesque arrangement of its buildings, the beauty and fine effect of its varied and broken outline, or its happy appropriateness to its situation. It stands upon a projecting rocky elevation at the head of the lake, where the water of Orchy flows into it, and which is occasionally converted into an island when the river and loch are flooded by rains. Although now connected with the shore by an extended plain, obviously of alluvial origin, and consequently forming a peninsula, it seems certain that the rocky site of the Castle must have been at one time an island; and that the change has been produced partly by alluvial deposit, and partly by the lowering of the waters of the lake. Anciently it must have been a place of great strength; and its unusual size and extent attest the feudal splendour and magnificence which the knights of Glenorchy were accustomed to gather around them. But this fine relic of baronial dignity is now a ruin,—"wild yet stately,—not dismantled of turrets, nor the walls broken down, though obviously a ruin," and hastening to decay. The exterior walls are yet entire, but the mountain blasts sweep through its roofless halls, and the thistle waves its head in the now silent courtyard. Kilchurn, or, as it ought to be written, Coalchuirn Castle, is said to have been first erected by the lady of Sir Colin Campbell of Glenorchy, the ancestor of the Ducal family of Argyll. Sir Colin, who was a Knight-Templar, was absent on a crusade at the time, and for seven years the principal portion of the rents of his lands are said to have been expended in its erection by his lady. The great tower was five stories in height, the second story being entirely occupied by the baronial hall. That necessary appendage of a feudal castle, the dungeon, is on the ground-floor, and appears to have been sufficiently dark, damp, and wretched, to render utterly miserable the unfortunate beings who, from time to time, were forced to tenant it. The remaining portions of the Castle, which form a square, enclosing the court-yard, though of considerable antiquity, are certainly not so ancient as the tower, and doubtless have been added at some more recent period. The second Sir Colin of Glenorchy, surnamed Dubh, or Black, son of the Knight-Templar, was proprietor of seven different castles,—a sufficient evidence of the great wealth which must have been possessed, even at that early period, by the ancestors of the now powerful family of Breadalbane. So late as 1745 Kilchurn Castle was garrisoned by the king's troops, and at a much more recent period, it was fit to be inhabited. One of the factors or overseers of the Breadalbane estates, caused the roof to be taken off, merely to obtain an easy supply of wood, to the irreparable injury of the Castle, and the unavailing regret of the noble proprietor, who was then absent. The greatest care is now taken of its preservation; but open and exposed as it now is, time and the winter-storms will soon work its decay. There is a legend connected with this Castle, which has its counterpart in more than one legend of feudal times, as well as in the pages of Homer, and may be worth relating here. During the long absence of Sir Colin, the Knight-Templar, he is said to have visited Rome, where he had a very singular dream. He applied to a monk for his advice, who recommended his instant return home, as a very serious domestic calamity, which could only be averted by his presence, was portended by his dream. Sir Colin immediately took his departure for Scotland, and, after much difficulty and danger, reached a place called Succoth, the residence of an old woman who had been his nurse. In the disguise of a mendicant, he craved food and shelter for the night; and was admitted to the poor woman's fireside. From a scar on his arm she recognised him as the laird; and instantly informed him of what was about to happen at the Castle. It appeared that, for a long period, no information had been received with regard to Sir Colin, nor had any communication from him reached his lady. On the contrary, it had been industriously circulated that he had fallen in battle in the Holy Land. Sir Colin perceived treachery on the part of some one; for he had repeatedly despatched clansmen with intelligence to his lady, and surely all of them could not have perished before reaching Scotland. His suspicions were well founded. Baron MacCorquodale, a neighbouring laird, who had been the most busy in propagating the report of Sir Colin's death, had intercepted and murdered all the messengers. He had thus succeeded in convincing the lady of the death of her husband; and had finally won her affections, and the next day had been fixed for the marriage. Incensed at what he had just heard from the faithful nurse, Sir Colin set out early next morning for his castle of Kilchurn, where he was told his lady then resided; and as he followed the romantic windings of the Orchy, the sound of the bagpipe, and the acclamations of his clansmen who had assembled to join the approaching festivity, were wafted to his ears. He crossed the drawbridge, and entered the gates of the Castle—at this happy season open to all—undiscovered and unregarded. While he stood silently gazing on the scene of riot which now met his view, he was asked what he wanted. "To have my hunger satisfied, and my thirst quenched," said he. Food and liquor were plentifully put before him; he eat, but refused to drink, except from the hands of the lady herself. Informed of the strange request of the apparent mendicant, the lady, always charitable and benevolent, came at once and handed him a cup. Sir Colin drank to her health, and dropping a ring into the empty cup returned it to her. The lady, observant of the action, retired and examined the ring. It was her own gift to her husband when he departed on his distant expedition; it had been his talisman in the field, and had been kept sacred by him. "My husband! My husband!" she exclaimed, and rushing in, threw herself into his arms. A shout of joy from the clansmen rent the air; and the pipers made the court-yard resound with the pibroch of the Campbells. The Baron MacCorquodale was allowed to depart in safety; but, Sir John Dubh, the son and successor of the Templar, after his father's death, attacked the Baron, and overcoming him in battle, took possession of his Castle and his lands.

Wordsworth has addressed some fine lines to Kilchurn Castle, concluding thus:—

'Shade of departed power,
Skeleton of unfleshed humanity,
The chronicle were welcome that should call
Into the compass of distinct regard
The toils and struggles of thy infancy!
Yon foaming flood seems motionless as ice;
Its dizzy turbulence eludes the eye,
Frozen by distance; so, majestic pile,
To the perception of this Age appear
Thy fierce beginnings, softened and subdued,
And quieted in character—the strife,
The pride, the fury uncontrollable
Lost on the aerial heights of the Crusades!"

Kilchurn Castle is no doubt the Ardenvoehr of the novelist in the "Legend of Montrose."

THE STORY OF HAMLET.

[From the Swedish Saga.]

DURING the period when Rörek held the supreme sway in Denmark, the brothers Horwendal and Fengo ruled as subordinate princes in Jutland. Horwendal had already reigned three years, and distinguished himself by bold adventures and viking expeditions, when Köller, the Norwegian king, impelled by envy, and thirst for glory, challenged him to holmgang.* They landed on a fair island in the north sea. The beauty of its shores tempted them to penetrate into the woods, and, unaccompanied, the chieftains met in the centre of the forest. They resolved to prove their swords, and, in order that as far as possible individual valour should decide the cause, they commenced the fight. They first agreed that the victor should pay the highest honour to the vanquished, and give two gold marks to his kindred for each considerable wound inflicted on him. This being agreed to by both parties, the combat began. Horwendal, ardent for the fight, grasped his sword with both his hands, and, casting away his own shield, cleft asunder that of Köller, wounded him in the foot, and finally struck a mortal blow. He honoured the dead with a pompous interment, and caused a high mound to be raised over his body. After three years spent in viking expeditions, he presented to Rörek the best portion of the spoil, and espoused his daughter Gerutha, by whom he had a son who was named Hamlet. Fengo, envious of his brother's good fortune, caused him to be murdered, and immediately after married his widow. To give a better colouring to this bloody deed, he gave out that Gerutha, who had never experienced the slightest ill-usage from her husband, was on one occasion in such peril from his hatred and violence, that, to save her life, he slew his brother, as he considered it unfitting that a fair woman should be longer exposed to the daring violence of such a man. His tale was believed, and he married her without opposition; even Rörek was satisfied with the explanation.

* From holme (island), and gang (walk), meaning encounter on island; there, by strength of arms, to decide quarrels or mastery.

But Hamlet, who feared his uncle's jealous disposition, feigned himself mad, and prudently concealed his understanding in order to preserve his life. He sat all day by the hearth in his mother's house, amidst the dust and cinders. His body was smeared with dirt, his face disfigured with stains, and his whole exterior indicated the highest stage of insanity. Sometimes, as he sat by the hearth, and scraped amid the ashes with his hands, he would make wooden hooks, and harden them in the fire; and, at the other end of the same piece of wood, he would cut another hook, and carefully conceal it. When asked what he was doing, he replied that he was preparing for himself sharp arrows for his father's murderer. At this answer all the standers-by laughed, for such an undertaking could only seem ridiculous; although Hamlet subsequently found them extremely useful to him. But those who thought more deeply of the matter, inferred from his desire of vengeance, that he did not want intelligence. As no one now believed that he was really mad, it was thought advisable to try him in various ways. Amongst the youths who for this purpose were commissioned to lead him to a remote forest, there happened to be his foster-brother, who compassionated his fate, and resolved to warn him. But Hamlet himself perceived his danger. When, therefore, he was about to mount his horse, he seated himself backwards on it, using the animal's tail as a bridle, to the amusement of all. Shortly after they met a wolf in the forest, which his companions declared to be a young horse. Hamlet complained that amongst his uncle's herds he had never seen a similar foal. Arrived at the coast, his companions found the rudder of a wrecked vessel. They called to him, saying they had found a knife of enormous size. Whereto he replied, that with it they might cut asunder an enormous ham, by which he probably meant the sea, to the depths of which the rudder was suited.

They next called his attention to some sand-hills strewed with pebbles, which they called grits; on which he remarked that those grits were ground by storms and the white foaming waves. Thus failed this and other attempts to detect his secret. A friend of Fengo's then advised that he should be submitted to still stricter investigation. It was determined that Fengo should feign a journey on some important business, and that during his supposed absence Hamlet should be conducted into his mother's chamber, where a concealed person should listen to their conversation; since, if his madness were simulated, it was certain that he would not conceal the truth from her. He who gave the counsel offered to be himself the listener. Fengo agreed to the proposal, and pretended to be settling off on a long journey, whilst the other went into the queen's apartment, and concealed himself under the straw. But Hamlet hopped about on the straw as if out of his senses; crowed shrilly like a cock; beat the air with his arms like the flapping of wings; and rushed up and down the hall. He soon remarked also that something moved beneath the straw, and pierced the unlucky courtier through with his sword. He then threw the body into boiling water, and afterwards cast it out to be devoured by unclean beasts. He then addressed his mother, who wept at his supposed madness, in the following words:—"Why weepest thou for me, thou most infamous of women, who like an adulteress embracest the murderer of thy husband, and art fallen so low as to flatter the man who slew the father of thy son? It is the nature of beasts to forsake one mate for another, and to forget both for a third, and thus it seems with thee also remembrance of the past is obliterated. Under the semblance of madness I am constrained to conceal my hatred, and to wait an opportunity of revenge. Do thou also mourn over my fate before the world, although thou hast much more cause to bewail thine own. All else must thou conceal!" His mother swore to obey him, and Hamlet resumed his pretended insanity.

When Fengo returned, he caused search to be made for his informant, and even Hamlet was questioned whether he had seen him; but he replied that he had perished by a fall, and was devoured by unclean beasts, which of course no one believed. Fengo still retained his suspicion, although, through fear of his wife, and of her father, he dared not put Hamlet to death. Therefore he sent him to Britain, and entreated the king of that country to have him destroyed, preferring that the stain of that bloody deed should be on another rather than on himself. Hamlet departed; but before he went, he enjoined his mother to cause the king's apartment to be hung with tapestry, like net-work, and after the lapse of a year to have a state funeral performed for him, as if he were dead, although he intended to return home at that very time. Two messengers from Fengo travelled with him. They carried with them a runic letter graved round a piece of wood, wherein the king of Britain was requested to destroy the young man sent to him. Whilst the messengers slept, Hamlet searched their baggage, and found the runic scroll. He immediately raised the runes, cut others in their place, and substituted the names of the messengers for his own. He added an urgent entreaty from Fengo that the king would give his daughter in marriage to the young man he sent to him. As soon as the messengers reached England they delivered the letter, unconscious that they were thereby soliciting their own destruction. The king received them with apparent friendship, and caused a great feast to be prepared in honour of them. But Hamlet refrained both from eating and drinking, as if he felt averse to both, which much surprised all present. After the banquet, the king caused his guests to be conducted to their sleeping apartment, but placed persons outside to overhear their conversation. Hamlet, on being questioned by the others why he had not partaken of the feast, said that the bread was mingled with blood, that the ale tasted of iron, and that the meat smelt like human flesh. The king, he added, had eyes like a slave, and the queen shewed by three deviations from the manners appertaining to her rank that she was also of slavish origin. The messengers laughed at him, remembering his former madness, and rebuked him for so maligning their illustrious and hospitable hosts.

These words having been repeated to the king, he inferred from them that his guest must be either superhumanly wise, or else mad; and he inquired of the steward whence the bread had been procured. The steward said the baker had made it, who, on being questioned in his turn where the grain was grown, answered that not far from thence was a field strewed with the bones of dead men, and which, in the expectation of an abundant crop, had been sown with corn. It was possible that the bread had thence derived its flavour. The king was astonished, and next day inquired where the meat was brought from. They acknowledged that the swine had escaped from the herdsman, and had devoured the half-decayed corpse of a criminal, which might have imparted to the flesh an unusual odour. The king admired the acuteness of Hamlet's nose, and then asked what had happened to the ale. He desired to be shown the spring where the water for the ale was taken, and on digging under it, a sword, more than half consumed by rust was found. In like manner it was discovered by careful research that he, as well as the queen, was descended from slaves who had been made prisoners of war. Hamlet said that the queen had betrayed her origin—first, by the habit of covering her head with her clothes, as slaves are wont to do; secondly, by holding up her garments as she walked; and thirdly, by using a wooden toothpick, and swallowing the remnants of food which adhered to her teeth. The king, astonished at such wonderful sagacity, gave Hamlet his daughter in marriage, and considered her ready acquiescence as an inspiration of the gods. The messengers he caused to be hanged the following day, in compliance with what he believed to be Fengo's request. Hamlet affected great indignation at this proceeding, and required the king to make satisfaction for their lives in gold, which he secretly melted and poured into sticks hollowed out for the purpose.

When Hamlet had remained a year in England, he desired leave to travel homewards, and returned to his native land, taking with him only the sticks filled with gold. On reaching Jutland he re-assumed his former habits, and presented himself as still mad in his mother's house, where a solemn festival was about to be held in remembrance of him. This re-appearance amongst those who had heard that he was dead caused great terror, which, however, soon changed into merriment and joy. When he was asked after his travelling companions, he showed the sticks filled with gold which he had received for them. He then mingled with the attendants who served the guests with drink, and, in order to heighten the mirth of the guests, he, too, paid great attention to the drinkers. To avoid being encumbered with his long cloak he gathered it round him, and fastened it with his sword, which he often drew, cutting his fingers thereby, which induced one of the company to take a nail and fasten it into the scabbard. In order more effectually to carry out his design, he diligently encouraged the guests to drink, and induced them to take so much that at length, drowsy with wine, they made the royal hall where they had been drinking their sleeping place. This was an opportunity Hamlet would not let escape him. He therefore fetched his wooden hooks, went into the hall where the guests were sleeping off their excess, cut down the hangings from the walls, and drew them over the sleepers, securing the net with the hooks, so that not one of those who lay beneath it could stir. He then set fire to the house, and entered the king's chamber, where he found him drunk and snoring. He took down the king's sword and hung his own in its place, and then awakened Fengo, saying, he was come to demand vengeance for his father. Fengo started up and seized the sword, but could not draw it. He, however, defended himself for a time with the scabbard, but at length fell, pierced through by Hamlet.

As Hamlet knew not what his countrymen might say to this daring action, he concealed himself; and, when on the following day the people came to the spot, they beheld amidst the ruins of the burnt palace only half-consumed corpses, but no living man to tell how the destruction had occurred. Some were enraged, others lamented; but some, on the contrary, allowed their secret satisfaction to transpire. Hamlet then quitted his hiding-place, collected his own friends, and those of his father, and delivered to the assembled States a discourse, wherein he represented his father's virtues, and told them that they ought long before to have done that which he had now performed. All were moved by his words, some even to tears; and, as soon as their emotion subsided, he was saluted king with unanimous applause, for all greatly esteemed his prudence, which had enabled him with such deep cunning to keep his design so long concealed, and to execute an almost incredible deed of daring. Hamlet now equipped three ships with great magnificence, and sailed to Britain to visit his father-in-law and wife. He had in his suite the most noble youths of his country, in order that, as he had hitherto not displayed his dignity, he might now appear with all the lustre that becometh him. He also caused to be painted on his shield all the events that had occurred to him from his earliest youth, and, to render his appearance still more splendid, the shields borne by his followers were of gold. The King of England met his guest with friendly hospitality and regal magnificence. During the banquet, he inquired if Fengo was still alive and in health, whereupon Hamlet informed him that Fengo had perished by the sword. By dint of many questions, the king at length elicited that he who now announced the death of Fengo was himself his destroyer. This discovery struck the king to the heart, for he had solemnly sworn to Fengo that he would be his avenger. Affection for his daughter ter and son-in-law strove in his breast against the oath he had sworn to his foster-brother. At length fidelity to his vow triumphed over parental love; but still he could not prevail on himself to violate the laws of hospitality by slaying Hamlet in his own palace. He therefore commissioned him to court for him another wife, his own having lately died. There reigned at that time in Scotland a virgin queen called Hermutruda, whom the king much desired to espouse; but she, being as jealous of her liberty as she was harsh in her disposition, had hitherto persecuted and put to death all her suitors, so that not one now remained.

Hamlet was well aware of the danger of his undertaking, but he nevertheless proceeded on his way, accompanied by his own suite as well as the king's servants. He reached Scotland, and when within a short distance of the castle where Hermutruda dwelt, he caused the over-ridden horses to be turned loose to pasture in a meadow, and laid himself down to sleep by a murmuring brook, having first placed guards around the spot. The queen sent forth spies, one of whom succeeded in passing through the guards unperceived. He took Hamlet's shield from under his head, together with the letter to the queen, and delivered them both to his sovereign. She examined the shield attentively, guessed by the representations on it who the stranger was, and remembered his wise conduct, and how he had avenged his father's death. She erased the writing in the letter where the old man besought her hand, as she preferred a young husband to an old one, and substituted for it another writing, wherein she was requested to become the wife of the bearer. She next caused the representations on the shield to be copied, so that the writing and the picture mutually explained each other, and then commanded the spy to return with the letter and shield. Meanwhile Hamlet had perceived the loss of his shield, but he still kept his eyes closed and pretended to sleep, foreseeing that the bold thief would return, as his first enterprise had been so successful. He was not deceived in his expectation, for the spy returned with the shield; but, as he was endeavouring to replace it under Hamlet's head, the latter started up, seized him, and caused him to be fettered. He then awakened his followers, and proceeded to the castle, where he delivered to the queen his father-in-law's letter. Hermutruda having read it, commended Hamlet's wise conduct, said that Fengo had been justly slain, and rejoiced at the fortunate issue of his plan. Therefore, added she, although hitherto she had been entirely adverse to all suitors, and although she was a high-born queen, she was now disposed to follow him as his wife, if he, not for her beauty alone, but above all on account of her high estate, would bestow his affections on her. Saying these words, she fell on his neck. Hamlet was greatly pleased with this reception, returned her embrace, and assured her that their love was reciprocal. Preparations were immediately made for their nuptials; and, after the bridal banquet, he returned to England accompanied by a chosen band of young Scotchmen. He was met by his wife, who, although she felt herself insulted by her husband taking another wife, would yet not forsake the man to whom she had borne a son, and vowed to love her rival, even though she should be hated by her; at the same time, she warned Hamlet to be on his guard against her father's plot. Whilst she was yet speaking, the old king appeared; he embraced his son-in-law, and invited him to a banquet. Hamlet took with him 200 Scottish knights, put on armour under his clothes, and approached the royal hall. As they were passing beneath the archway of the portals, the king hurled a lance at Hamlet, which would have killed him but that the armour turned aside the blow. He however received a slight wound, and retired to the spot where he had commanded his Scotch friends to wait, and dispatched Hermutruda's spy to the king to relate to him all that had taken place. The enraged king pursued him with his host, and attacked Hamlet's band, the greater part of whom were cut to pieces. During the night Hamlet, who despaired of victory, caused the fallen to be propped up by sticks and stones, and placed the corpses upon the dead horses, which were similarly raised up. At the unexpected appearance of these, whose number seemed doubled by the shadows they cast around them, the foes were so terrified that they fled. The king himself was taken in his flight, put to death, and Hamlet, taking with him his wives and rich spoils, left Britain, and returned to his native Jutland. During these transactions King Rörek had died in Denmark, and his successor Wigleth, after persecuting Hamlet's mother in various ways, deprived her of all her treasures, because Hamlet ought not without her permission to have assumed the government of Jutland. Hamlet at first softened him by gifts; but when an opportunity for revenge offered, he attacked the king, and forced him to flee. Wigleth, however, collected an army from Skonen and Zeeland, and challenged Hamlet to fight. After some hesitation, caused by his affection for his wife, Hamlet finally resolved to accept the defiance; whereupon Hermutruda vowed that she would follow him, and not survive him; but when Hamlet fell in the combat, she gave herself up to the conqueror, and voluntarily became his wife. Such was the end of Hamlet, who, if his good fortune had equalled his wisdom, might have rivalled the gods in honour and glory. His sepulchre is still to be seen on a plain in Jutland, which to this day bears his name.

"ACT ANENT THE MANUFACTURIE AT AIR."

THE following act of the Scottish Parliament, which we copy from an original manuscript, is curious, as illustrative of the mode by which the legislature sought to encourage manufactures and suppress vagrancy:—

Forasmuch as by the fourtie twa act of the first session of this present current parliament It is statute and ordained That Manufactures should be exerted within this Kingdome And that Companies and Societies should be authorised for joint Carrying on of the same Not only for Improving of the growth and product of this kingdome to

The "Citadail of Air" was originally the parish church of St John. Cromwell appropriated the church and churchyard, with some adjacent ground, which he converted into a fortification, in 1651: hence its designation, "the Citadail." On the Restoration, in 1660, the fort was dismantled, and the premises, all within the walls, gifted to the Earl of Eglinton, with the privileges of a burgh of regality, under the name of Montgomerieston. The magistrates of Ayr were much annoyed by the creation of a rival burgh in such close proximity to their ancient incorporation, and not a few legal controversies were the consequences: but Montgomerieston continued to possess and maintain its privileges. The manufactory established by the Earl of Eglinton and others, to which the foregoing act refers, was a patriotic attempt to carry out the views of the legislature in promoting the manufactures of the country. The act is not dated, but it was probably passed about 1680. "The Citadell," while the manufactory continued, seems to have contained a number of inhabitants, of various trades—forming quite a community by themselves. Individuals of them are frequently mentioned in the session-books of Ayr. The Citadel, which has long been the property of the Ailsa family, is now occupied as a brewery, and the "Fort ale," as the beverage is called, is distinguished for its excellence.

TWO LETTERS

FROM JAMES ANDERSON,

THE EDITOR OF THE DIPLOMATA SCOTIÆ.

THESE two letters contain some information relative to the fortunes and family of Anderson the antiquary, who derived loss instead of advantage from his zealous endeavours to preserve and publish the ancient muniments of his native country. His magnificent work, the Diplomata Scotiæ, upon which infinite labour and expense had been bestowed, was unfinished at the time of his demise, and was ushered into the world under the auspices of the learned Thomas Ruddiman, who wrote an introductory dissertation:—

I.

Edinburgh, 10th Nov., 1716.

My Dear Child,

The weather here is cold, and the wind easterly, which makes me very uneasy; but I hope it will soon give over. I wrote you the Governor's approval of the new office I have taken, and a person has been with me from Baron Scrop about my house, and wrote up to him. General Cadogan* is come here, and goes for London early on Saturday morning. Some more officers are going, and the rest of the Dutch troops are quickly to follow, so I hope to have some respite from fatigue in a few days, which will give me more time to look after business. I send you the Generall Post, which has the freshest of our news from London and abroad. All the family, blessed be God, are in health. Dr Lambie remembers you frequently: Write me often and fully. Dear son, I commit you to the care and protection of a generous God, and give you and Jeannie my blessing. My service to all: Adieu.

To Mr Patrick Anderson, in Islay,

To the care of Mr John Allan,

Baillie of Islay.

II.

My Lord,

Your Grace has been so grateful and generous to me in your favours upon so many occasions, as makes me presume to humbly beg your Grace's pardon in behalf of my son, whom

* William Cadogan, created in 1718, Earl Cadogan, Thomas Caversham, Lord Cadogan of Reading. Also Lord Cadogan of Oakley, with remainder to his brother Charles and his heirs male. The three first titles became extinct in 1725, but the Earldom was revived in 1726, in the person of Charles, Lord Cadogan, the descendant of Charles the brother of Earl William.

I bred to business, for his being Clerk of the Court Martial, in room of Smith, who has it, being dangerously ill, and, as it is said, irrecoverably. I need ask no arguments, by any loss of business in my publick undertaking hitherto, to the prejudice of my family, which disables me the more at present to provide for them; but rather depend upon your Grace's great goodness. I convey this to your Grace by the hands of Mr Scott of Scotstarvit, my son's near kinsman, who can inform your Grace of his sufficiency to fill that place. Begging your Grace's pardon for this presumption in him, who is, with the utmost gratitude, and most profound respect,

My Lord,

Your Grace's most obliged and most obedient humble servant.

No date—but written evidently after the loss of the situation of Post Master General, and addressed probably to the Duke of Argyle. Anderson was law agent for the Duchess, his mother, and occasionally did business for her son.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL.

SIR,—Allow me to correct a mistake at page 16 of your Journal. The person who planned the system of naval tactics, said to have been adopted by Lord Rodney, was not the Baronet of Pennicuik, but John Clerk of Eldin, fifth son of Sir John Clerk the second Baronet. John married Susan, daughter of William Adam,* (father of Chief Commissioner Adam,) by whom he had two sons, viz. John Clerk, the well-known and eccentric lawyer, afterwards Lord Eldin, and William, principal Clerk of the Jury Court. Eldin became, after his Lordship's death—who disinherited his brother in favour of Charles Ross, advocate—the property of the late Alexander Robertson, music-seller, Edinburgh; it is very small in extent, consisting of not many acres.

Old John of Eldin used to etch very well, and impressions from several of his plates were presented by his son, Lord Eldin, to the Bannatyne Club. These etchings are the rarest among the many rare privately printed works of that Society. Sixteen guineas have been given for a copy. John the elder used to think William the cleverest of his two sons. This being told to John the younger by a friend who took a delight in teasing him, he answered, "Did he say so!—then he was most d——y mistaken." The old gentleman was not, however, very far wrong, for William was a remarkably clear-headed and acute person. His intellect was as vigorous before his death as it had been all his life previous. For saying bitter things few excelled him.

The assumption that Lord Rodney was indebted to Clerk's naval tactics for the idea of breaking the line on the occasion of his brilliant and memorable battle, is somewhat problematical; indeed, the recent discussion on the subject would indicate that his Lordship never heard of Clerk or his scheme. Still this will not detract from Clerk's merits, unless it can be shewn that he had stolen the idea from Rodney, which is not even pretended.

THE GALLANT HOWARDS, OR "OLD BUFFS," IN 1746.—On the 29th of July, in the afternoon, William Pollock, wig-maker in Stirling, sent his Journeyman, William Maiben, to Lieut. Stoyt, of Howard's regiment, Old Buffs, with a wig which he had desired to be made for him. The Lieutenant, being dissatisfied with the wig, expressed himself in a disdainful manner, and bid Maiben begone with it. Maiben, in going down stairs, muttered some very provoking words, said to be to the purpose, that Lieut. Stoyt was a troublesome scoundrel; and that if he had him out, he could kick him for his commission. The gentleman was so enraged at this, that he went to Mr Pollock's shop, taking a soldier with him, and struck Maiben over the head, once and again, with a stick, till it broke. Other officers rushing into the shop at the same time, one of them, whose name was not known, beat Maiben on the face to the effusion of his blood. And Mr Pollock, endeavouring to rescue his servant, Lieut. Stoyt and that other officer beat him on the breast with their fists. Immediately after, they dragged Maiben to the guard by the collar. Then Lieut. Stoyt acquainted his Lieut.-Colonel, George Howard, of the matter; who thereupon ordered Maiben to be stripped, tied to halberts in the market-place, and whipped. On notice of what had passed, the magistrates, particularly Bailies William Maiben, John Gillespie, and Patrick Stevenson, went to Lieut.-Colonel Howard, and required him to deliver up Maiben, in order to be judged by them; declaring themselves willing to do justice, and give all manner of satisfaction in the matter. The Lieut.-Colonel answered to this purpose: That he had ordered Maiben to be flogged, and it should be so; that he would answer for it; and that they should know he commanded in Stirling; and he spoke otherwise indecently to the magistrates. Accordingly Maiben was tied to the halberts and whipped by a drum of Howard's regiment; Lieut. Neilson of Barrel's regiment, who commanded the guard, overseeing the execution. In a little time, the Lieut.-Colonel, by the advice, or at the intercession of the Major of the regiment, ordered Maiben to be loosed, and set at liberty; but not till his back was severely cut by the stripes. An information of this affair was forthwith given in to the Court of Justiciary, in the name of Mr Pollock and Maiben, and of the Magistrates of Stirling, charging Lieut. Stoyt as guilty of hamesucken against Mr Pollock and Maiben, and Lieut.-Colonel Howard and Lieut. Neilson, of a most barbarous and cruel abuse and maltreatment of Maiben's person, in a most ignominious manner, and of a manifest invasion of the office of magistracy, and of the rights and liberties of the subject; and therefore craving a warrant for apprehending their persons, and imprisoning them till they should underly the law. The Lords passed an interlocutor on the 1st of August; by which, before answer to the information and petition, their Lordships remitted to, and appointed the Sheriffs of the shire of Stirling, to make inquiry into, and take a precognition anent the facts complained of, and to report the same.—On the 30th of July, Howard's regiment arrived at Glasgow from Stirling; next day the officers were entertained in the public hall by the magistrates, and complimented with the freedom of the city; and on the 1st of August they marched for Carlisle. The above affair at Stirling is however said to have given general disgust.—GLASGOW JOURNAL [1748].

THE INTERIOR OF SHAKESPEARE'S HOUSE.—All around is dark and heavy. The square shop—if it may be called a shop—is rudely flagged with broad stones, round which in the winter time the water oozes up. The white-washed walls stand dimly under the shadow of the window-screen which slopes downwards to the street. A massive chimney, with its bold ingle, comes out into the floor; and an open door at the back, reached by a single stone step, leads at once into the kitchen. This is warmer, smaller, and still more shut up in ancient characteristics. The vast fire-place on one side, and the oak stairs on the other, winding up through the wall into the room where Shakespeare was born, are unmistakable evidences of the rude and enduring architecture of a remote age.—ATLAS.

FOUNDATION OF INVERARY CASTLE.—On the 1st of October, the foundation of Inverary Castle was laid, which was to have been done last year, but ~~for~~ the rebellion. The inscription on the foundation-stone is:—CAL. OCT. ANNO DOM. MDCCCLVI. POSUIT A. A. DUX. GULIELMUS CUMBRÆ DUX NOBIS HÆC OTIA FECIT.—SCOTS MAGAZINE, 1746.

BURNES OR BURNS?—THE POET.

[FROM "AYR ADVERTISER," OCT. 21.]

In a notice of the SCOTTISH JOURNAL in our second page, will be found an extract bearing the above title, which opens up a question to which we refer here, because, as we shall show, we are in possession of a clue to the entire problem. Allan Cunningham's version of the change adopted by the Poet in spelling his name is the more correct one;—still it is incomplete, and seems founded on information gleaned only from the Poet's manuscripts. The entry in the session-book has misled the writer in the SCOTTISH JOURNAL to suppose that the Poet's father pronounced his name Burns; and the common orthoepy in Ayrshire strengthens him in the supposition. The fact, however, is the reverse. We have the authority of Mrs Begg, the Poet's sister, for stating that to her very distinct recollection, her father both spelled and pronounced the family name with two syllables, Burn-ess, to the hour of his death. That was the way in which it was spelled and pronounced in his native county of Kincardine, then, and till this day. All the living connections of the family, in the north, over which they are widely scattered, so pronounce it, notwithstanding some of them—as Mr Burnes of Montrose—use only one s; and when any of them visit the Ayr or the Doon, they invariably, in speaking of the Poet or his father, make use of the same pronunciation. Then as to the change adopted by the Poet:—William Burness died on the 13th February, 1784, and, as Mrs Begg remembers, his sons, shortly after that event, consulted together and agreed to drop Burness and assume Burns, in order not to be singular—the latter being the common pronunciation in Ayrshire. So that spelling the name Burness was no crotchet of the Poet, neither was he the only one who "sat in judgment upon it," much less threw it away because it had "a barbarous sound." The orthography in the session-records—which, having, through the kindness of Mr Rowan, the present session-clerk, inspected, we can say is correctly copied—may easily be explained. The probability is that William Burness gave the names of his children to the then clerk for entry, without taking heed how that functionary spelled them; and the latter, left thus to himself, would very naturally write the family name in the way he and others in the district had always been accustomed to do. This explanation we think sufficient to set the question at rest. It adds, moreover, a new, though not a very important fact to the biography of the Poet, in the circumstance that the change in the name was not the result of a mere whim on his part, but of a family arrangement made for a good-enough reason.

[The statement of Mrs Begg, who would be about thirteen years of age when her father died, is not to be lightly estimated in a matter of this kind; still, it is singular, if the names were given to the session-clerk in writing, as no doubt they were, how that functionary should have so invariably deviated from the spelling. It would appear, at all events, that the family were never called Burness in Ayrshire.]

ERRATA.—Page 98, first column, line 28, for "Abercorn" read "Kilmarnock." Also, same page, at the foot of the second column, for "Gregor glun dubh" read "Gregor adhar ard." Page 160, first column, line 23, for "Columbus" read "Columba;" last line, same column, for "Ag" read "Og;" line 43, second column, for "Muirach Dai" read "Muirach and Dai."

THE REGALIA, OR "HONOURS, OF SCOTLAND."

WHEN Charles II. was restored to the throne of his ancestors, in 1660, the demands upon his bounty by those who had rendered important services, or suffered pecuniarily as well as personally, in the cause of his father and himself, were so numerous, that even although as grateful as he is reputed to have been otherwise, there must necessarily have remained not a few cases of individual claims unrequited. Among the many demands upon his royal favour none were of a more interesting nature than those connected with the guardianship of the Crown, Sword and Sceptre, or "Honours," as they were called, of Scotland, during the Usurpation.

Three parties were concerned in this important matter—the Dowager Countess Marshell and her son, Sir John Keith, afterwards created Earl of Kintore; George Ogilvie of Barras, afterwards Sir George, and his lady; and the Rev. James Ogilvie, minister of Kinross, and his wife.

In 1701, a pamphlet was published, entitled "A True Account of the Preservation of the Regalia of Scotland, viz., Crown, Sword and Sceptre, from falling into the hands of the English Usurpers. By Sir George Ogilvie of Barras, Kt. and Baronet, with the Blazon of that Family."* The reason assigned for putting it forward was "there being an account of the Earl of Kintore's Family given to be insert in Mr Alexander Nisbet his Book of Heraldry; in which account, the sole and chief preservation of the Honours is ascribed to the now Earl of Kintore, and the then Countess-Dowager Marischall his mother; and not only makes mention of the said Sir George in a Dishonourable manner, but doth also smother (and might in process of Time have totally obliterated) the good service, Loyalty, and Sufferings of the said Sir George his well-deserving Lady: and it being credibly Reported, That at the same Juncture the said Earl's account was given to Mr Nisbet at Edinburgh, the like account was sent to London, to be insert in Morrey's Dictionary (and that a long time before the Printing and Publishing Sir George's account)."

From the "True Account" we learn that,

* This pamphlet emanated from Sir William Ogilvie and his son David, son and grandson of Sir George.

"when the Rebels in Britain, under Oliver Cromwell the usurper, had triumphed over the best of men, and justest of kings, Charles the first, and those that persisted in their loyalty to him in these lamentable times of confusion, the Regalia or Honours of Scotland, were delivered to the custody of the Earl Marischall, and were lodged in the strong castle of Dunottar, within the shyre of Mearns, as a place of greatest security and distance from the Enemy.*

"The said Earl being obliged to be in the fields to defend his king and country against the usurper, he made choice of George Ogilvie of Barras, as the fittest man for his valour, prudence and loyalty, to intrust the keeping of the said Castle of Dunottar with the Honours, viz. the Crown, Scepter, and Sword, and other monuments of the kingdom therein, makes him his Lieutenant, and gives him the commission following."†

The commission, signed "Marischall," is dated "the Eight day of July 1651." The Earl accompanied Charles II. to England, and was engaged in the disastrous battle of Worcester. Having been captured at Elliot, he was carried to London, and imprisoned in the Tower. Ogilvie of Barras being thus left "sole keeper of the Honours, and Governour of the said castle, which he found not sufficiently provided with men, ammunition, and other provisions, to hold out against a long siege, as the king had ordered, acquaints John Campbell Earl of Loudon their Chancellour."

The answer of his lordship, which is given, is dated "at Finlargo, 13th November." Neither Parliament nor Committee of Estates having met, as his Lordship expected, he could give "no positive advice nor order." If properly supplied with men and provisions he had no doubt that the governor would hold out: "but," his Lordship continues, "if you want provisions, souldiers and ammunition, and cannot hold out against all the assaults of the enemy, which is feared you cannot do, if hard put to it, I know no better expedient than that the Honours be speedily and safely transported to some remote and strong castle in the Highlands; and I wish you had delivered them to the Lord Balcarra, as was desired by the Committee of Estates, nor do I know any better way for the preservation of these things

* This was done by order of the Scottish Parliament, which sat for the last time on the 6th of June 1651. Edinburgh Castle, and all the strongholds south of the Forth, were then in the hands of Cromwell's forces.

† Sir George had been in the German wars.

and your exoneration. And it will be an irreparable loss and shame if these things shall be taken by the enemy, and very dishonourable for yourself. I have here retained your letter to the Lord Balcarras, hearing he is still in the north, and not come to this country. I have written to Sir John Smith, to furnish you the Remainder of the victuals you wrote he should have given you; if he be in the north you will send it to him, and if he be gone home to Edinburgh, I cannot help it. So having given you the best advice I can at present, I trust you will with all care and faithfulness be answerable according to the trust committed to you.

Such was the desperate position of the Governor of Dunnottar Castle. His reason for not delivering the Honours to the Earl of Balcarras was, as assigned in his letters to Balcarras and the Chancellor, that he did not consider their order a sufficient warrant, "haueing reseaved the charge of that hous and what was intrustett therein, from the Earll Marshall, and then by a particular warrant under his Majesties owne hand, yet notwithstanding [he goes on to address the Chancellor] if your Lo. and the Comitie of Estaitis ther sall conceaw that they may be more secure in any other [place] then they ar heir, I sall delyver them to quhome your Lo. and the Comitie of Estaitis ther shall appoynt to resave them; they bringing with them ane act of the Comitie for the Earll Marshall and my exoneration thereof; and that I haue withall a particular order for the delyverie of them, but withall humble submitting to your Lo. and Comitie of Estaitis ther better consideratione, I conceive that ther is no place in this kingdom quhair they cane be more secure nor quhair they ar, and with les charges, if the Comitie of Estaitis be pleased to tak order tymeously for furnishing of me with such things as is necessar for defence of this hous."

Ogilvie was first summoned to surrender by the Cromwellian General Overton, on the 8th November 1651; again by Colonel Dutton, November 22; and General Lambert, January 3, 1652, who offered him the most honourable terms. His reply, however, was couched in the same spirit with which he had answered similar previous epistles:

"(George Ogilvie to General Lambert.)

"Honored Sir

"I have receaved yours for surrendering the Castle of Dunnottar, the lyk wheroff I have receaved from sundrie of your officers befor, and have given answers therto: that being intrusted be his majestie I wold not surrender the same upon any hazard whatsoever, but intends, by the help of the Lord, to maintaine the same till I shall have orders from his Majestie in the contrair. I shall be as loath as any to occasione the effusione of blood, wheroff too much hath bene already, but shall be farr mor loath to betray the trust imposed upon me. I cannot but thank you for your offers and remaine

"Sir,

"Your servant,

"George Ogilvy."

"January 7, 1652."

At length the Governor received a letter from the Earl Marshell, dated May 4, 1652, stating that he had resolved to put his "person, fortions, houses and all," freely into the hands of the Lord General and Council of State, that he might peaceably enjoy what belonged to him "under the favour and protection of the Commonwealth of England," and requiring him to deliver up his "hous of Dunnottar to Major General Deane." Proceeding apparently upon this letter, as well as the advice of the Earl Marshell's friends, the Governor entered into a correspondence with Major General Deane and Colonel Morgan for "the randitione of the Castle;" which was not finally arranged till the 24th of May, and even then upon very creditable terms. The Honours, however, had previously been secured. "The Governor George Ogilvie," says the pamphlet, "being disappointed of sufficient force and provisions, to hold out a long seige,* and observing the advances the English made daily in reducing the nation was exceedingly perplext, how to prevent the enemies getting the Honours of this kingdom in their hand. He advises with his wife (a lady of great prudence and undaunted courage). She therefore formes a very happy contrivance, that she should convey the Honours privately out of the Castle, and secure them without her husband's knowledge, that when he should be put to it, and tortured by the enemy, he might freely declare he knew not where they were. In order thereto, this lady sends for Mr James Granger, minister of Kinneff, his wife, in whom she had great confidence, and imparts to her the design, she promising to be faithful. They privately carried the Honours out of the said Castle to Mr James Granger the minister, (the other trustee,) and put them under ground within the church of Kinneff; and the manner how the Honours were transported from the Castle thither, was on a servant-woman's back, in a sack amongst hard's of lint."†

"George Ogilvie the governour, not being able to hold out the castle against so powerful an ene-

* One hundred men had been ordered to garrison Dunnottar, but he only obtained forty; and not half the quantity of provisions.

† Mrs Granger obtained permission from the English general to visit the Governor's lady. The Crown was concealed in her lap, while the Sceptre and Sword, wrapt up in bundles of flax, were placed upon the back of a female domestic. Mrs Granger's horse had been left in the English camp; for so precipitous is the chasm which divides Dunnottar from the mainland, that the castle-gate can neither be approached nor entered by a person on horseback. She returned through the English camp unsuspected, the load of her attendant passing for a quantity of flax, which Mrs Ogilvie, according to the economy of the Scottish matrons, destined for the spinning-wheel and loom, and had taken this opportunity to send thither to be manufactured. The English General himself is said courteously to have placed Mrs Granger in her saddle, little dreaming, of course, of the treasure which she had concealed about her person, and alarming her much from the hazard of discovery. She kept her composure, however, and so preserved her secret. The belt belonging to the Sword of State was not delivered up to Mrs Granger, but continued in the possession of Governor Ogilvie, who perhaps retained it as a piece of real evidence of his having had the Honours in his custody. It was long afterwards discovered carefully packed up and concealed in the wall of the House of Barra. It is still in possession of the family.

my, that then besieged him so closs, and expecting no relief, and all other forts and castles in the kingdom being in the enemies possession, enters into capitulation with Colonel Thomas Morgan, and surrenders on honourable terms, the garrison being permitted to march out of the said castle with drums beating, and colours flying, which were carried by the present Sir William Ogilvie of Barras, son of the said Captain George, (who was the last person who carried colours at that time in Scotland for the king). And one of the articles of capitulation* being to deliver up the Honours, (for the English were certainly informed they were in the castle) or give a rational account of them; these are the very words of capitulation, which the present Sir William, (the said Captain George his son) hath in his custody.

After the surrender, the English demanded the Honours, or an account of them: the Governour declared he knew not where they were, for his wife had privately taken them away, without acquainting him. Upon which he was put into close prison in the said castle; his lady being examined and threatened with torture, she boldly affirmed by way of evasion for her own safety, that she had delivered the Honours to John Keith, (now Earl of Kintore) who carried them abroad to the king. But the English distrusting her, put her in close prison also, and sent out a party to the house of Barras, to apprehend the said Sir William Ogilvie, (their only son and child) that they might torture him in sight of his parents, to extort a confession from them, but he by Providence made a timely escape, and underwent much toil and fatigue, by travelling night and day, till he came to his friends in Angus, where he remained incognito.

"After the said Captain George and his lady had been close prisoners for a year, in which time they suffered much inhumane usage, by the cruelty of the English, who caused a sentinel stand at the prison door, and another at the prisoners beside, that they should not commune about the Honours; and after all, the said Captain George and his lady adhearing to their former declarations, that the Honours were carried abroad by the now Earl of Kintore, had such an appearance of truth, that upon mediation of friends, Major-General Dean was prevail'd upon to grant them liberty to go to their own house of Barras, upon such conditions as here follows, conform to the principal warrand.

[The conditions were that he and his wife should render themselves prisoners on demand, under a heavy bond, and that they do not travel above three miles from "their own house of Barras."]

"Upon this warrand Captain George and his lady were set at liberty, and George Grahame of Morphie became cautioner for them. [The bond is here quoted.]

"Sometime after this, the said Captain George and his lady were necessitat and enforced by the rigidity and strictness of the English, to find security of new, as the following bond doth evince. [This bond is also copied. It is dated 1st February, 1653.]

"Under this restraint Captain Ogilvie's lady died, and he remain'd therein till the Restauration of King Charles the 2d. and all that time had a special care of the Honours, by sending monethly clean linnen to Mr James Granger the minister, and his wife, with instructions to take them out of the ground, and wrap them in the same least they should be spoiled or tarnished, which the minister of Kinneff and his wife punctually observed, and were faithfull in their secesie, till the Kings Restauration, (for which they had a yearly pension pay'd them all their lifetime), and then delivered them to the said Captain George, who according to the kings order, did redeliver them to the Earl Marischal in as good condition as he at first received them, as is evident by the following receipt, which will demonstratively and undeniably prove, that the foresaid Captain George and his lady were the principal keepers and preservers of the Honours of Scotland, (whatever others pretend,) and the only sufferers therefore; which honourable piece of service, so faithfully perform'd, should never be forgot by king or country, in saving of the Honours, which prevented both the disgrace of the kingdom, and the irreparable loss of our antient Regality.

"But notwithstanding of this noble and good service done by the said Captain George and his lady, yet at King Charles the 2d. his Restauration, the then old Countess Marischall wrote to his Majesty, that her son John Keith, now Earl of Kintore, (who was then abroad upon his travels, and knew nothing of the matter) had preserved the Honours, being that the said Captain George had unvarrily imparted to the said Countess where they were hid, and how by that contrivance of his wife in affirming that she had delivered them to the said John Keith, they had saved themselves and conceal'd the Honours from the English. And his Majesty knowing nothing of Captain George Ogilvie and his lady's special service in preserving of the Honours (in respect they did not timely apply) did upon the said Countess her misrepresentation, create her said son, first Knight Marischall of Scotland, and then Earl of Kintore, and ordered him a pension of 400 lib: Starl: a year, which he enjoyed all King Charles the 2d. his life time, and is as yet continued to him with the said place and dignity, for his pretended preservation of the Honours.

" Captain George Ogilvie, then in the meantime in Scotland, being inform'd that the foresaid Countess and others had misrepresented to his Majesty his faithful service, in preserving of the Honours, by which he was like to lose the honour and merit of so noble and eminent an action, perform'd with the hazard of his own and his lady's life, with the ruine of his fortune; he sends to London his son, the said Sir William Ogilvie of Barras, to give a true relation of the preservation of the Honours, who addresses his Majesty with the following petition.

[The petition sets forth the services of the petitioner, and states that the Honours still remain in his possession.]

" The answer to the petition was as follows:

' Whitehall, 28 September, 1660.

' His Majesty Ordains the Petitioners Father to deliver his Crown, Scepter and Sword, to the Earl Marischal of Scotland, and to get his Receipt of them.

' Sic Subscritur Lauderdaill.'

" This order was by the then Earl of Lauderdale's advice, who said if John Keith had kept the Honours, then the said George Ogilvie was not able to deliver them; but if the said George had the keeping of them, 'twou'd evidently and undenyably appear who was the true preserver.

" At this time the then old Countess Marischall being inform'd that the Honours were hid in the Church of Kinneff; she endeavours by all means to perswade Mr James Granger the minister to deliver them to her, but Captain George getting a surmize thereof, goes to the said church, and takes out the Scepter, and carries it to his house of Barras, and takes also an obligation from the said Minister to make the rest of the Honours forthcoming to him, as appears by his obligation, whereof the tenor follows.

" ' Whereas I have received a Discharge from George Ogilvie of Barras of the Honours of this Kingdom, and he hath got no more but the Scepter: Therefore I oblige my self, that the rest, viz: The Crown and Sword, shall be forthcoming at Demand, by this my Ticket, written and subscribed this day I received the Discharge, 28th September 1660.

' Sic Subscritur M. J. Granger. '

" Within few days thereafter, Captain George gets the King's order to deliver up to the Earl Marischall the Crown, Scepter, and Sword, which readily he obeys, and gets the Earls following receipt, all written with his own hand.

" ' At Dunottor the 8th day of October 1660, I William Earl Marischal, Grants me to have received from George Ogilvie of Barras, the Crown, Sword and Scepter, the Ancient Monuments of this Kingdom, Entire and Compleat, in the same Condition they were Entrusted by me to him, and discharge the foresaid George Ogilvie of his Receipt thereof, by this my Subscription. Day and place foresaid.

' Sic Subscritur Marischal.'

" Captain George Ogilvie not only preserved by his prudence, fidelity, and diligent care, the Honours, as said is, but also considerable writs and monuments intrusted to him when Governor of Dunottor, (the way and manner too tedious to insert,) such as the King's papers, the receipt whereof follows.

[These, according to the receipt, consisted of several packages.]

" The said Captain George also preserv'd the Registers and Papers of the Kirk of Scotland, which is evident by a receipt thereof, granted to him by the Lord Balcarras, by order of a commission from the Kirk. Also the monuments and charters of the University of St Andrews, which he delivered to Robert Zull, upon the order of Robert Honnyman, Clerk to the University, and got his receipt thereof. And siclike, the principal papers and charters belonging to the family of Hamilton, which he delivered to James Hamilton, then servant to the present Dutchess Dowager of Hamilton, and got his receipt thereof, written on the end of my Lady Dutchess her letter, brought by him to the said Captain George. All which principal receipts and documents are registrat (for preservation) in the Books of Council and Session, being the General Register of this kingdom.

" Captain George Ogilvie having faithfully exoner'd himself of the foresaid trust, takes journey for London, to wait upon the King, by whom he was kindly received, and delivered to his Majestie the Earl Marischals receipt of the Honours, which the King having read, Captain George humbly requested it back, that it might be kept in his family as an evident of his and his wives loyalty and good service done to the King and kingdom of Scotland, which his Majestie granted, and was graciously pleased to confer a deserv'd mark of his Highness favour upon him and his family, by making him a Knight Baronet, by a patent dated at Whitehall 5th March 1661, and gave him a new charter of the lands of Barras, changing the holding thereof, to hold thereafter blench of his Majestie and his successors, 3d March 1662: which is ratified in Parliament 11th August 1679. In which patent, charter and ratification, is narrated the eminent service done and performed by Sir George Ogilvie of Barras, and that he was the preserver of his Majesties Crown, Sword and Scepter, the antient Honours of the kingdom of Scotland, and the damages sustained by the said Sir George and his lady there through, from the beginning of the Usurpation, during which time (notwithstanding of all temptations and threatenings used against them by the Usurper) they carried themselves with the greatest integrity and constancy in all their sufferings.

"This Sir George Ogilvie of Barras was descended of the honourable family of Ogilvie Earl of Airlie; he married Elizabeth Dowglass, daughter of Mr John Dowglass of Barras, brother german to William Earl of Angus, grand-father to the late Duke of Hamilton. By this lady he had the present Sir William Ogilvie, who married Isabel Ogilvie, daughter to Sir John Ogilvie of Inverarity, by whom he hath very hopeful children."

Such is the statement in the "True Account." In so far as the defence of Dunnotar Castle, and the mode of preserving the Honours, is concerned, it is perfectly accurate. There was, however, a dispute as to the share which the Dowager Countess Marishall and John, her younger son, afterwards Earl of Kintore, had in their preservation; and the publication of the pamphlet gave rise, in consequence, to an action for libel, before the Privy Council of Scotland, at the instance of John, Earl of Kintore, against Sir William Ogilvie of Barras, Knight, in 1702. The Council passed an "Act (5th July) in favours of the Earl of Kintore, for burning the Book emitted by Barras at the Cross, by the hands of the Hangman," and amerced his son David, as one of the defendants, in a fine of twelve hundred pounds Scots. The statement for the Earl of Kintore was, in substance, that Sir George Ogilvie was merely the Deputy of the Earl Marishall; that it was the Duchess Dowager who planned the mode of conveying the Honours out of Dunnotar Castle, and that the Earl's stratagem, in writing home from Paris that he had the Honours, proved effectual in lulling the suspicion of the English. In support of these averments the pursuer produced "ane receipt granted by Mr James Grainger, minister at Kinneff, to the Countess Marishall, beareing him to have in his custody the Honours of the kingdom, viz. the Crown, Scepter, and Sword, and where the same were absconded that the said Countess might have access thereto, dated the thirty-first day of March 1m. vic. and fifty-two yeares.* And likewise produced ane Declaration under the said Mr James Grainger his hand, anent the way and manner of preserving of the Honoures by the Countess Marishall, dated the nyneteenth day of October, 1m. vic. and sixty yeares, with ane missive letter from the said minister to the said Countess Marishall, dated the twelfth of November, 1m. vic. and sixty; with ane other letter from the Earle of Middletoun to the said Countess Marishall, dated the fifteenth of November 1m. vic. and sixty, with two letters from his Majestie King Charles the second to the said Countess Marishall, the one whereof, dated the fourth of January 1m. vic. and fifty-five, and the other the fourth of September 1m. vic. and sixty."

Sir William Ogilvie and his son seem to have been somewhat hardly dealt with by the Privy Council; for although it may be perfectly true, as presumeable from the "receipt" granted by Mr Grainger to the Countess Dowager Marishall, that her Ladyship had a hand in contriving the plan for preserving the Honours, still there can be no doubt that Sir George Ogilvie and his lady were entitled to the chief reward. He for his judicious and gallant defence of Dunnotar, and she for her courage and address in maintaining the secret respecting the hiding-place of the Honours, in defiance of the imprisonment and persecution of Cromwell's generals, who were mortified at having missed so rich a prize as the Regalia of Scotland.

Nor was the conduct of the worthy minister and his wife undeserving of the highest commendation. The thanks of the Committee of Estates were formally tendered to Mr Grainger after the Restoration, and a sum of two thousand marks conferred upon Christian Fletcher, his wife, "as a reward of her courageous loyalty."

WALTER KENNEDY.

WALTER KENNEDY, though few of his writings are extant, seems to have occupied a prominent place among the earlier poets of Scotland. He is spoken of both by Douglas and Lindsay as an eminent contemporary. The former, in his "Court of the Muses," styles him "The Great Kennedie." He is now, however, chiefly known by his Flying with Dunbar; which was published as early as 1508, and became very popular. This species of poetical amusement was frequently indulged in, both before and after his time. At a much later period, the practice continued among the Highland Bards, and gave rise occasionally to no small local irritation. It must have been at best a dangerous pastime. The great object was to excel in ribaldry; and he who could say the most biting and derogatory things of his opponent, carried away the palm of victory.

The "Flying between Dunbar and Kennedie" affords a favourable specimen of the railing powers of both; indeed, it would be difficult to determine on which side the mastery lies. The language, however, is, in many instances, too gross for modern ears. A few verses may serve as a specimen:—

(DUNBAR TO KENNEDY.)

"Thow speiris, dastard, gif I dar with thee fecht?
Ye Dagone, dowbart, thairrof haif thow no dowl!
Quhairvir we meit thairto, my hand I hecht

* I, Mr James Grainger, minister at Kinneff, grant to have in my custody the Honours of the kingdom, viz. the Crown, Sceptre, and Sword. For the Crown and Sceptre I raised the pavement-stone just before the pulpit, in the night tyme, and digged under it ane hole, and put them in there, and filled up the hole, and layed down the stone just as it was before, and removed the mould that remained, that none would have discerned the stone to have been raised at all. The Sword again, at the west end of the church, amongst some common stanes that stand there, I digged down in the ground betwixt the two foremost of these saits, and laid it down within the case of it, and covered it up, as that removing the superfluous mould it could not be discerned by any body; and if it shall please God to call me by death when they be called for, your ladyship will find them in this place."

With ane doig leich I schepe to gar thee schowt,

So wald thyself, mycht thou to him succaid.

"Quhair as thou said, I stall hennis and lammiss,
I lat thee wit, I haif landis, stoir, and stakkis.
Thow wald be fane to gnaw, lad, with thy gammis,
Undir my burde, smoch banis behind doggis bakkis:
Thow hes ane tome purse, I haif steidis and takkis,
Thow tynt culter, I haif culter and pleuch,
For substance and geir thou has a widdy teuch
On Mont Falcone, about thy craig to rax.

"And yit Mont Falcone gallowis is our fair,
For to be fylit with sic ane fruitless face;
Cum hame, and hing on our gallowis of Air,
To erd thee undir it I sall purchess grace;
To eit thy flesch the doggis sall haif na space,
The revyniss sall ryfe na thing bot thy tung rutis,
For thow sic malice of thy maister mutis,
It is well sett that thou sic barret brace.

"I am the Kingis blude, his trew special Clerk,
That nevir yet imaginith his offence,

Only dependand upon his excellence:
Trestand to haif of his magnificence
Guerdoun, reward, and benefyce bedene;
Quhen that the revyniss sall ryfe out bayth thy ene,
And on the rattis sall be thy residence."

Such invective in an age, and amongst a people by no means deficient of honour, could not have been exercised, unless as good-natured banter, without leading to serious consequences—neither Dunbar nor Kennedy being persons of mean estate. So far from umbrage existing between them, Dunbar, in his "Lament for the Makars," feelingly alludes to the dangerous state of Kennedy's health:—

"And Mr Walter Kennedie
In pynt of dede lies wearily,

Grit reuth it were that so should be,
'Timor mortis conturbat me.'

The egotism of Kennedy, when he lauds himself "of Rhetory the Rose," and as having been

"Inspirit with mercury fra his golden speir," would be perfectly intolerable, were not the Flying understood as a burlesque.

From the allusions to Carrick by Dunbar in the Flying, there can be no doubt that Kennedy belonged to that part of Ayrshire, and was connected with the family of Casillis. Beyond this fact, however, little certain is known of his history.
He is supposed to have been the first son of Gilbert, first Baron Kennedy. We know that this Gilbert had a son Walter, but whether second or third may be questioned.* He was educated for the Church, and studied at the University of Glasgow, where he took the degree of Master of Arts in 1478, and was "elected one of the four masters to exercise the office of examiner in 1481." He must, therefore, have been born before 1460. Mr David Laing is of opinion that the Flying was written between the years 1492 and 1497. If so, it is evident, both from the allusions of Dunbar and Kennedy himself, that the latter resided at the time in Carrick, where he seems, from an action brought before the Lords of Council, to have filled the situation of Depute-Baillie of Carrick, under his nephew, David, afterwards Earl of Cassillis, to whom the office of heri-table Baillie of that district was ratified by charter, in 1489. It is to this the poet no doubt alludes when he says, in answer to Dunbar,—

"I am the Kingis blude, his trew SPECIAL CLERK."

His claim to "the kingis blude" was well founded—his grandfather, James, son of "Sir Gilbert Kennedy of Dunure and Agnes de Maxwell his wife," having married the Princess Mary Stewart, daughter of Robert III.†

Prior to becoming Depute-Baillie of Carrick, Kennedy was not unknown at Court, and had travelled on the Continent. He appears to have been an expectant of church preferment, if we may judge by his allusion to the king—

"Trusting to have of his magnificence,
Guerdoun, reward, and benefyce bedene."

Mr Laing thinks it probable that he was appointed Provost of Maybole, on the death of Sir David Robertson, about 1494—the patronage of the collegiate church in that town, which was founded by Sir James Kennedy of Dunure, in 1371, still continuing in the family. This su-position, however, rests upon very slender grounds.
It would rather seem that he abandoned his views of preferment in the Church. In the Flying Dunbar says—

"In till ane GLEN thou hes, owt of repair, Ane laithly luge that wes the lippir mennis;"

And Kennedy himself says, "I haif landis, stoir,

* He is designated brother of John, Lord Kennedy, in a charter of the Earl of Angus, Sept. 25, 1498.

† This marriage took place in 1405. James predeceased his father. He is said to have been killed by Gilbert, the eldest of another family of Sir Gilbert.

and stakkis . . . I haif steidis and takkis," showing that he was in possession of landed property. Now we know from existing documents that Walter Kennedy, son of Gilbert, first Lord Kennedy, and brother of John, second Lord, was the ancestor of the Kennedies of Glentig, a property in the parish of Ballantrae; and as there was no other Walter Kennedy at that period who could boast of "the Kingis blude," he must have been the poet. We thus see the meaning of Dunbar's averment that Kennedy had taken up his abode "in till ane glen." It would also thus appear that Dunbar is to be understood, in the line—

"Thow and thy Quene, as gredy gleddis, ye gang," as alluding to the marriage of Kennedy, for his descendants possessed Glentig down till the beginning of the seventeenth century.

The period of the Poet's demise is quite uncertain. He was alive, though at the "pynt of dede," when Dunbar penned his "Lament for the Makars" about 1508; and he is spoken of by Lyndsay, in 1530, as if he had been dead for a considerable time:—

"Or quha can now the warkis countrefait, Off Kennedie, with ternis aureait."

The inference is that he did not survive the illness alluded to by Dunbar.

It is rather curious that so few of the poems of Kennedy are extant. Besides the Flying, there are only some four or five pieces known to exist. These are "The Praise of Aige," "Ane Aigit Man's Invective," "Ane Ballat of our Lady," "Pious Counsall," and "The Passioun of Christ;" the latter of which, preserved in the Howard MSS., extends to 245 stanzas, of 1715 lines. Mr Laing describes it as either presenting a dry summary of the chief events of our Saviour's life and sufferings, or tedious episodical reflections, appropriate to the different hours of the Romish Church service." In "The Evergreen," published by Ramsay, the verses entitled "Jok Up-a-land's Complaint against the Court in the King's Non-age," are ascribed to Kennedy; and Chalmers, in his "Glossary to Lindsay's Works," says, on the authority of the Bannatyne MS., that "in the minority of James V. Kennedy wrote John Upon-land's Complaint, in which he cries out against the oppressions of the country during the misrule of the Douglas party." Mr Laing, however, does not admit the poem into his collection, apparently in the belief that Kennedy died before the death of James IV. The most favourable specimen of his poetical talent which survives is unquestionably the lines in "Praise of Aige." They are as follow:—

"At matyne houre, in myddis of the night,
Walknit of sleep, I saw beside me sone
Ane Aigit Man, seimit sextie yeiris of sicht
This sentence sett, and song it in gude tone,—

Wald see him deid; Sathanis sic seid sawis;
Youth-heid adew, ane of my mortall fais:
Honour with aige to every vertew drawis.

From the fame of Kennedy amongst his contemporaries, it is evident that the greater portion of his writings have been lost. His attachment to the old faith, which he describes in the foregoing verses as a ship driving in the tempestuous sea of Lollardy, the principles of the Reformation having then begun to be keenly agitated in Scotland, may in some measure account for their disappearance. Unlike most of the Makars of the time, Kennedy was a staunch adherent of Catholicity. The popularity of most of his contemporaries, on the other hand, was greatly promoted by their satirical exposure of the abuses of Popery.

GLIMPSES OF THE PAST.—WITCHCRAFT.

In our last glimpse of the past, we endeavoured to realise the terror and amazement of the rude and illiterate hinds of rural districts while the awful prodigies of heaven were pooping the midnight sky, or its suasive sounds were filling, with dulcet harmony, the vacant house of prayer. We shall draw our illustrations of by-gone times, on this occasion, from what was also a fruitful source of fear—though fear of a less appalling, but more annoying character than that produced by the "strange motions seen in the aer"—viz. the extensive prevalence, or belief in the prevalence, of Sorcery and Witchcraft.

To have the power of opening up the dim vistas of futurity, or of exercising a potent and arbitrary influence over the destinies of men, were a possession so congenial to the proud and aspiring human mind, that there have not been wanting individuals in all ages who have either professed themselves to possess, or have been believed by others to have acquired some access to the moving spring of human action, not patent to ordinary mortals.

To this source we believe may be traced, in some measure at least, the unwearied watchings and searchings of Greybeard Alchemy for the philosopher's stone—the midnight porings of spectacled Astrology—and (infra dig.) the charms and incantations of Witchcraft.

One of the Literary Clubs, of whose publications we promised to avail ourselves in our present sketches, has furnished its members* with some very curious and interesting details of the practice of witchcraft in the north of Scotland, being no less than the Indictments, or "Dittays," (and, from certain marks and memorandums, apparently those very ones used in court) against some score of men and women who were tried at Aberdeen for this foul crime, under a Commission from that high-priest of the profession, upon whose altar so many of the fraternity were offered up—James VI. of Scotland.

The following extracts from these "Dittays," will give some idea of the witchcraft of the 16th century, (the commission is dated "Haliruid-

* "Miscellany of the Spalding Club. Vol. I." We may mention that Mr Chas. Knight makes extensive use of these "Dittays" in his Essay to prove the affirmative of the question, "Was Shakespeare ever in Scotland?" and that Mr Wm. Duncan, Corr. Mem. S. A. Scot. uses them very felicitously in a paper read before that Society in 1838.

hours, the second day of February, and of our reign the 30th year, 1596,) and will also furnish some interesting traits of olden manners and customs.

Jonet Wischart, spouse of John Leyis, stabler, "ane commond notorious witche and sorcerer," is accused of no less than the murder of John Pyet, stabler, (probably a rival of her husband in business) through the casting of her witchcraft on him. "Item. John Pyet, stabler, thi nichtbour at the Justice Point, hewing coft from Alexander Ewin, the heritable rycht of ane land, thow invyit him thairfor: Thairefter thou keist on witchcraft on him, quhairbie he ley fast bed-sick, auchtene oulkis, continualie melting away, lyk ane quhit candill, the other half day birnand as in ane fyrie wne [ovin], and never recoverit, quhill he deit, of quhom thou was the murthrer." It would seem that "Johnet" had been long in practice as a witch, for one of the articles in her accusation says,—"Thir twentie years last bypast Thow continualie and nichtlie upoun the night, efter ellevin hours at ewin, quhill as thi hisband and servandis passis to thair bed and takis rest. Than thow puttis on nichtlie ane gryt fyre, haldis the same on the hail nicht, and sittis theraut thairself wsand thi witchcraft, altogidder contrairous to the natour of weill levand personis." A good fire, however, would have been an agreeable accompaniment to the following cantrip, of which she is also accused. "At Midsymmer was a yeir or thairby, Elspet Reid, thi dochter in law, com into thi hows at thrie hours in the morninge, and fand the sittand, mother nakit as thow was born, at the fyre syde, and ane wther suld wyiff sicklyk mother nakit sittand betuen thi scholders, makand your cantryps."

Since we can afford in our day to smile at these charms and cantrips, we may be allowed the pun that Janet would have been of some service in these times of monetary pinchings, for she could at any time "raise the wind." "Certain honest wemen within this burcht, with Andrew Raitt mariners wyif, com to the to by malt, to quhom thow ansuerit, that thow had nein windowit, bot desyrit tham to reman, and thei suld hef incontinent: Quha ansuerit the, that ther was na wind to window any malt, and thow said thow suld get wind enuch to do thi turnn. Immediatlie thairefter, thow tuk ane coill of fyre, and devydit it, the ane half thow pat in the ane dur, and the wther half in the wther, and said thi orisoun thereon; thairefter ther cam wind enuch in at thi duris, quhillas thair was neyn in the field." Some of the charges against poor Janet are extremely vague, and might have been brought against any other person with equal apparent justice. "Johne Leyis lyand ane nycht in his bed, ane catte come in vpon him, and cryit Wallawa! and wret ane of hir awin kitlingis; his wyf sittand putin on hir clothis. And the said Johne then slew the catt, and immediatly thairefter his hors ran wode and his dog." "The hail assvis (however) be the mouth of James Steuart, Chancellor of the said assvis, convicts her in auchtane points of the ditty of witchcraft, and as ane common witche and sorcerer: And the Justice ordainit hir to be brint to the deid." But the devil would not suffer the punishment of his faithful servant without giving some indications of his displeasure, for one of the accusations against Thomas Leys, Janet's son, who also stood his trial for witchcraft, is that "upon the sam day that wmqhile Janet Wischart, thi mother, abaid the law, in the morning befor scho was convict, thair com into thi fathers hows ane ewill spirit, in lyikness of ane pyit, strak thi youngest sister in hir face, wald hef plukkit owt hir ene, and destroyit hir, war not the nichtbouris in the gett, com in and dang that fowl spreit furth of the hows, and colossit baith durris and windows on hir."

Possessed of a good deal of cunning, as it afterwards turned out, and having withal a considerable smack of the poetical in him, the charges against, and confession of, Andro Man, a male witch, are a perfect treat in their way. "In the first, thow art accusit as ane manifest and notorious witche and sorcerer, in sa far as thow confessis and affermis thy self, that be the space of thriescoir yeris sensyne or thairby, the Devill, thy maister, com to thy motheris housis, in the likenes and scheap of a woman, quhom thow callis the Quene of Elphen, and was delyverit of a barne, as apperit to the their, at quhilk tyme thow being bot a young boy, bringand in watter, that devilische spreit, the Quene of Elphen, promesit to the, that thow suld knaw all thingis, and suld help and cuir all sort of seikness, except stand deid, and that thow suld be weill intertenit, but wald seik thy meat or thow deit, as Thomas Rymour did." "ITEM, Thow confessis that the Devill, thy maister, quhom thow termes Christsonday, and supponis to be ane engill, and Goddis godsone, albeit he hes a thraw by God, and swyis to the Quene of Elphen, is rasit be the speking of the word Benedicite, and is laid agane be tacking of a dog vnder thy left oxster in thi richt hand, and casting the same in his mouth, and speking the word Maikpeblis. And that Christsonday beatt a mark in the third fynger of thy richt hand, quhilk thow hes yit to schaw. Sicklyk, thow affirmis that the Quene of Elphen hes a grip of all the craft, bot Christsonday is the gudeman, and hes all power vnder God, and that thow kennis sindrie deid men in thair cumpanie, and that the kyng that deit in Flowdown and Thomas Rymour is their." The following confessions contain quite the poetry of witchcraft. "Thow confessis and affermis, thow saw Christsonday cum owt of the snaw in likenes of a staig, and that the Quene of Elphen was their, and vtheris with hir, rydand vpon quhit-haiknayses. . . . That the elphis hes schapes and claythis lyk men, and that thay will have fair coverit taiblis, and that they are bot schaddowis, bot are starker nor men, and that thay have playing and dansing quhen thay pleas; and als that the quene is verray pleassand, and wil be auld and young quhen scho pleissis. . . . Thow grantis the elphis will mak the apper to be in a fair chalmer, and yit thow will find thy self in a moss on the morne; and that they will apper to have candlis, and licht, and swordis, quhilk wil be nothing els bot deed gress and strayes." Were we not assured of the contrary, we would have looked upon the following as canonical, and certainly if it was "revellit be the Devill," there is a great deal of point added to Burns' wish,—

"But fare you weel, auld Nickie-ben!
Oh! wad ye tak a thought and men,
Ye aiblins might—I dinna ken—
Still hae a stake."

"Thow grantis and affirmis—that at the day of judgement, the fyre will burne the watter and the earth, and mak all plain, and that Christson-day wilbe cassin in the fyre because he dissavis wardlingis men. That at the day of Judgement Christsonday wilbe nottar, to accuse everie man, and ilk man will hawe his awin dittay, wretin in his awin buik to accuse him self, and als that the godlie wilbe schowred fra the wicked, quhilk was reveillit to the be the Devill thy maister."

Speaking of Burns reminds us that the musical propensities of his "Deil," who "danc'd awa' wi' the Exciseman," are quite in keeping with the records we are quoting from. The Thomas Leyis before spoken of is thus charged: "Upoun Hallowewin last bypast, att tuelff houris at ewin or thairby, thow the said Thomas Leyis, accompaneit withe vmquhill Jonett Wischert, Issobell Coky, Issobell Manteitho, Kathren Mitchell, relict of vmquhill Charles Dwn, litster, sorceraris and witches, withe ane gryit number of vtheris witches, come to the mercatt and fische croce of Aberdene, wnder the conduct and gyding of the Dewill present withe yow, all in company, playing befor yow on his kynd of instrumentis: Ye all dansit about baythe the saidis croces, and the meill mercatt, ane lang space of tyme." Jonat Lucas is accused "for being in companie and societie with thy maister the Deuill at ane dance, quhair thair was with the aucht vther personis, at ane gray stane at the fute of the Hill of Crag-leauche, quhair thow and thay was vnder the conduct of thy maister the Deuill, dancing in ane ring, and he playing melodiously vpon ane instrument, albeit invisible to yow."

But we must now pause, although we may again return to the same subject, which is an exceedingly prolific one. We cannot, however, close these irregular excerpts without in some measure congratulating ourselves that, although our age is far, far from having arrived at that pitch of wisdom we believe mankind capable of attaining, yet, in the words of Sir Walter Scott, "whatever follies the present race may be guilty of, the sense of humanity is too universally spread to permit them to think of tormenting wretches till they confess what is impossible, and then burning them for their pains." Let us strive more and more to deserve this character in its widest sense, carrying its spirit into all the ramifications of our social contract; not consigning, with too hasty judgement, the souls of our fellows, although more degraded than ourselves, to the spiritual stake, as our fathers did the bodies of their depraved or unfortunate fellows to the temporal one; but ever extending the circle of our thoughts, and ever expanding the measure of our sympathies, seek to unite ourselves to that noble band of the poet's "glorious city—so beautiful to see!" who "Never breathe a thought unkind

Against men of other mind,

But know that God Eternal
Will shower all blessings free
On hearts that live to love Him,
And cling to Charity."

C.

ANCIENT IMPORTANCE OF THURSO.

SCARABSTER ROADS, in the vicinity of this town, being the only safe anchorage on the coast of Caithness, occasioned Thurso to become a place of much resort at a very early period. The roadstead was frequented by the Norwegian and Danish pirates, from the time that these marauders first made their appearance on our shores; and the town must have often suffered from their attacks.

Torfæus, in his History of Orkney, mentions, that, in the beginning of the 11th century, Count Moddan, one of the Earls of Orkney, quartered his army at Thurso, "the town of Caithness," and harrassed the inhabitants greatly, by plundering the country all around him. Count Moddan had his camp on the promontory of Thurso, "promontorio Thorsnesia," the ancient "Tarvedum promontarium," now known as Holburnhead, where the remains of the wall which fortified the camp, running along a hollow, extending to the whole breadth of the head, or promontory, are still to be seen. During the time that Count Moddan was enjoying himself at Thurso, Earl Thorfin of Orkney, his rival for the earldom, commanded his friend Thorkel to sail for Caithness, to check and punish the disorders of Moddan, "which he did without delay; and having marched through it with much speed and secrecy, he reached Thurso before the enemy was aware of his approach; surprised the Count in the dead of night, by setting fire to his lodgings; and while he was endeavouring to escape from them, his head was struck off; and his army, thrown into consternation, were either cut to pieces, surrendered themselves prisoners of war, or fled for safety to the inaccessible fens or mountains." From Barry we further learn, that, soon after the death of Moddan, a number of Scots, on their return to the south from Orkney, who had suffered a shameful defeat at Deerness, and, wishing to retrieve their honour, returned to Caithness in full force. Here they were joined by troops from Ireland, that had been sent, though too late, to reinforce the army of Moddan; and these, when united, far exceeded in number any army that Earl Thorfin could bring into the field against them. But, notwithstanding their superiority, he was neither of a temper to permit them to ravage his country with impunity, nor was it either his inclination or his practice to decline their offers of an engagement. The two hostile armies therefore prepared for action. They met in battle array on a rising ground near to, and in full view of the harbour and town of Thurso. The place is known to this day by the name of "the Bleedy Moss." "The Earl of Orkney took his station in the front line, with a gilded helmet on his head, a sword by his side, and a large spear in both hands, with which he did great execution; and, in the very first onset, bent his whole force, with such intrepid ardour, against the Irish, that he compelled them to fall back, and so entirely broke their ranks, that it was not afterwards in the power of their commander to rally them. The same valour and masterly conduct were displayed by the brave general of the Scottish forces. He also fought in the front of his army, in the hottest of the battle, inspiring courage by his example, relieving them that were overpowered, and directed his attacks principally against that part of the line of the enemy which was distinguished by the Earl's presence. In this manner both sides fought for some time, with almost equal bravery and equal success; till the Earl, by a desperate attack, made the Scots waver between hope and despair, then sensibly retreat, and at last fly, leaving the field of battle strewed with the wounded and the slain."

While the earls of Orkney possessed the northern parts of Scotland, they occasionally resided at the Castle of Thurso, "Castrum de Thorsa," afterwards called the Castle of Ormelie, built on a rising ground, termed the Brown Hill, about 300 yards from the old town; but their principal residence was at Kirkwall. This castle is said to have been a very strong building, but no vestige of it is now extant. Thurso was at this time also the stated residence of the nobility and the wealthier classes of the county. Barry informs us, that Harold's mother, Helga, was a daughter of Maddan, a man of great wealth and influence in Caithness, whose son was Count Ottar of Thurso. In 1150, the King of Norway paid a visit to Thurso. In this year, Earl Ronald departed for Constantinople and the Holy Land, leaving his affairs to the care of Earl Harold, his partner in the earldom, then only aged 20 years; the King of Norway, trusting to the absence of the one, and the youth and inexperience of the other, resolved to establish or renew his sovereignty in the Orkney Islands. For this end he arrived in South Ronaldshy, with a number of troops on board a formidable fleet: and as soon as he learned that Harold, in the absence of his relative, had gone over to Caithness, he made all the despatch in his power to cross the firth; first captured his ship in Scrabster Roads, and then seized him in the town of Thurso, while he was under no apprehension of danger, and compelled him to pay seven merks of gold; and publicly to acknowledge, that he held at present, and would in future hold, the earldom of the crown of Norway.

Erland, the son of Harold the Orator, after the death of Count Ottar, lived for the most part at Thurso. According to the custom of those times, he was frequently employed in predatory expeditions, and often returned to Thurso with abundance of spoil from the Western Isles, &c. This same Erland, two years after the invasion of the King of Norway, forced young Harold to yield up the half of his possessions to him. Several other noted marauders had also their residence in Thurso about the same date.

These occurrences took place during the 11th and 12th centuries, but how long prior to that date, Thurso became a place of such resort, cannot now be ascertained with any degree of probability. That Thurso was then a place of such importance is not to be wondered at; for this town was the great mart for trade between Scotland and Norway, Sweden, and the powers of the Baltic for a long time. In consequence of Caithness being distinguished for the extent of its commercial transactions, of which Thurso was the centre, we find by statutes of King David of Scotland, that the weights and measures of Caithness were the standard for Scotland. By the "Regiam Majestatem," chap. 14,—"It is statued be King David, that ane comon and equal weicht, quhilk is called the weicht of Cathness—pondus Cathanie—in buying and selling, sall be keeped and vsed be all men within this realm of Scotland."—Caithness Chronicle.

DISTEMPER AMONGST CATTLE A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

A distemper, similar in some respects to the epidemic which has prevailed for these last few years, committed great ravages amongst cattle in England, and indeed throughout Europe, about the middle of last century. It continued from 1740 till 1746, spreading consternation and dismay wherever it visited. In "the Foreign History for December" of The Scots Magazine, 1745, it is said that "the 14th of January 1746, has been appointed a day of publick fasting and prayer, to be observed all over Denmark, on account of the mortality which rages and spreads among the cattle thro' that kingdom. It is reckoned to have carried off no less than 60,000 before the middle of December. It advances likewise in Jutland; and the apprehensions of it engages most people to kill their cattle while they are sound." The disease was equally fatal in Holland, France, and Italy. In England it seems to have been at its height in 1745-6. In September of the latter year, the London newspapers assert, that "in Essex alone upwards of 4000 cattle died of it [the distemper] before the 1st of June last." Such was the alarming character of the disease, that the Privy Council deemed it necessary to interfere, with the view of mitigating the calamity. They accordingly appointed a body of gentlemen specially to inquire into the nature of the complaint in Middlesex, and adopt such measures as they considered best calculated to promote the end desired. This body met at stated periods, and amongst their first proceedings was to elect a certain number of persons, practically acquainted with cattle—butchers and cow-keepers—who were instructed as follows:—

"You are to view from time to time, and to take care of all the sick cows within your districts, and frequently inspect the cow-houses, and observe if the farmers and cow-keepers separate the sick from the sound cows, in such manner as is necessary to prevent infection; as also, if they keep their cow-houses and yards clean, and take away the dung and filth as often as is needful.

"You are to kill all cows and calves as soon as they fall sick, and cause them to be buried as quick as possible. The early destroying of them being found by experience to be the most effectual method to stop the distemper.

"You are to take care that the hides of all the cows to be buried be cut and slashed in several places, particularly from head to tail, on both sides, and round the middle of their bodies; as also, that the cows be buried with unslaked lime, allowing after the rate of two bushels to each cow, for which lime we shall allow after the rate of 9s. a hundred, and 1s. more for each cow the farmers or cow-keepers shall bury as by us directed.

"You are to take special care that the cows be buried ten feet deep : and where that is impossible by reason of springs, that they be buried as deep as may be.

"You are to give the farmer and cow-keeper notice, as soon as the distemper comes into any of their herds, to dig pits in readiness, and lay in a stock of lime to be ready when wanted, that no time may be lost in burying the cows ; for which lime they shall be paid as it is used.

"You are to acquaint them, that the allowance above-mentioned will only be made to them for their charge of digging pits, provided they dig them in time, and as deep as we require, but not otherwise : and that herein we shall be very strict.

"You are also to observe whether they cover their cows when buried, and fill up the pits in due time, ramming the earth so well, that there be no annoyance to neighbours, or danger of infection.

"If any farmer or cow-keeper refuses on your demand to kill and bury any of his sick cows, or to let you kill and bury them for him, in hopes they may recover, or on any other pretence, you are to acquaint him, that we shall not think ourselves obliged to allow him 40s. a cow for them, as we do others ; the chief end of giving that allowance being to command the cows to be killed as soon as they fall sick ; which is their interest also, as it tends to preserve the rest of their herd.

"You are to inquire and observe from time to time how their stock increases or decreases, and whether they buy in any fresh cows or calves, or sell any of their present stock ; we having strictly forbid their doing of either.

"You are to inform us of any fraud that may be put upon the government by any farmer or cow keeper, or any other person whatsoever, or any practice tending thereto.

"You are to give notice to the farmers and cow-keepers, and likewise to take care yourself, that no cows be buried within any common, waste, or road, (except in Tothill Fields, there being no other place near to bury them in), without particular orders.

"You are to take all opportunities from time to time to give us or our Secretary an account of your proceedings, and receive our farther directions.

"The said gentlemen do hereby give notice to all farmers and cow-keepers in the said county of Middlesex, that they follow the above instructions, and also suffer the said surveyors to do their duty as above-directed ; and those who refuse or neglect so to do, will not be intitled to any allowance for the loss of any of their cows and calves."

The introduction to a "Journal by a gentleman in Essex," thus describes the nature of the disease:—

"The distemper with which the black cattle are at present afflicted, seems to be a violent inflammatory fever, occasioned by feeding principally on grass, which, this year, from the wetness of the season, has been more juicy than common : and as they had, for the want of grass in the three or four preceding years, been fed more than usual with dry food, it has chilled their blood, and consequently subjected them to colds, fevers, &c., which is confirmed by the distemper's having, in all the countries, begun in the marshy low grounds, while the dry and hilly continued healthy.

"To remedy this evil, the following authentick journal, which a gentleman in Essex kept, of seven cows, is made publick.

"October 20, 1745.—Late in the evening four of my cows were taken with the distemper, which has been so fatal to black cattle in Holland, and is at present in England, particularly in Essex, Bedfordshire, Kent, and Surrey, to such a degree, that few of the farmers have saved one in five of the cattle that have been taken ; but most have lost their whole.

"21. I sent for a cowleech ; who gave them a drink, which he pretended was a great secret. He bled them plentifully in the tail, and rowelled or coaxed them in the dewlap, by my order.

"Half an hour after the drink, I gave one ounce of salt-petre, dissolved in Spa water, to each cow ; which dose I repeated twice more this day, observing to be about five hours between each dose.

"The cows refused their food ; but, to prevent them from starving, I boiled about three quarters of a peck of oats in as much water as a cow may be thought to drink in one day ; which quantity, at sundry times in the twenty-four hours, I gave to each cow, in a horn, water and all, and a malt-mash of a quarter of a peck of malt. I also gave each cow two quarts of sugar-sops, wherein much cinnamon was boiled, viz. one quart about noon, and the other in the evening.

"I kept them in the house, warm littered, and kept milking what little they had, and threw it upon the dunghill. A man and a boy sat up all night with them.

"22. They were very bad, coughed much, run at the eyes, and breathed very quick. I repeated the same medicines, and took the same care ; but they fell away surprisingly. A man and a boy still sat up to nurse them.

"23. They were somewhat better. I repeated the same, in every particular.

"24. They were much mended, and began to eat a little hay. I now left off the saltpetre and the drink, but continued the oats and sugar-sops.

"25. They were so much better, that I ventured to drive them to some good grass, about a stone's cast from the cow-house ; where they continued picking about an hour ; during which time a boy was constantly with them, to prevent them from lying down on the wet grass, which I apprehended would kill them. This day the boy drove one of them into the pond, where she drank eight godowns. At night I thought she would have died, but is since likely to recover.

"26, and 27. These days I continued to take care of them, without giving any medicines, but gave them boiled oats, good hay, and sugar-sops, which they would eat very heartily. I have all reason to believe they will do very well.

"I had three more taken on the 21st, which were indeed very bad ; but I think we discovered their illness a day, at least, sooner than we did the first cows ; so that, by early application of regadies, they have recovered their strength and appetites better than those first taken.

"I know the cowleech used one quart of wood-foot to each drink, with sundry bitter herbs, such as red sage, wormwood, rue, smallage, which were boiled in ale, with half a pound of hog's lard.

"N.B. I believe sperma ceti much better."

This mode of treatment may seem rather refined and expensive for animals.

A society of physicians also met weekly at "the White Lion, in Cornhill," London, and "undertook to point out to the farmers, &c. the most likely methods they knew to put a stop to the present reigning disease amongst cattle;" but they discontinued their meetings when the subject was taken up by the Privy Council. The medicines recommended were the following:—

"Take saltpetre, four ounces; camphire, half an ounce; liquorice powder, six ounces; and honey, sufficient quantity to make them into a ball: let this be divided into four equal parts; one whereof may be given, dissolved in a quart of the liquor above-described, warm, every six hours.

These were to be given from the first seizure, at least as soon as the distemper was discovered, and to be continued the two first days. The following was then to be used in its stead, viz. Take Peruvian bark, six ounces; Virginia snake root, six ounces, both in powder: mix and divide them into four equal parts; one of which may be given every morning and night, and to a strong beast at noon also, in a pint and a-half of warm beer.

Tho' it would appear more rational to direct the change of medicines, rather from the alteration of symptoms than length of time, yet we soon learned how difficult it was to have either minute or discretionary orders exactly complied with.

We urged the necessity of keeping the diseased cattle within doors, and even in as warm houses as possible, frequently steaming them with vinegar, gently poured on hot irons; that they should have warm liquids, such as water gruel, barley-meat boiled in water, and very thin mashies, given them in plenty, at least every two hours; as the disorder abates, their gruel, mashies, &c. may be made thicker and more nourishing.

During the two, three, or four first days of the disorder, according as the first attack is more or less violent, we have reason to believe, that these methods, if practised with diligence and attention, will save a great many cattle; and we think this trial may be the more safely admitted, as it appears from the analogy of other infectious disorders, that the taint is much less powerful, if at all productive of mischief, till the disease is considerably advanced, and the seminal infection is ripened to proportion.

Since our first directions were given out, we have apprehended, that if the rattle-snake root was substituted in the room of the Virginia, and joined with the bark in the following manner, the prospect of success would still be the greater.

At their first seizure, take away about a quart of blood, (the loss whereof will not here be prejudicial, the remedy supplying the strength which would be diminished by it); then give a dose of the following powder in a quart of the honey-liquor above-described, every morning, noon, and night, viz. Take three ounces of Peruvian bark; an ounce of rattle-snake root, both in powder; mix and divide them into three equal doses."

We find no notice, in the public journals of this period, of the distemper having visited Scotland. It is a current tradition, however, that a devastating malady did prevail both amongst men and cattle. An old man, aged ninety, a native of Ballantrae, in Ayrshire, says, that "from 1740 till 1745, there could be no rent given for land, because the Lord sent a plague in the kingdom. The cattle died of disease. No man would buy a beast, and a great famine took place. The wet seasons threw up a bad weed in the crop, called the doite. It sickened the people, and made them as if they were drunk. At that time the farm of Garfar lay five years waste, without a tenant. The farm of Balkissock was only a hair tether; for it was a great fashion to tether horses. At that time, the rental of the whole estate of Bargany did not exceed 1000 merks, when kirk and king were paid."

BROTCHES OF ROBERT THE BRUCE.

ALL have heard of the Broche of Lorn, said to have been taken from the Bruce at the battle of Dal-Righ, when the King, according to Barbour, was assailed by the two "Mac-andorusers," and a third who, leaping on the croup of the King's horse, grappled with him from behind. One of the assailants in front had been cleft through the arm and shoulder before he reached the King; the other clung to his leg and stirrup. Turning round in his saddle, the King seized the enemy at his back, and, wrenching him round before him, struck him to the brains with his sword; and dealing a second blow at him whom he dragged at his stirrup, laid him dead behind him, and broke away to his retreating men. Barbour states that the King lost the broche which fastened his plaid on the occasion; and the Broche of Lorn is said to have been the one torn away. It was long preserved at Dunolly, the seat of that Lordship, but disappeared in the seventeenth century, when the castle was burned by the MacNoils, assisted by the Campbells of Bar-Gleann. It was believed in the country to have been carried off by the latter while the former were either seeking or ransacking the charter chest. The Bar-Gleann family, however, overawed by the immediate neighbourhood of their powerful enemies, never displayed the broche, or boasted of its possession; but having latterly fallen into decay, they are reported to have sold it no longer ago than the year 1822, soon after which it is said to have been accidentally observed by General Campbell of Lochnell, in the window of a jeweller in London. The General, a near neighbour to MacDougall, recognizing, if not the Broche of Lorn, which he never saw, a very curious and ancient Highland relic, entered the shop and inquired its history, when he was told it was "the lost Broche of Lorn," and, with very generous feeling, immediately purchased the valuable relic, and presented it to its hereditary owner.

Whether the original Broche of Lorn was really that which tradition declared was torn from the breast of Robert the Bruce, is very uncertain. According to the belief of Perthshire, it fell to the possession of the MacNabs, having been taken at the battle of Dal-Righ by Angus Mör, their chief, in whose family it was preserved at Kinnel, until the great civil war, when the clan Nab, remaining loyal, was plundered and burned by the Campbells of Glenlyon, from whom, by the marriage of the heiress of the latter house with Garden of Troop, it passed into that family, with whom it is still preserved.

If it was uncertain whether the original Broche of Lorn was truly that rent from the illustrious Bruce, it is something doubtful if that which now bears its name is the hereditary family jewel, for there were several of the same kind in the country. One exactly similar, but larger and finer, had been the hereditary broche of Loch-Bui, but having passed out of the family, has not been known to exist since the year 1774, when it was in the possession of Professor Lort, of the Greek class at Cambridge. Another very ancient and beautiful brooch has been preserved in the family of the MacKays, now MacNeils, of Ugadell, and is said by tradition to have been given to the maternal ancestor of that house by Robert the Bruce. "When the King fled from Arran to Rachrine, he was in such extremity that he escaped into Kintyre in a very small boat, with only two men, by whom he was brought across the Sound of Kilbrenan from Loch Ranza to Ugadell. It was late in the evening; Ferquhard Mackay, then the possessor of the farm, was sitting upon the 'Clach-an-Eorna,' or barley-stone, at the end of the house, and when he saw the skiff approach the little rocky point which juts from the small landing creek beneath the farm, he descended to the beach to offer hospitality to the strangers. Before he reached the shore, however, the boatmen had already put off, and the Bruce walked forward alone, and received the kindly invitation of MacKay. As they proceeded up the brae, though simply dressed, the powerful stature and majestic appearance of the future monarch attracted the admiration and curiosity of his host; but, as the rules of Highland courtesy did not permit any inquiry concerning the name of a guest, he made no questions, but provided the noble stranger with the best food and lodging which he had to offer. During the evening, the Bruce expressed his intention to cross the peninsula the next morning, to take boat upon the opposite shore. His host having engaged to direct him to the most proper place, at an early hour on the next day set out to guide him through the hills. Having come in sight of the sea, MacKay stopped and pointed out his last instructions to his guest. The place where they separated was on the farm of Ardnakill, near a large standing stone, which still remains erect, and is known by the name of "Clach-Mhich-Dhaidh"—MacKay's stone. From this spot the gudeman pointed out his route to the Bruce, and, at parting, the King, taking the brooch from his mantle, presented it to his host, and, pursuing his way, obtained a boat in Mac-righ-Hanish Bay, and passed over in safety into Rachrine. After his elevation to the throne, 'the good King Robert' repaid the hospitality of his host by a grant of the lands of Ugadell and Ardnakill, to be held of the Crown by the tenure of entertaining the king when he should visit Kintyre. For many years after the year 1745, the brooch had disappeared in the family, and was supposed to have been lost; but, when the present proprietor pulled down the old house of Losset for the purpose of building the present residence, as the workmen were employed in taking off the wainscoat in one of the upper rooms, a heavy object fell from behind a panel among the rubbish. The wright, supposing it to be a piece of stone or mortar, continued his work without notice; but, when he left work, observing some object glitter on the floor, he discovered the brooch, which, being richly gilt, was little tarnished by time and damp. It is supposed that it had been concealed behind the wainscoat in the year 1746, during the alarm excited by the outrages and rapine of the troops and cruisers, especially the "notorious barbarian," Captain Caroline Scott, who commanded the Furnace sloop of war.—Tales of the Century.

A FEW NOTES FROM THE SESSION-BOOK OF AYR,

DURING THE PROTECTORATE.

AYR was one of the towns garrisoned by the troops of the Commonwealth. If we may judge from the session records they were no army of saints, although they were designated Puritans. They are first mentioned in the records in 1651. The principal crimes charged against them are Sabbath-breaking and immoral conduct. There are some instances of Scotsmen serving in the Cromwellian ranks, and several of the Englishmen becoming Presbyterians.

1652.

Agnes Murdoch, her two daughters, and other women, were drinking and dancing in her house to the music of a piper and fiddler, with some English soldiers. The fiddler fell down from "the falling sickness," and she having "singed the place where he fell with fire,"—the belief being that the "falling sickness" was contagious, and that fire would prevent infection,—the Englishmen conceived it an affront upon their countrymen, and threatened to set fire to the house.

Amongst numerous other cases of a similar nature, Janet Frissell compeared before the session, and admitted being with child to "James Wad, Englishman, a smyth, and a trooper in Colonel Halket's regiment."

"Marion Stewart caled, compered and acknowledged, after yat scho was accused, her sinne of fornication wt. ane Andrew Woodhill, who was souldier wt. ye Englishmen, but now is gone away, who was borne in Paysley. His mother's name is Malie Wat, and that they fell togadder about ye first of Sept. 1652: for tryal if he be a free man or not was delayed till the next day."

Mathew Arkinsone, one of Cromwell's soldiers, appeared before the session, and declared that he was reduced, and put out of the English service, and wanted to be married to Janet Bell, which the session agreed to, upon condition that he would swear to, and subscribe the Covenant.

It would appear that Flemings came to Ayr with deals this year.

One of Cromwell's soldiers was scourged through the streets for adultery.

"Luik Browne, Englishman, having laid down his arms and taken the Covenant before the session, has the benefit of Presbyterianism granted to him of proclamation."

The last minute in which the English soldiers are mentioned is in January 1661—a considerable time after the Restoration. Several of them settled in Ayr, and became respectable and wealthy burgesses.

LETTER OF LORD HALYRUDHOUSE TO K. JAMES VI. 25 Aug. 1607.

[John, second Lord Holyroodhouse, was served heir to his father, 17th January 1629, and died unmarried in 1635. His father, the first Lord, was the eldest son of Adam Bothwell, Bishop of Orkney, who married Queen Mary to the Earl of Bothwell. The title was granted, 20th December 1607, to the patentee and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, the heirs-male of Adam Bishop of Orkney; whom failing, to his (the patentee's) heirs and assigns whatsoever. It is remarkable, with a substitution of heirs to the peerage so very ample, that the title should have remained unclaimed so long. In 1734, (8th February) Henry Bothwell of Glencorse, descended from the third son of the Bishop, presented a petition to George II., claiming the barony, which was referred, by command of his Majesty, to the House of Peers; but no decision was ever come to in relation to it. In this petition he styled himself Henry Lord Holyroodhouse.

The Glencorse branch terminated in an heir female, Margaret, who died at Bristol, 1st April 1792, leaving issue by her husband, John Drummond, M.D. From the conception of the patent, an heir-female is not in a situation to take, until the extinction of the heirs-male of Bishop Adam; and, as in the Annandale claim the House of Peers decided that "heirs-male" mean "heirs male whatsoever," it is plain that until all the male Bothwells, however remotely connected with the Bishop, are extinguished, no claim can be maintained with any chance of success by the heir of line.]

THE RAID OF WESTER-KAMES(1).

The King Robert fairit(2) to Buit,—a rae(3)-hunting gane,

And the haws of winsum Rosa war gay;
The fair ladie at nicht dancit wi lord and wi thane,
And the tournaments elyit the day.

The King Robert(4) at Rosa he keipit his yule,
Wi his courtiers and wi ladies gay:
In suith, nae bodie leukit for skaith or for dule
Frae uncannie freind, or a faithless fae.

The clarschaw(5) souch, (6) lyke halie saums in heav'nlie haws,

And the nobles daffit(7) wi ladies bricht;
The ill-e't(8) warder playit the trewan on the waws(9),
He tint his horn, and he birlit aw nicht.

The Slee Spensar(10) he cam in the King's Hienes' sicht,
And he leutit doun laich on his knee,—
Wad ye grant me the nest quhilk was herreit last nicht,
For the orra tydings I sall fetch to thee?

Fy, cum, tell me thy news, be thay weill, be thay wae,
And let naething be hidden frae me;
And the nest that was herreit yestrein thou sall hae;
The cuddeich(11) for thy tydings sall ba.

O the louns of Argyll cam to lown Wester-kames,
Wi the help of the mirk clud o' nicht;
But the mune it rase red on the castle of Kames;
And it neir saw a merrier sight.

In a blink the leil Laird thay hae tane frae his bed,
And hae set him on a tour sae hie;
His three bauld sons thay hae, waes-my-hart! furthwith led,

And thay yokit ilka ane to a tree.

How! halloo! for my clansmen, I wiss for my horn!
For to blow a loud blast and a schill!(12)
But the horn was missand,(13) and its lang till the morn;
And nae clansman compeirit upon the hill.

But the first of his sons thay hae hung fra a tree,
As, I wat weill, afore the Baron's face;
And the neist thay hae lair't(14) in a deip, deip wallee:(15)
Yet the mune nevir stammerit in her race.

And the thrid thay hae bled at the airms and the neck,
And the strands of the blude thay did meit;
And, at tymes, when he swarfit,(16) the gude laird thay
wad geck;

And the lapperit(17) blude they bauld him to eit.

And at lenth the Baron thay hae hung be the feit,
Owre the fyre frae his ain rattle-tree;(18)
And the ingle thay hae kendit wi ryce and wi peits;
And thay leuch whan thay saw him to die.

The louns of Argyll cam to lee(19) Wester-kames,
Wi the aid of the mirk clud of nicht;
And the mune it rase red on the castill of Kames,
And it nevir saw a dulefuar sight.

Och! hyte wax't our leige Lord when he hard the fell tale,

Sayand a bluidie nicht's wark has bein heir;
But foul fa' the rubyatours (20) of fause, fause Argyll;
Now this raid it sall cost thaim richt deir.

Threttie masses, quo he, sing in Sanct Calmack's (21) Kirk,

For the sowl of the leifu Laird his lane;
And in halie Sanct Michals (22) ilka nicht when mirk,
Gar say trentall (23) for his sons ilka ane.

Formerrie (24) Wester-kames was a stark stalwart knight;
And ay bound (25) at the time of remeid: (26)
And seinill (27) does a king spare so suartheie a wicht;
Sair, said he, may we rew his waefu deid.

But paukie auld Spensar, for paukie thou's bein,
For thy greid I bute (28) ettle to sloken;
I hecht thee the nest that was herreit the strein;
And a King's word it maun-na be broken.

The hail lands and baronrie wi Tour of Wester-kames
I despone unto thee and thy airs-male,
Let the service aye be that when I cum to Kames
Thou sall tell me ane unco and bluidie tale.

Sae the Spenses (29) thay bruikeit (30) the baronrie leil
For countless yeirs of feuds and fause weir (31);
And defendit the Tour frae the louns of Argyll,
Wi the flane (32), the claymore and the speir.

Now owr a' the seifu (33) isle of Buit thay are ryfe
The Spenses of this stock and sam lyne;
But the telling of stories of blude and of stryfe,
Is a slicht thay hae tint, throw, langsyne.

A. C.

1 The Tower or the Fortalice of Wester-kames, a square building, of very small dimensions, long since unroofed, stands about three miles from Rothesay, on the Bay of Kames. The substance of this Ballad was obtained, in 1818, from an old man who sprang of the House of Wester-kames.

2 "To fair," to travell, to go, to journey.

3 "A rae," a roe, a deer, a hart.

4 Robert III., King of Scots, spent the winters of 1392 and 1400, at Rothesay; which should be pronounced "Rosa."

5 The Lowland Harp was anciently strung with horse-hair, or gut; and the Highland and Irish "clars," or "clarschaw," with wire.—Ninian Bannachtyne of Easter-Camys, 7th March, 1490, had an action about some "geir takin fra him, to wit, ane pailyon, ane brew caldron, ane masking fat, ane clarschaw, ane certane stuff and insicht plenishing, pertaining to him."

6 "Souch" is the sound of wind amongst trees.

7 "To daff," to sport, to make merry.

8 "Ill-c'et," fascinated, bewitched, by the influence of an "ill-ee."

9 He was bewitched by the Argyle-men who made the Raid.

10 The "Spens" or "Spence" was the place where provisions were kept. The "Spensar," or "Spencer," was the clerk of the kitchen. One M'Donald, by tradition, had that office then in the Royal Household.

11 "Cuddeich," a reward, a gift.

12 "Schill," (pronounced shill,) shrill, piercing, clear.

13 "Missand," missing: participle present of the verb "to miss."

14 "To lair," to sink, to plunge into mire.

15 A "wallee," a quagmire, a shaking marsh.

16 "To swarf," to faint, to swoon. The regular termination of the preterite is "it," in Scots, as "ed," in English.

17 "Lapper't," coagulated, curdled.

18 "A rattle-tree," the cross beam of a chimney for cooking.

19 "Lee, lie," sheltered, warm, peaceful.

20 "Rubyatour," a robber, a murderer, a debauchee, a libertine.

21 A chapel dedicated to St. Calmack, or Malcolm, was situated about a mile to the westward of Kames-Castle. There is not a vestige of it now remaining. In the kirkyard there is a standing stone, with an ornamental cross cut upon it. In this cemetery a massive twisted gold ring, and a golden Lion of James II., King of Scots, were found, in 1813.

22 The ruins of St. Michael's Chapel are to be seen still at Kirkmichael, near the north-west corner of the island. The kirkyard of it is used still for the burial of such "gangrel bodies" and "tinklers," as happen to die in the neighbourhood.

23 "Trentall" was a service for the dead which lasted thirty days, or consisted of thirty masses.

24 "Merrie," faithful, loyal, true to his sovereign.

25 "Bound," ready, prepared.

26 "Remeid," remedy, amends, recompense.

27 "Seinill, seindill," seldom, rare.

28 "Bute," behaved, be fit.

29 M'Donald, the steward of the King's kitchen, with a good deal of cunning, presented himself before his Royal Master, and asked a boon for his new year's gift, it being about that season. The King "speired" at the Master of the "skodges" what he wished to have. He modestly demanded the first thing that should fall unexpectedly into his Majesty's hands. The King promised accordingly; and soon after he was told of the slaughter of Wester-kames and his sons, and consequent relapse of the estate to the Crown. The King granted the lands to his lucky Spensar; who changed his name from M'Donald to Spens. The former laird and his sons who were murdered were called M'Kinlays. So far the legend says. There were two lairds of this name in the island of Bute in 1506, viz., Donald Spens of West-Kaym, and John Spens of Stouk.

Ninian Spens of Wester-kames was fined in 1200 lib. Scots by the Scots Parliament, in 1662, for air and pairt with Oliver Cromwell in his usurpation of the government.

The lands of Wester-kames were swallowed up by the neighbouring estate of Easter-kames, before the Union of the Crowns, in 1707.

The small square tower in question, now a ruin, is about a quarter of a mile northward of the other Castle, which is inhabited still under the name of Kames Castle.

30 "Bruikit," enjoyed, possessed.

31 "Weir," war, conflict, feud.

32 "Flane," an arrow.

33 "Seifu," happy, pleasant.

ENGLISH TRADITION—MAGNA CHARTA.—A custom has prevailed for some hundreds of years in Congleton, for a party of sweeps to perambulate the town at midnight, on the wake Sunday, with a number of bells of various sizes, fastened to broad leathern bands suspended over their shoulders, and ring them through the streets. The custom, it is believed, had its origin in no less an event than the signing of MAGNA CHARTA, which took place on the 19th of June A. D. 1215; and it is in remembrance of an old inhabitant "that when the parties were out with the bells, they used to cry uphold the Charter."—The Bells were originally purchased by the Corporation, and in searching the records of bygone ages, it is found that a Resolution was passed by that body whereby the Stubbs family were appointed to ring the bells on the anniversaries. The bells have always remained in the Stubbs family, and been handed down from father to son in an unbroken line for upwards of 600 years, and there is yet no probability of the race becoming extinct. Whether arising from a want of due appreciation of the glorious era in English history, which it was intended to commemorate, or from the economic habits of the age, or from old age or infirmity, the present representative of the old and privileged family has resolved to resign his prerogative, and his sons refuse to succeed him. He is also, it is said, anxious to sell the bells, and is actually looking out for a customer. Surely such relics of antiquity will not be subjected to such desecration!—MACCLESFIELD COURIER.

"THE HAUGHS OF CROMDALE."

THE celebrated strathspey, known by the above designation, is as familiar to Scotchmen, in all parts of the world, as "Tullochgorum" itself. The battle which this stirring piece of native music commemorates, was fought on a secluded plain lying at the foot of Cromdale Hill, in Strathspey. No "sacred trophy" has been raised to the memory of the brave who "sunk to rest" on this lonely spot, and it is almost unknown beyond the parish in which it is situated. Here it was that, on the 1st of May 1690, the poor Highlanders, under Major-General Buchan, were defeated by the royal forces, commanded by Sir Thomas Livingstone. After the death of Viscount Dundee, at Killiecrankie, the previous year, the cause of James II. declined rapidly, but active measures were adopted to renew hostilities. General Buchan was sent with a force of 1500 Highlanders to plunder and lay waste the low country; and in passing through the lower parts of Strathspey his men committed such serious depredations that it was resolved to send Sir Thomas Livingstone, who was then lying at Inverness, with a powerful force of cavalry and infantry, to check the progress of the marauders. Buchan, on hearing this, returned to the Highlands, arriving at Cromdale on the 30th of April—the day before the battle. He pitched his camp on the farm of Lethindrie, near the old castle of that name; and not far from the scene of his defeat. On the same day, Livingstone arrived within a short distance of Castle Grant, the residence of the Laird of Grant, who was favourably disposed towards the Government; and, shortly after day-break, on the following morning, his troops were conducted to an eminence above the farm of Lagg, where they obtained a view of the enemy's camp, on the other side of the Spey. The poor Highlanders slumbered in fancied safety, little deeming that the opposing army was so near; and with the design of taking them by surprise, Livingstone led his men through the quiet valley of Auchinarrow towards the river Spey, below Dellachapple. Finding the ford at this place guarded by a company of Buchan's force, he proceeded to another, a mile distant, which he crossed with some dragoons and a company of his Highlanders. By this time an alarm had spread in the enemy's camp, and Buchan's men were moving in disorder towards the hills. Livingstone, observing this, dashed after them with the dragoons and his advanced guard of Highlanders, who, it is said, outran their companions on horseback. The fugitives were almost naked—the suddenness of the surprise having left little time for dressing. On reaching the foot of the hill, they turned round upon their pursuers, and defended themselves bravely with their broadswords and targets until the remainder of Livingstone's army came up, when they again fled, making occasional stands, and fighting desperately. A thick fog on the hills enabled them at last to get clear of their triumphant enemies. Some accounts state that Buchan had 400 men killed and taken prisoners. Another account estimates his loss at 100 killed and 60 prisoners. Livingstone's loss is said to have been nearly as great; although it is recorded also that he had only a few horses killed, and not a single man of his whole force. Upon this last statement, however, little reliance can be placed. The retreating Highlanders must have wielded their broadswords with better effect. It may easily be conceived with what dismay the partizans of King James received the news of the disaster at Cromdale, occurring after the success of the Highland army at Killiecrankie, only a few months before.

Apart from the feelings which must arise in a reflective mind on beholding the spot where so many brave fellows perished, the walk from the village of Grantown to the scene of the engagement is of itself sufficiently interesting. The distance may be about five miles, the first of which conducts the traveller through a wood, from which he emerges on a sudden, and finds the Spey rolling its ample waters at his feet, half-screened by a row of alder-trees. On the opposite side, sloping towards the river, are the fertile fields of Revack and Auchnagonaln, sheltered by the wooded height of Craigrevack from the blasts that sweep over Cairngorm, which is seen, far in the back-ground, rising proudly "in all the pomp of mountain majesty." Proceeding onwards the river is crossed by an old military bridge of three arches. The largest has a span of eighty-six feet, and through it the whole body of water finds a passage, unless when the river is in flood. The smallest arch, the span of which is only twenty feet, was demolished by the memorable flood of August 1829; and a rent is still visible in the middle arch. After passing Congash the country expands, and the view is extended. On the right is the Cromdale ridge of hills, separating the parish from Kirk-michael; and on the left, about two miles distant, Castle Grant, the splendid mansion of the Grant family, is seen rising amidst dense forests, which cover several thousand acres. Some years ago, large sums were expended in repairing and improving this ancient residence, without, however, altering or defacing its antique and imposing appearance. Its fine old armoury—its rich and extensive library, abounding in rare works—its numerous paintings, many of them by the old masters—and its magnificent dining-room, 47 by 27 feet, hung round with old family portraits,—all betoken the abode of a nobleman sprung from a long line of ancestors. A little farther down, the parish church and the manse, with the wooded hill of Tomanour, rising boldly from the south bank of the Spey, are sure to attract observation. In the churchyard are two beech-trees of great antiquity, and singular appearance. The trunks rise so close to each other, and the branches are so thickly interwoven, that, at some distance, the two seem as one of enormous growth. Between their trunks a pulpit has been placed, around which, on sacramental occasions, hundreds of people assemble to hear the exhortations of the preacher, protected alike from sun and shower by the spreading boughs. At the bridge of Cromdale a road strikes off the highway on the right, passing near the old castle of Lethindrie, and leading to within a short distance of the battleground. This castle is now a ruin, and it appears to be of some antiquity; but little of its history is known. It is roofless, and the upper apartments are sadly dilapidated; but the vaults, which are arched, and some of the lower rooms, are yet pretty entire. One of them is used as a dairy by the gudewife of the tacksman of Lethindrie farm; and in others cattle and poultry are kept.

Quitting this ruined structure, and rounding the shoulder of the eminence on which it stands, we look down on a narrow plain, from the opposite side of which Cromdale Hill rises abruptly. This low ground is the spot where the conflict between the Highlanders and their hostile followers raged more fiercely. It is the celebrated "Haughs of Cromdale" which maidens have sung in the well-known ballad that bears its name, and which our great-grandfathers have spoken of with sorrow, for the loss of friends or relatives. On the west, it is flanked by a brown sterile moor, and a portion of the arable lands of Burnside. A tract of marshy ground extends on the east. Cromdale Hill and the hill of Lethindrie, as already stated, forms its boundaries on the north and south. From the former a clear stream gushes down, and, as it reaches the plain, murmurs through green hillocks and patches of nettles, said to be the graves of those who fell. The curling smoke from two or three cottages at a distance, is the only sign of vitality. The writer of this sketch visited the "Haughs" in August 1842, accompanied by a gentleman extensively acquainted with the traditional lore of the Highlands, and enthusiastic in his admiration of the brave deeds of our ancestors, and whose grandfather fought under the banner of Prince Charles Edward at Culloden. As we neared the ground our conversation naturally ran on the events and occurrences of the war between King James and his successor. We waxed poetical. Highland warriors, broadswords, targets, and belted plaids, took possession of our imagination, until we could fancy that we saw the retreating clans flying over the heath. The spell was broken as we were about to set foot upon the plain, not by encountering the ghost of an armed Highlander, but a veritable being of flesh and blood—a dancing-master, (as we afterwards learned,) busily employed in cutting sticks for fuel, and dressed after the English fashion, with his head encased in a broad-brimmed straw hat! A dancing-master in such a lonely place! He had taken up his abode in one of the cottages alluded to, making occasional excursions to different parts of the country in pursuit of his profession. We found him, like most of his class, civil and obliging; but he could supply no information, either written or traditional, respecting the conflict. In going over the plain many a time we paused and pondered. The sun shone bright in the heavens; not a breath of wind stirred the purple heath; but the scene was impressive. Although neither a Marathon nor a Waterloo, a visit to the "Haughs of Cromdale" cannot fail to awaken some of the noblest of our feelings.

Dellachapple, near the battle-field, is the residence of Miss Grant, the niece of Mr Colquhoun Grant, a gentleman who distinguished himself in the army of Prince Charles Edward. At Prestonpans he manifested the most undaunted courage and bravery. From that memorable field he pursued a company of English dragoons up to the gates of Edinburgh castle, and by skill and presence of mind effected his escape from the town in safety. The celebrated John Roy Stuart and Colquhoun Grant were on the most intimate terms, and frequently side by side in the field of battle. For their adherence to the cause of the Stuarts, these two brave men were compelled to seek safety in concealment; and they spent many a lonely hour together among the solitudes of Cromdale Hill. Eventually Mr Grant became a writer to the signet, and realised a handsome competency in Edinburgh. His nephew, Captain Gregory Grant, R.N., died at Burnside about four years ago. He was distinguished for genuine Highland hospitality and attention to the wants of the poor. This gentleman, among other improvements, formed a carriage-road from his residence to the high road leading to Grantown. It passes the famed distillery of Balmeanach, and may be followed in returning from the "Haughs" to the village.

THE REGALIA OF SCOTLAND.

WHEN we consider that the Crown of Scotland is a relic of the Bruce of Bannockburn; and that the Crown, Sword, and Sceptre, which constitute the Regalia, were the tangible signs of the nation's independence, we may well conceive the high importance attached to the preservation of the "Honours," as narrated in our last number. Apart from the intrinsic value of the articles, what a loss, in an antiquarian and national point of view, would have been sustained by their destruction!—for destroyed in all likelihood they would have been had they fallen into the hands of the monarchy-hating Parliament of England.

As the history of the "Honours" is altogether interesting, and in many respects curious, we shall follow up the "True Account" of last week by an abridgement from one of the Bannatyne Club books, entitled "Papers Relative to the Regalia of Scotland," printed in 1829.

It seems well established that every emblem of royalty was taken from Baliol by Edward I., in 1296. The ceremony of degradation was performed in the castle of Montrose, or Brechin according to some authorities. The unfortunate Baliol was produced before Edward, and, in the language of Wytown, "dyspoyled"

"Of all hys robys of royaltie:
The pelure thai tuk off his tabart,
(Twme Tabart he was calyt effeyrwart),
And all othire insyngns,
That fel to kyngis on ony wys,
Bathe sceptre, sward, crowne, and ryng,
Fra this Jhon that he made kyng,
Halyly fra hym tuk thai thare,
And made hym of the kynryk bare:
Than this Jhon tuk a qwhyrt wand,
And gave up in-til Edwardis hand
Of this kynryk all the rycht,
That he than had, or have mycht,
Fra hym and all his ayris thare,
Tharept to claime it nevyr mare."

When Bruce first asserted his right to the Crown of Scotland, and was crowned king at Scone, a temporary circle, or coronal of gold, was used, which would have been unnecessary had the ancient regalia existed, or been within his reach. Even this temporary badge of royalty fell into the hands of the English after the Bruce's defeat at the battle of Methven.

The ancient Crown of Scotland never having been restored, the conclusion is, that the diadem now preserved was made by Bruce's orders to replace "the golden round and top of sovereignty," which was the visible emblem of the national independence, recovered by the wisdom and valour of the Scottish deliverer. It is certain, at all events, that such a crown was in existence at the coronation of his son, David II., in 1329. The workmanship of the antient portion of the present crown is ascertained to be as early as the fourteenth century. The precious stones in it are rough; whereas, at a later period, they were cut into facets. The representations of the Scottish Crown, prior to the time of Bruce, which exist upon coins and seals, are different from the one in question. They represent a diadem ornamented with fleurs de lis only; whereas, from the time of Robert Bruce downwards, the fleurs de lis are interchanged with crosses, as on the present Crown. Until the reign of James IV. the coinage continued to bear the same device. In 1483 that monarch is represented on the coinage with a close or arched crown; though it is possible that this badge of independent sovereignty, which was new in Europe, may not have been actually engrafted on the Crown itself. The Crown does not seem to have undergone any change until the reign of James V., who added the two concentric circles, surmounted at the point of intersection with a mound of gold enamelled, and a large cross patee, upon which are the characters J. R. V. It is evident that these arches are of a date much posterior to the original crown. They have not originally formed part of the diadem, but are attached to it by tacks of gold; the workmanship of the arches is of a different and inferior description; and the metal is not of the same quality, the gold of the arches being less pure than that which forms the diadem. When, therefore, we find in the Manuscript Diary of Lord Fountainhall, preserved in the Advocate's Library, a memorandum, stating that "the crown of Scotland is not the ancient one, but was casten of new by James V." we must understand it in the limited sense of an alteration of the form by the addition of the arches, not an actual re-moulding of the whole substance of the crown.

The Sceptre was also made in the reign of James V., as appears by the characters J. R. V. engraved under the figures of the three saints, which are placed upon the top of it. It may be presumed that the sceptre was made at the same time when the crown was altered; most probably during the king's visit to Paris in 1536. James, when preparing for his intimate alliance with France by marrying one of her princesses, might be naturally induced to repair and augment the splendour of the national Regalia; and the advanced state of the arts at Paris afforded him the best opportunity of doing so.*

The Sword of State has an earlier date than the Sceptre. This beautiful specimen of early art was presented to King James IV. by the warlike Pope Julius II. in the year 1507. It was accompanied by a consecrated hat; and both, as we are made acquainted by Leely, were delivered with great solemnity in the Church of Holyrood by the Papal Legate and the Abbot of Dunfermline. This article of the Regalia is not interesting to the antiquary alone; the beautiful and fanciful style of the sculpture upon the handle, and the filigree work with which the sheath is covered, carry back the admirer of the arts to the period when they revived in their splendour. The various devices which are interwoven with the chasing represent the Papal Tiara and the Keys of St Peter—ornaments appropriate to the See of Rome; and the foliage of oak leaves and acorns, the personal device of Pope Julius, with which they are intermingled, forms a most beautiful example of the style of ornament commonly termed grotesque.

The chief use of the Regalia was at the Coronation of each new monarch. Our Scottish writers have left us no particular account of the rites of coronation. One remarkable part of the ceremonial, as practised in the early monarchy,

* The only part of the Sceptre which seems of a different age from that of James V. is the large globular mass of rock crystal, and its peculiar metallic settings, which surmount the sculptured figures near the top, and which indicate a degree of rudeness in the arts that ill accords with the other parts of the workmanship. It seems by no means improbable that this stone—which in the wardrobe inventories is dignified with the name of a "great beryll"—was an amulet which had made part of the more ancient Sceptre of the Scottish Kings.

derived its origin from the ancient Celtic ceremony of placing the new Chief, or Tanist, upon a stone or rock, when assuming for the first time the command of his tribe. Hence the celebrated Fatal Stone, upon which the Scottish monarchs were crowned at Scone, and which was removed to Westminster by Edward I. of England. Respecting other parts of the Scottish coronation ceremony, some idea may be formed from the ill-omened coronation of Charles II., as it was performed in the church of Scone on the 1st of January 1651, when he was called to the throne by the Presbyterian interest. On that occasion, the King, clad in a prince's robe, walked in procession from the hall of the palace to the church, the spurs, sword of state, sceptre and crown, being carried before him by the principal nobility. It is worthy of remark that upon this occasion the crown was borne by the unhappy Marquis of Argyle, who was put to death in no very legal manner immediately after the Restoration, using upon the scaffold these striking words, "I placed the crown on the King's head, and in reward he brings mine to the block." Upon entering the church, the King ascended an elevated throne, and listened to a sermon by Mr Robert Douglas, minister of Edinburgh, in which, with more zeal than decency and discretion, the preacher insisted upon the sins of the royal house, not forgetting those of the King himself. King Charles then solemnly swore to the Covenant, which, doubtless, in the opinion of many present, was the most substantial and important part of the ceremony. He then took the Coronation Oath, as contained in the 8th Act of the first Parliament of James VI. This oath was so much altered upon the change of religion, that it no longer resembles the ancient coronation oath of Scotland, which we have reason to believe was far more special in its description of the civil duties of the sovereign to the subject. Charles was then invested with the royal robes by the High Chamberlain, girded with the sword of state, and crowned by the Marquis of Argyle with the royal crown. Each of these actions was accompanied by a suitable exhortation. When the King was thus adorned with all the ensigns of his high dignity, Lion King-at-Arms caused a herald to call the nobility before their sovereign, one by one, according to their rank. Each as he passed before the King knelt down, and, with his hand touching the crown on the King's head, swore these words: "By the Eternal and Almighty God, who liveth and reigneth for ever, I shall support thee to the utmost." This individual homage having been rendered, the nobility held up their hands and took a general oath of fidelity. The Earl Marshell and Lyon King then went to the four corners of the stage successively, and proclaimed the obligatory oath to be taken by the subjects at large; and the people, holding up their hands, swore: "By the Eternal and Almighty God, who liveth and reigneth for ever, we become your liege-men, and truth and faith shall bear unto you, and live and die with you against all manner of folks whatsoever, in your service, according to the National Covenant and Solemn League and Covenant." The nobility and the Lyon King-at-Arms then assumed their coronets. The Lord Chamberlain next unloosed the sword of state from the King's side, drew it, and delivered it drawn into the King's hand, who gave it to the Constable to be borne naked before him. The Earl of Crawford and Lindsay placed the sceptre in the King's right hand, with a suitable exhortation; and the Marquis of Argyle installed him in the royal throne, saying: "Stand and hold fast from henceforth, the place whereof you are the lawful and righteous heir, by a long and lineal succession of your fathers, which is now delivered unto you by authority of Almighty God." The minister then threw in a long word of exhortation; which finished, a free pardon to all offenders was proclaimed from the four corners of the stage by the Lord Chancellor and the Lyon King-at-Arms. The King then, supported by the Chancellor, Constable, and Marshell, exhibited himself to the people at the door of the church, who received him with shouts of "God save the King!" The new-made Monarch returned into the church and assumed his throne, while the Lyon King recited the royal pedigree up to Fergus the First. Then the Lyon again called the Lords, one by one, to do homage, who, kneeling, and holding their hands betwixt the King's hands, did swear these words: "By the Eternal and Almighty God, who liveth and reigneth for ever and ever, I become your liege-man, and truth and faith shall bear unto you, and live and die with you, against all manner of folk whatever, in your service, according to the National Covenant and Solemn League and Covenant." Another long exhortation, pronounced by the minister, in which again the iniquities of the royal house were not forgotten, showed the ill-timed and intemperate zeal of the Presbyterian party. When this was ended, the King, wearing his royal robes, with the crown on his head, the sceptre in his hand, and the sword of state borne before him, returned to the palace in solemn procession.

Such was the ceremony of Charles II.'s coronation, in which, we may presume, most of the ancient rites, so far as they were known or remembered, were duly observed.

During the sittings of the Scottish Parliament, which were usually preceded by a solemn procession of the members, the Regalia were borne in state to the hall of the assembly, and, as emblems of the royal authority, were placed on a table before the throne, when they were not worn on the person of the Sovereign. The royal assent to the acts of parliament was given by touching them with the sceptre.

The production of the Honours in Parliament was considered such a necessary part of the solemnity attending the sitting of that national body, that their absence was accounted ominous. When the Articles of Perth, so obnoxious to the Presbyterians, were passed, in the year 1621, the discontented party exulted that the tempest upon this occasion (in itself a prodigy) prevented the Regalia from being brought in procession to the Parliament, and that the hated articles were not greeted with the presence of the Honours when they were adopted.

During the sitting of Parliament, the Royal Insignia were placed under the care and custody of the Earl Mareshall of Scotland, whose high office of state was hereditary in the family of Keith. The same officer claimed a right to take charge of the Regalia during the intervals in which Parliament was not sitting; but as this must have been attended with much inconvenience, the castles, estates, and vassalage of that great nobleman, by which alone he could protect the Regalia, lying far in the north, and at a distance from the seat of government, the Honours were usually lodged, with the rest of the royal treasure, in the Jewel-House, under the care of the Treasurer for the time. They are repeatedly mentioned in the inventories of the royal treasure; as, for example, in the year 1539, when this entry occurs in the inventory of the royal wardrobe:—

“JOWELLIS.

Item, ane crowne of gold sett with perle and precious stanis.

Item, in primis diamantis twenty.

Item, of fyne orient perle thre scoir and aucht, wantand ane floure delice of gold.

Item, ane septour with ane grete bereal and ane perle in the heid of it.

Item, twa swordis of honour, with twa beltis, the auld belt wantand foure stuthis.

Item, the hatt that come fra the Paip, of grey velvett, with the Haly Gaist sett all with orient perle.”

In a subsequent inventory, given up by John Tennand, 23th November, 1542, a similar entry occurs concerning the Regalia:—

“Item, in the first his grace's croun, full of precious stanes and orient perle, with ane septour set with ane greit barrell.

Item, twa swordis of honour, with twa beltis wantand four stuthis.

Item, ane rob royall of purpoure velvett lynett with armin, and ane kirtill of the samyne velvett, lynett in the foir breistis with armyn and heid schylt.”

Two swords of state are here mentioned; the second was probably that which was presented to James V. from the Papal See, upon the 22d February, 1536; a gift which, according to Lesly, was accompanied by an intimation which James, for the time, had the wisdom to disregard, that the edge of the weapon would be well employed against his heretical neighbour, Henry VIII. of England. This sword appears to have been lost in the lapse of time; or in the dilapidation of the royal treasure which took place during the beginning and latter end of Queen Mary's reign. Another curious article occurs in Tennand's inventory, namely, “the Queen's Graces croun, set with the perle and precious stanis, with ane septour with ane quhyte hand.” These subordinate articles of the Regalia have been also long since destroyed.

At the accession of James VI. to the Crown of England, it is probable he carried with him to his new Kingdom all the personal part of the royal treasure; but the Honours properly so called remained in Scotland, and continued to be kept by the Treasurer during the period when the Parliament was not sitting.

When the Honours were delivered up on the death of Sir Gideon Murray of Elibank, Treasurer Depute of Scotland, in 1621, an accurate inventory of them was taken. The jewels of the crown, real and counterfeit, were minutely described. Ten of the small challoms or spaces are mentioned as filled with blue enamel instead of stones; two challoms totally empty, and two filled with flat white stones—all which imperfections exist at this day. The same accurate description takes notice, that the top of the Sceptre has been broken and pierced; and also that the handle and scabbard of the Sword of State had sustained some damage; which injuries may be still observed.

There is a constant tradition, for which no written authority can be produced, that Charles I. desired to have the Crown of Scotland sent up to London, to be used in his coronation there; but that this having been declined by the Scottish Privy Council, as contrary to the laws of the kingdom, he was induced to undertake a journey to Scotland, in order to be there crowned king. Upon this occasion, Clarendon informs us that the King appeared with no less lustre at Edinburgh than at Whitehall; and that the pomp of his coronation, passed with all the solemnity and evidence of public joy which could be expected or imagined—a glimpse of sunshine soon to be overcast by the approaching tempest. Nor did it escape that great historian, that the lavish expense of the Scottish nobility, emulous to support their dignity upon such an occasion, involved their estates in debt, which finally rendered them discontented, and ripe for desperate counsels.

In the beginning of the Scottish civil wars, in 1637, while the Marquis of Hamilton was residing at Dalkeith, he appears to have meditated the removing of the Regalia; not, perhaps, conceiving them very safe in the hands of the Earl of Mar, then governor of Edinburgh Castle. But as no defence was ultimately made, the Royal Insignia fell into the hands of the Government, in 1638.

In the subsequent national misfortunes, as related in our last, they were placed for safety in Dunnotar Castle.

CASSILLIS DOWNANS.

Upon that night when fairies light
On Cassillis Downans* dance;
Or owre the lays, in splended maze,
On sprightly coursers prance.

THE nearest way from Ayr to these “fairie haunts,” is by the stage-coach as far as Caroluie (written, by the by, in most of the old records Corcloy), and from thence over the hill to Dalrymple. An easy walk of three quarters of an hour brought us to the summit of the range of hills which enclose the village on the west. And here let us station ourselves for a few seconds—the

* Certain romantic, rocky, green hills, in the neighbourhood of the ancient seat of the Earls of Cassillis.—
POEM OF HALLOWEEN.

scene that bursts upon our view is worthy of all eulogium. The valley, delightful in itself, is highly cultivated, and the mellow beams of an autumn sun are glancing on the sickles of innumerable reapers, busily engaged in cutting down the ripened grain; while the voice of jocund toil gratefully ascends from yonder light-hearted band, whose spirit even excessive labour cannot subdue. Stretching away towards the east, the Doon is seen emerging from the woods of Skel-don; and, sweeping along in a serpentine curve, may be traced in its course through the valley, till lost in the thick plantations of Cassillis. Close on its bank is situated the pleasant village of Dalrymple, with its smiling gardens, its rose and woodbine-adorned cottages, and the blue smoke of the cheerful hearths curling towards heaven with all the incense of a peace-offering from those quiet and happy homes. Here we have the rural scenery of Goldsmith truly realized:—

“ Sweet Auburn? loveliest village of the plain?
Where health and plenty cheer’d the labouring swain,
Where smiling Spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting Summer’s lingering blooms delay’d.

How often have I paus’d on every charm—
The shelter’d cot, the cultivated farm,
The never-failing brook, the busy mill,
The decent church that topt the neighbouring hill,
The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age and whispering lovers made.”

Unlike most other villages, Dalrymple appears to have been built on a regular plan, the two streets of which it is composed forming one-half of a square, while the area is occupied with the manse, a portion of the glebe, the school-house, and one or two gardens. The manse, to which an addition has recently been built, is a comfortable mansion and well enclosed. The nicely white-washed church, forming, as it were, one of the corners of the square, is also seen from our position on the eminence, and completes the scene. It was built in 1764, and is situated on the rising ground at the lower bend of the river. The church is kept in good repair, but is considered too small for the population. Owing to the distance many of the parishioners have to travel, there is no interval in the service on Sabbath: and here the old mode of collecting for the poor by handing a laddle round the pews, instead of at the door, is still maintained. Though a place of worship existed at Dalrymple from a remote period, the village itself is entirely modern, the proprietor of the first house erected in it being still alive. On entering the village, it is impossible not to admire the clean appearance of the houses. No magistracy—no police—are here required to maintain the laws or enforce decorum. A laudable rivalry seems to prevail in those habits of economy and industry, which alone lead to comfort and happiness. Besides gardens attached to the rear of the dwellings, not a few possess little flower-plots in front, which, in most instances, are dressed with great care. The inhabitants chiefly rank with the rural population of the parish, the few tradesmen in it being dependent almost solely on the employment afforded by the agriculturists of the surrounding country. A library was established in the village some years ago, and though not on a very extensive scale, we are glad to learn that it is in a flourishing condition, and greatly appreciated by the community. As a proof of the utility of such an institution in a locality of this kind, it may be mentioned that the volumes circulate amongst the farm houses for miles round.

Leaving Dalrymple, the walk to Cassillis Downans is little more than a mile. The highest of the range of hills, which presents the form of a cone, has an imposing aspect. The height may be estimated at between four and five hundred feet above the level of the Doon, and as the rise is somewhat abrupt, the difficulty of access is considerable. The summit once gained, however, the visitor is amply rewarded for his toil by the extensive prospect which it commands—the scope of vision ranging from ten to thirty miles. Amongst the woods, in the beautiful haugh beneath, are seen the turrets of Cassillis House, one of the oldest baronial residences in the county. The Doon rolls gently at its base, and the rich green lawns undulate in beautiful perspective amid the magnificent old trees by which it is surrounded. Beyond the Doon rise the sloping and dense woods of Dalrymple, said to have originally formed a portion of the ancient Caledonian forest. Turning northward, an expansive view is obtained of the bay, the harbour, and town of Ayr, the ports of Troon, Irvine, Ardrossan, part of the Cumbraes, and the “lofty Benlomond,” in its robes of blue. Eastward, the hills of Cumnock and Dalmellington are easily recognized, while, to the south, the hills of Straiton, the water of Girvan, and the Nick of the Balloch, are not less distinguishable. On the west, the eye is arrested by the huge hill of Mochrum, and, at a distance of some four miles, the spirited town of Maybole is seen swelling along the gently sloping eminence on which it is situated. With the exception of the views from the Castles of Stirling and Edinburgh, or Goatfell in Arran, we have nowhere been gratified by a richer prospect. Highly panoramic, the view embraces every variety of landscape composition—sea, mountains, woods, streams, straths, castles, towns, villages, &c.; and affords a pleasing idea of the agricultural condition of Ayrshire—the pastoral and cultivated districts being admirably blended in one gorgeous painting of nature’s own colouring. But, apart from the more general enhancements of topography, the hill of Cassillis Downans presents an object of peculiar interest to the antiquary, in the remains of one of those ancient circular forts or camps, vestiges of which are to be found in various localities of Ayrshire. These no doubt belonged to the Damnii, the original settlers of Britain. From the name of a farm in the immediate vicinity—Dunree, in Gaelic Dun-righ, signifying the king’s stronghold—it is inferred that the fort was distinguished by a royal appellation. Within view of Cassillis Downans there are three or four similar remains, forming, as it were, a chain from south to north, by which means immediate notice could be communicated of the approach of an enemy. At the camp of Woodland, in the immediate neighbourhood of Dalrymple, some time ago, the tenant of the farm, on digging within the circle, found a human skull, which he preserved for many years. In former times, Cassillis Downans was regarded as a favourite haunt of the fairies of Ayrshire, and a popular tradition still exists illustrative of their peculiar attachment to the locality. The old house of Cassillis, it is said, was originally intended to have occupied a site on the top of the hill, but the fairies were so much opposed to this that they invariably demolished at night what had been built during the day—removing the stones and other material to the spot where the castle now stands—until the proprietor, convinced of the folly of contending with his invisible opponents, at length gave up the contest.

Directing our way down the slope of the Downans, we now entered the policies of Cassillis, which, if enticing from a distance, are still more enchanting when you find yourself on the green lawn under the spreading foliage of many a noble oak and plane, and hear the music of the water

"Among the bonnie winding banks
Where Doon rins, wimplin' clear."

The Castle, to which an elegant gothic front was added some years ago by the late Lord Kennedy, consisted previously of a massive square tower, with a spiral stair. The lower story is vaulted, and the walls, as high as the third flat, are upwards of sixteen feet in thickness. At what period the house was built does not appear to be known. Grose, in his antiquities of Scotland, says—"This tower has probably undergone many repairs; the present appearance (1789) does not bespeak the last to be older than the reign of Queen Mary, or James VI. her son." The estate of Cassillis fell into the hands of Sir John Kennedy of Dunure, during the reign of Robert II., in the fourteenth century, and immediately afterwards Cassillis became the chief seat of the family. Though the Castle is not associated with any remarkable event in history, yet the well-known ballad of the "Gypsy Laddie," and the tradition regarding the Countess to whom the verses refer, has invested the scene of her elopement with a peculiar interest.

"The gypsies cam to our lord's yett,
An' oh but they sang bonnie;
They sang sae sweet an' sae complete
That doun cam the fair ladye.

An' she cam trippin' doun the stair,
Wi' a' her maids before her;
As soon as they saw her weel-faur'd face,
They coost the glamour owre her.

"Gae tak' frae me this gay mantil,
And bring to me a plaidie;
For if kith and kin and a' had sworn,
I'll follow the gipsy laddie."

The "fair ladye" is said by some antiquaries to have been the Countess of John the Sixth Earl of Cassillis, who was attending the Assembly of Divines at Westminster in 1643, when the elopement is alleged to have occurred. Popular tradition accords with the ballad in attributing the imprudent step adopted by the Countess to the influence of "glamour," or witchery; but Finlay and others attempt to account for the indiscretion, by representing the leader of the gypsies to have been an early lover of the lady—Sir John Faa of Dunbar. Doubt is even attempted to be thrown on the whole story, from the fact of the air to which the ballad is sung having been discovered in a book of music written many years prior to the alleged period of the event recorded in the verses. This, however, is not a well-founded objection—there being no necessary affinity of origin between the words and the air; and the tradition is too well grounded and circumstantial to be invalidated. But it strongly countenances the opinion that the abduction of the Countess of Cassillis occurred at a more remote period than that condescended upon. Indeed this is placed beyond doubt by the publication of two original letters in "The Ballads and Songs of Ayrshire:"* the first, a letter of the Earl of Cassillis, inviting Lord Eglinton to the funeral of his Countess, in which she is styled his "deir bed-fellow;" and the second, the reply of the Earl of Eglinton, apologising for his inability to attend. From the date—December 1642—there can be no doubt that the parties were John, the sixth Earl of Cassillis, and his Countess, Lady Jean Hamilton. Her funeral, besides, took place from Cassillis House; so that Lady Jean could not be the unhappy Countess whose prison-house is said to have been Maybole Castle.

The "gypsies' steps," a few straggling stones across the Doon, at a ford some hundred yards distant from the Castle, are still pointed out as the way by which the Countess and her enchanters escaped from the Castle, and eluded observation by threading their way unseen through the woods. In front of the Castle stands an old and majestic plane tree, on the wide-spreading branches of which Johnnie Faa and his companions are said to have paid the penalty of their temerity with their lives. The tree is called the "Dule Tree," and the apartment from which the lady became an involuntary witness of the revolting spectacle is still pointed out as the Countess' Room. There are two portraits of her preserved at Cassillis—one before marriage, and the other after her imprisonment. The latter represents her in tears. The lady, as tradition affirms, was confined all her lifetime in the Castle of Maybole, where she passed the time in working the story of her misfortune in tapestry.

The title and estate of Cassillis having passed into the hands of Sir Thomas Kennedy of Culzean (a junior branch of the family) in 1759, the house of Cassillis was no longer regarded as the principal residence, though it was still maintained in a habitable state. When the late Lord Kennedy, however, came to reside there, about thirteen years ago, an entire new suit of apartments (as formerly stated) was added to the old tower, and numerous improvements effected. Many more were in progress, when the much lamented death of his lordship again consigned the house and policies of Cassillis to comparative neglect.

BRONZE WEAPONS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL.]

SIR,—Out of the multiplicity of bronze relics which have from time to time been recovered from the soil, very few can be claimed as British; so few, indeed, as to lead some of our eminent antiquaries, and among others, Mr Robert Stuart, author of "Caledonia Romana," to think that our forefathers, in the time of the Romans, were unacquainted with the manufacture of bronze, though using weapons of that material. That opinion may be well or ill-grounded; but the question will serve as my apology for sending you the following paragraph, which might otherwise pass unrecorded:—

In December last, three ancient axes, of bronze, were discovered buried in a field on the farm of Connage, parish of Petty, Inverness-shire, by a labourer employed in cutting drains. Almost the whole parish was a moss until a comparatively recent period; and though the progress of improvement has now changed the face of the country considerably, the field in which the relics were found is still said to be within "the moss of Petty." The weapons were found at a depth of three feet. They differ in size, and, when discovered, the two largest were placed side by side, edge-downwards, with the smallest lying flat above them. With the exception of the edges, which were hacked as if by violent blows, the axes were in a good state of preservation, little or no corrosion having taken place; and the style of finish showed that the art of working in bronze was well understood by the makers. A drawing of one of the weapons will illustrate its shape better than description.

From A to C the length is five and a-half inches; from D to E the breadth is three and a-half inches; from F to G one and a-half; and at the points B and H the thickness is 4-10ths of an inch. At both ends the edges are sharp; the sides are concave: and the weapon itself is transversely rounded. The three relics were for a short time in the possession of Mr Croall, parish teacher, Ardersier; but afterwards went into that of the Earl of Moray. I believe these bronzes to be relics of the Britons, whether manufactured by themselves, or obtained from the Phœnicians or other traders. It is true that Burghhead, thirty miles from Petty, was the Ptoroton, and Forres, twenty miles distant, the Varis of the Romans; that Roman remains have been found near Nairn and Campbellton, on the road by Petty to Bona and Fort Augustus, where there are evidences of the presence of the Roman soldiery; but the relics which have been recovered are all very different from those alluded to. The field in which the latter were found is still spoken of traditionally as the "blood-field;" but the idea is only vague that some encounter had there occurred long ago. From the fact that the tradition is so indistinct, it does not seem unreasonable to suppose that it may refer to some minor conflict betwixt the Romans and the native Vacomagi. To strengthen this supposition, I may add, that a specimen, exactly resembling that of which I have sent a drawing, was found in the same field a few years ago. The field has been cultivated for twenty-eight years.

REASONS FOR THE BURROWS OF SCOTLAND,

IN SUPPORT OF THEIR FREIGHTING FOREIGN SHIPS.

January 1615.

Reasonis for the Borrowis of the kyngdome of Scotland, quhairfoir their libertie aucht not to be restrayned in the frauchting of forraine schippis and boddomis for transporting of thair guidis to and fra the said kyngdome.*

First, they protest, as nature and dewtie bindis thame, that they ar most willing to prefer thair awin cuntriemen and schipping to any strangers in the world in the caice forsaide, yea ewin with evident and seine loss of thair awin accordis; bot if this proceed fra any constitutioun, or publick restraint, or prohibitioun to be maid be his Maestie, they fear it sall produce suche dangerous effectis as may evert and overthrow thair hail seafairing tred and schipping for ewer.

Beacaus that pre[codent] and example, the kyngis and prynces of vther kyngdomes no doubt wilbe inducit, for the benefeit of thair awin subjectis to mak the lyk constitutionis within thair dominionis; and if so be, thair is nathing to be expected bot decay and wrack to our schipping, insamikle as the greittest number of the best schippis of Scotland ar continuallie employed in the service of Frenschemen, not onlie within the dominionis of France, bot also within the boundis of Spayne, Italie, and Barbarie, quhair thair tred lyis; quhilk is ane cheiff caus of the intres of the number of Scottis schippis, and of thair maintenance: quhairas be the contrairie, the half of the number of schippis quhilkis ar presentlie in Scotland will serve for our awin priuat tred and negociatione, if we haid not this benefeit and commoditie of strangers.

This is nocht to be esteimed ane naiked presumptione vpon our pairt, because we have alreddye found the practize thair of in France, in sa mikle, as vpon informatione gewin to the King of France and his Maiesties counsell thair, that this publick prohibitioun of the frauchting of schippis belonging to strangeris in England or vther pairtis, they haue beine pleased to mak the lyk prohibitioun within the dominiounis of France, quhilk taking executioun laitlie in Normandie againis ane English schip and ane vther Dutche schip, quhilkis being laidned with Frensche commodities, the maisteris and marineris thair of wer compellit to disburden the same of the saidis commodities, and returne toome and emptie to their awin cuntries. So also the lyk wes intendit, becaus ane Scottis bark perteyning to Andro Allane, quhilk that same tyme wes also laidned with Frensche merchandice, and no doubt wald haue beine practized againis thame, wer not the maisteris and marineris of the said bark pretendit greiter immunitie be the ancient alliance and leagues maid betwix the kyngdomes of France and Scotland nor vther strangeris; and that they wer compellit to alledge that thair wes no restraint maid in Scotland of any libertie quhilk Frenschemen haid ewer injoyed thair before, and to find cautione to report ane autentik testimoniall thairvpon frome Scotland, as may appeir both be the proces quhilk wes deducit at Rowane hairvpon, and by the lettres of the Scottis factours sent heir to the provest of Edinburgh, testifying the premisses to be of veritie; swa that if this publick restraint and prohibitioun haue place heir in Scotland, we neid not to luik for any tred in France, without quhilk nather can our schipping nor tred of merchandice stand, but all will turne to ane pitifull wrack and confusioun, for we ar not in sic caise heir in Scotland as the subjects of vther kyngdomes, quhairin thair is continuall intercourse and commoditie by resort of strangeris, by quhome thair welth and estait growis; and thair is no strangeris that repairs to this kyngdome except sic as importis tumber and vther gross merchandice of small worth.

Secundlie, if our libertie in frauchting of strangeris schippis heir in Scotland be restrained, we wilbe compellit to leave our tred of heringis, quhilk we transport to the eist cuntries, becaus the best occasioun of the transport thair of is offred onlie in the monethis of September and October, in the quhilk seasoun we haue the commoditie of sum Dutche schippis heir, quha hes imported tumber within this realme, and wilbe content to transport our guidis for the thrid of the fraucht quhilk Scottis schippis may serue for; because if they want this employment they will returne emptie; and the awneris of Scottis schippis can not undertak thir voyages bot vpon greit and exorbitant frauchtes, seing they wilbe constrainyd to ly the maist pairt of the wynter seasoun in the eist cuntries, be reasonne of the frostis incloseing thame thair. If thir frauchtis wer gewin by merchandis, they wald report no gayne nor commoditie by that tred, and so must leave the same, to the hurt and prejudice of the whole kyngdome.

It is also to be considerit that Scottis schippis can not convenientlie serue for the importing of waynscott, knaphult, (naptha) tar, and vther gross waires within this kyngdome, becaus they ar nocht able to serue vpon so easie conditiounis as Dutche schippis, quha ar seruit by thrie or four marineris at the maist; and if greit frauchtis wer giwen for such wares, all the wairis aboue writtin culd scarslie be sold for dowble pryce, quhilk wald turne to the hurt of the hail kyngdome.

EARL OF DUMFERMLINE TO KING JAMES VI.

[This letter from Alexander Seton, Earl of Dunfermline, the able Chancellor of James VI., is very curious, from the particulars it contains relative to Mure of Auchindrain, whose wholesale murders are, though more than two centuries old, familiar to most readers through the medium of Scott, who honoured Auchindrain by naming perhaps the best of his dramas after him.]

Maist Sacred Souerene,

I tak the occasioun and bauldness to writte this vnto your hienes, in ansuere off that it pleased your Sacred Maiestie writte to me the secund of Februar, directing me to deal with my nepvieu, the Erle of Abercorne, that he sould desist from onye farder insisting in suite of the Laird of Achindraynis forfaiture, and renunce all benefeit and promeis he had of your Maiestie for the same. I could nae better trawell with him in that, nor be communicatting your gracious mynd to him, be the sight off your hienes awin letter, whairtoe I hope he hes send your Maiestie ane ansuere, whilk will sufficientlie satisfie your princelie intention in this purpose. This I can testifie vnto your Maiestie of certaintie, that whasowir hes informed your hienes, that the said Erle off Abercorne delt, or wald onye wayes be persuadit to deal, for onye favour or owirsight to the said Laird of Achindrayne, hes sayde far bye the treuthe, or onye thing hes ewir bene in his mynde. He hes indeede some freindschipt with the hous off Barganie, whometoe Achindrayne hes bene this lang tyme a dependar; bott as the hous off Barganie findis that the said Achindraynis practises was the wrack of the last laird of Barganye, swa haiff thay be experience off laitt tryed, that he was be all possible meanes working to vndoe that house, and thairfor hes haillie casin him off. And this I assure your Maiestie, that it was be thair speciall moyane, diligence, and industrie, with the assistance of the Erle off Abercorne, that baithe this last treasonable murthour of his is brocht to the light it is cummed to, and also his foirknaledge, privitie, and persuasioun to the young man Thomas of Barganie, for the foull murthour of the Tutour of Cassills, and without thair doing and insisting, the same will be hardlie yitt

MY MIND TO ME A KINGDOM IS.

[We know not the author of this excellent composition, if it be not Marlow. The ELGIN COURANT says "it is quoted by an author in 1569, as a well known production;" but this is probably a mistake.]

My mind to me a kingdom is;
Such perfect joy therein I find,
As far exceeds all earthly bliss,
That God of nature hath assigned!
Though much I want that most would have Yet still my mind forbids to crave.

Cotent to live, this is my stay;
I seek no more than may suffice;
I press to bear no haughty sway;
Look, what I lack my mind supplies.
Lo! thus I triumph, like a king,
Content with what my mind doth bring.

I see how plenty surfeits oft,
And hasty climbers soonest fall;
I see that such as sit aloft,
Mishap doth threaten most of all;
These get with toil, and keep with fear:
Such care my mind could never bear.

No princely pomp, no wealthy store?
No force to win the victory;

* His lordship's sister, Margaret, having married Lord Claud Hamilton, Lord Claud's son, James—created Earl of Abercorn, 10th July, 1606—was the Chancellor's nephew. This and the preceding article are from the Balfour MSS. in the Library of the Faculty of Advocates.

No wily wit to salve a sore:

No shape to win a lover's eye;
To none of these I yield a thrall,
For why?—my mind despiseth all.

Some have too much, yet still they crave;
I little have, yet seek no more;
They are but poor, though much they have,
And I am rich with little store;
They poor, I rich; they beg, I give;
They lack, I lend; they pine, I live.

I laugh not another's loss,
I grudge not at another's gain;
No worldly care my mind can toss,
I brook what is another's ban;
I fear no foe, nor fawn on friend;
I loathe not life, nor dread my end.

I joy not in no earthly bliss,
I weigh not Cressus' wealth a straw!
For care, I care not what it is—
I fear not fortune's fatal law;
My mind is such as may not move
For beauty bright, or force of love.

I wish but what I have a will,
I wander not to seek for more,
I like the plain, I climb the hill,
In greatest storms I sit on shore,
And laugh at them who toll in vain
To get what must be lost again.

I kiss not where I wish to kill;
I feign not love where most I hate;
I lack no sleep to win my will;
I wait not at the mighty's gate—
I scorn no poor, I fear no rich,
I feel no want, nor have too much.

The court nor cart I like nor loathe:
Extremes are counted worse than all;
The golden mean betwixt them both
Doth surest sit, and fears no fall:
This is my choice; for why? I find
No wealth is like a quiet mind.

My wealth is health and perfect ease!
My conscience clear my chief defence;
I never seek by bribes to please,
Nor by desert to give offence.
Thus do I live, thus will I die;
Would all did so, as well as I.

AN UNKNOWN ENGLISH COLONY.

An Account of certain English People, who, in 1569, making a Voyage to the East Indies, were cast away, and Wrecked upon an Uninhabited Island, near the coast of Terra Australis incognita, and all drowned except one man and four women.

Given by Cornelius Van Sloetten, Captain of a Dutch Ship, which was driven there by foul weather in 1687.

CERTAIN English merchants, encouraged by the great advantages arising from the eastern commodities, in the year 1569, having obtained Queen Elisabeth's royal licence, furnished out for the East Indies four ships, of which — English was chosen factor, who embarked, on the 3d of April, O. S., with his wife and family, consisting of a son of twelve years old, a daughter of fourteen, two maid-servants, a female negro slave, and George Pine, his book-keeper, on board one of the said ships, called The East India Merchant, of 450 tons, being provided with all manner of necessaries and conveniences, in order to settle a factory there.

By the 14th of May, they were in sight of the Canaries, and soon after arrived at the Cape de Verd islands, where they took in some provisions for their voyage, and steering their course south, and a point east, about the 1st of August came to the island of St Helen; and having taken in some fresh water, set forward for the Cape of Good Hope, where by God's blessing they arrived safe, having hitherto met with no tempestuous or disagreeable sailing weather.

But it pleased God, when they were almost in sight of St Laurence, (said to be one of the largest islands in the world,) they were overtaken by a great storm of wind, which separated them from the rest of the ships, and continued with such violence for many days, that, being driven out of their knowledge, they lost all hopes of safety.

The 1st of October, about break of day, the sea continuing very stormy and tempestuous, they discovered land, which appeared high and rocky; and the nearer they approached to it their fears increased, expecting the ship would suddenly be dashed to pieces. The captain, therefore, Mr English, and some others, got into the long boat, in hopes, by that means, to save themselves; and presently after, all the sailors cast themselves overboard, endeavouring to save their lives by swimming; but, probably, they all perished in the sea.

Mr Pine, Mr English's daughter, the two maid-servants, and negro girl, were the only persons remaining on board the ship; and these five persons were miraculously preserved: for after the ship had beat three or four times against the rocks, being now broken, and quite foundered in the waters, they had with great difficulty gotten themselves on the bowsprit, which, being broken off, was driven by the waves into a small creek, where in fell a little river, which, being encompassed by the rocks, was sheltered from the winds, so that they had opportunity, though almost quite spent, to land themselves.

Mr Pine getting together some rotten wood, by the assistance of a tinder-box he had in his pocket, made a fire, by which they dried themselves; and then, leaving the females, he went to see if he could find any of the ship's company that possibly might have escaped; but could find none. At length, it drawing towards evening, he, with what he could get from the wreck, returned to his fellow-sufferers, who were very much troubled for want of him, he being now all their support in this lost condition.

They were afraid that the wild people of the country (if there were any) might find them out; but could distinguish neither footsteps nor paths. And the woods round about them being full of briars and brambles, they apprehended too there might be wild beasts to annoy them, though they saw no marks of any. But, above all, for want of food, they were afraid of being starved to death; but God had otherwise provided for them.

The wreck of the ship furnished them with many necessities; for, getting together some broken pieces of boards and planks, sails and rigging, with the help of poles they made themselves tents; and having gotten wood for firing, and three or four sea-gowns to cover them, making the negro their sentry, they slept soundly all night, having been without sleep for several nights before.

The next day, after being well refreshed with sleep, the wind ceasing, and the weather being warm, they went down from the rocks on the sands at low water, where they found a great part of the ship's lading, either on shore, or floating near it. Mr Pine, with the help of his companions, dragged most of it on shore; and what was too heavy for them they broke; and unbinding the casks and chests, and taking out the goods, they secured all, so that they wanted neither cloaths, nor other necessities for house-keeping. But the salt water had spoiled all the victuals except one cask of biscuit, which being lighter, and perhaps better secured than the rest, was undamaged. This served them for bread a-while; and a fowl of about the bigness of a swan, very heavy and fat, which by reason of its weight could not fly, served them for present subsistence. The poultry of the ship, by some means getting on shore, bred exceedingly, and were a great help to them. They found also in the flags, by a little river, plenty of eggs of fowl, much like our ducks, which were very nourishing food, so that they wanted for nothing to keep them alive.

Mr Pine being now less apprehensive of any thing to disturb him, looked out for a convenient place to build a hut to shelter him and his family from the weather; and, in about a week's time, made a room large enough to hold them all and their goods, and put up hammocks for his family to sleep in.

Having lived in this manner full four months, without seeing or hearing any thing to disturb them, they found the land they were in possession of to be an island, disjoined, and out of sight of any other land, uninhabited by any but themselves, and that there was no hurtful beast to annoy them. But, on the contrary, the country was very pleasant, being always clothed in green, and full of agreeable fruits, and variety of birds, ever warm, and never colder than in England in September; so that this place (had it the culture that skilful people might bestow on it) would prove a paradise.

The woods afforded them a sort of nuts as big as large apples; whose kernel being pleasant and dry, they made use of instead of bread, together with the fowl before-mentioned, and a sort of water-fowl like ducks, and their eggs; and a beast about the size of a goat, and almost such a like creature, which brought forth two young ones at a time, and that twice a year, of which the lowlands and woods are very full; and being harmless and tame, they could easily take and kill them: fish also, especially shell-fish, were in great plenty; so that, in effect, they wanted nothing of food for subsistence.

After being in possession of this country full six months, nature put them in mind of the great command of the Almighty to our first parents, as if they had been conducted thither by the hand of Providence to people a new world. And in this respect they proved not unfruitful; for, in less than a twelvemonth from their first arrival on this island, the females proved all to be with child; and coming at different seasons, they were a great help to one another. The women all had their teemings annually, and the children proved strong and healthy. Their family increasing, they were now well satisfied with their condition; for there was nothing to hurt them. The warmth of the climate made it agreeable for them to go abroad sometimes, and they reposed themselves on mossy banks, shaded by trees. Mr Pine made several pleasant arbors for him and his women to sleep in during the heat of the day; and in these they passed their time together, the females not liking to be out of his company.

Mr Pine's family was increased, after he had lived in this island sixteen years, to forty-seven children: for his first wife brought him thirteen; his second seven; his master's daughter, who seemed to be his greatest favourite, fifteen; and the negro twelve; which was all the produce of the first race of mortals in this island.

Thinking it expedient to provide for another generation, he gave his eldest son a mate; and took care to match the rest as fast as they grew up and were capable. And, lest they should incumber one another, he appointed his sons habitations at some distance from him; for, growing in years, he did not like the wanton annoyance of young company.

After having lived to the sixtieth year of his age, and the fortieth of his being in possession of this island, he summoned his whole people together, children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, amounting to 565, of all sorts. He took the males of one family, and married them to the females of another, not permitting any to marry their sisters, as they did at first out of necessity.

Having taught some of his children to read, he laid them under an injunction to read the Bible once a-month at their general meetings.

Three of his wives being dead, viz. the negro woman, and the other two who had been servant-maids to his master, she who was his master's daughter survived them twelve years. They were buried in a place he had set apart for that purpose, fixing for his own interment the middle part, so that two of his wives might lie on one side of him, and two on the other; with his chief favourites, one on each side, next to him.

Arriving to the eightieth year of his age, and sixtieth of coming to this island, he called his people together a second time; the number of which amounted to 1789; and having informed them of the manners of Europe, and charged them to remember the Christian religion, after the manner of those who spake the same language, and to admit of no other, if any should come and find them out; and praying to God to continue the multiplication of them, and send them the true light of his gospel, he dismissed them.

He called this island The Isle of Pines, and gave the people, descended from him, the name of The English Pines; distinguishing the tribes of the particular descendants by his wives' names, viz. the Englisshes, the Sparkles, the Trevors, and the Phillips, Philippa being the name of the negro.

Being now very old, and his sight decaying, he gave his habitation, and furniture that was left, to his eldest son after his decease; made him king and governor of the rest; and delivered to him the history of these transactions, written with his own hand, commanding him to keep it, and if any strangers should come hither by any accident, to let them see it, and take a copy of it also if they pleased, that the name of this people might not be lost from off the earth.

It happened that, in the year 1667, Cornelius Vann Sloetten, captain of a Dutch ship, called the Amsterdam, was driven by foul weather to this island, where he found the posterity of Mr Pine, speaking good English, and amounting, as it was supposed, to ten or twelve thousand persons.

The narrative from which this account is taken, was given by Mr Pine's grandson to the Dutch captain. Printed in London, being licensed, June 27, 1668.—SCOTS MAGAZINE.

OF THE ISLES OF SCOTLAND IN GENERAL.

[From an Early Geography.]

Now resteth it to speak somewhat of the isles. They are divided (which as it were a crown) in three classes or ranks, the West isles, Orkney isles, and Zeitland isles: the West isles lies in the Deucalidon sea, from Ireland, almost to Orkney, upon the west-side of Scotland, they are called Hebrides, and by some Aebudæ: they are scattered into the Deucalidon sea, to the number of three hundred and above. Of old the kings of Scotland kept these islands in their possession, until the time of Donald, brother to King Malcolm the third, who gave them to the king of Norway, upon condition that he should assist him in usurping of the kingdom of Scotland, against law and reason. The Danes and Norway people kept possession of them for the space of 160 years; and then king Alexander the third, overcoming the Danes and Norway men in a great battle, thrust them out of the isles: yet afterward they attempted to recover their liberty, partly trusting to their own strength, and partly moved by seditions in the main land of this country, creating kings of themselves, as not long ago, John (of the house of Clandonald) did usurp the name of king, as others had done before. In food, raiment, and all things pertaining to their family, they use the ancient frugality of the Scots.

Their banquets are huntings and fishings. They seeth the flesh in the tripe, or else in the skin of the beasts, filling the same full of water. Now and then in hunting they strain out the blood, and eat the flesh raw. Their drink is the broth of sodden flesh. They love very well the drink made of whey, and kept certain years, drinking the same at feasts: it is named of them Blandium. The most part of them drink water. Their custom is to make their bread of oats and barley, (which are the only kinds of grain that grow in these parts.) Experience (with time) hath taught them to make it in such sort, that it is not unpleasant to eat. They take a little of it in the morning, and so passing to the hunting, or any other business, content themselves therewith, without any other kind of meat till evening.

They delight to wear marled cloaths, specially, that have long strips of sundry colours: they love chiefly purple and blue. Their predecessors used short plaids, or mantles of diverse colours, sundry ways divided: and amongst some, the same custom is observed to this day; but for the most part now, they are broun, most near to the colour of the hadder; to the effect, when they lie among the hadder, the bright colour of their plaids shall not bewray them: with the which rather colours, then clad, they suffer the most cruel tempest that blow in the open field, in such sort, that under a writh of snow they sleep sound. In their houses also, they ly upon the ground, laying betwixt them and it brakens or hadder, the roots thereof down, and the tops up, so prettily laid together, that they are as soft as feather-beds, and much more wholesome; for the tops themselves are dry of nature, whereby they dry the weak humours, and restore again the strength of the sinews troubled before, and that so evidently, that they, who at evening go to rest sore and weary, rise in the morning whole and able. As none of these people do care for feather-beds and bedding, so take they great pleasure in rudeness and hardness. If for their own commodity, or upon necessity, they travel to any other country, they reject the feather-beds and bedding of their host: they wrap themselves in their own plaids, so taking their rest careful indeed, lest that barbarous delicacy of the main land (as they term it) corrupt their natural and country hardness.

Their armour wherewith they cover their bodies in time of war, is an iron bonnet and an habergeon, side, almost even to their heels. Their weapons against their enemies, are bows and arrows. The arrows are for the most part hooked, with a barble on either side, which once entered within the body, cannot be drawn forth again, unless the wound be made wider. Some of them fight with broad-swords and axes. In place of a drum, they use a bagpipe. They delight much in musick, but chiefly in harps and clarishoes of their own fashion. The strings of the clarishoes are made of brass-wyre, and the strings of the harps of sinews: which strings they strike either with their nails, growing long, or else with an instrument appointed for that use. They take great pleasure to deck their harps and clarishoes with silver and precious stones; and poor ones that cannot attain hereunto, deck them with chrystal. They sing verses prettily compounded, containing (for the most part) praises of valiant men. There is not almost any other argument, whereof their rimes intreat. They speak the ancient language, altered a little.

WARRANT BY CHARLES II.

IN FAVOUR OF

DON ROSTAINO CANTELMÍ,

DUKE OF POPOLI, AND PRINCE OF PETTORANO,

TO ENABLE HIM TO PROVE HIS DESCENT FROM THE ANCIENT KINGS AND QUEENS OF SCOTLAND.

CHARLES R.

Most dear and most entirely beloved brother, right trustie and well beloved councillors, and trusty and well beloved councillors, we greet you well: There being a representation made unto us by Don Rostaino Cantelmi, a person as well of great honour and esteem, as of eminent trust under his Most Catholick Majestie in the Spanish Netherlands, and brother-germane to the Duke de Populi in the kingdom of Naples: Bearing that the said two brothers being able, by good evidences, to prove the descent of their family to have been from the line of our royall predecessors, kings and queens of that our ancient kingdome, by a continued course of pedigree from about three hundred and thirty years before the Incarnation of our Blessed Saviour to this time; and therefor earnestly desiring that so much justice may be done to them and their family, as to have an account of this their descent entered and continued in the most proper publick records of that our kingdome, and an authentick extract thereof given unto them in the most solemn manner, of the like favour as is usually granted to others in their circumstances: We have now thought fitt to let you know that we, judging this their desire to be very reasonable and just, it is our will and pleasure, and we do hereby authorize and require you to take care that all possible right may be done to them and their family in this their pretension, so far as the same shall be made good unto you by such documents and proofs as are usually received and allowed by you on the like occasions, and that a testification under your great seal of that our ancient kingdome (bearing an exact account of their genealogie and descent) may be granted to them in the most solemne and effectual manner, as the like favour is usually given to persons (of the highest quality) residing in foreign countries, who derive their pedigree from that our kingdome; and particularly, that the same may be presented in this or our next ensuing Parliament there, to the end it may be allowed and approved by them.* For doing of all which this shall be to them and you respectively, and to all others that may be therein concerned, a sufficient warrant, and so we bid you heartily farewell. Given at our Court at Windsor Castle, the 25th day of August 1681, and of our reign the 33d year.

By his Majesty's Command,

MORRAY.

STORY OF DEAN COLE.—A. D. 1558.

In the year 1558, towards the close of the reign of Queen Mary, she had determined to extend her persecution of the Protestants of Ireland, and she signed a commission, empowering Sussex, the Lord-Deputy, to carry her design into effect. This commission was entrusted to Doctor Cole, the dean of St. Paul's, to be conveyed by him to Dublin, who, having arrived at Chester, in his journey

* No traces have been found of any Parliamentary ratification; but the Duke obtained a birth-brief, deducing his pedigree from Fergus the first, and through him from a race of Irish potentates who flourished long before the birth of Christ. This document is referred to by Litta in his Genealogies of illustrious Italian Families; and is, for its absurdity, quite unique.

stopped at an inn, where he was soon waited on by the Mayor, a zealous Romanist. Cole, while conversing with the magistrate, in the exuberance of his zeal, took out of his cloak bag a leathern box, which he said contained a commission to lash the heretics of Ireland. His hostess, who happened to be a Protestant, (having a brother, named John Edmonds, resident in Dublin, who also professed the same creed,) overheard the conversation; and, while the Doctor was complimenting the Mayor down stairs, she took the opportunity to open the box, and, taking the commission out, she put in its place a pack of cards, with the Knave of Clubs uppermost. On returning to his apartment Cole put up his box, without suspecting the trick, and on the next day sailed for Dublin, where he arrived on the 17th of October 1558. He repaired directly to the Castle, and presented the box to the Lord Deputy in full Council, who ordered the Secretary to read her Majesty's commission. But when the box was opened it was found to contain nothing but a pack of cards. The astonishment of the Council at this strange metamorphosis was soon turned into amusement at the learned Doctor's expense, who, vehemently protesting that he had actually received the commission, whatever had become of it, was desired by the Deputy to return for another, while he and the Council would shuffle the cards. Cole did as he was commanded, and procured another commission. But being detained for some days by foul weather, Queen Mary died before he sailed, and thus was the sanguinary project frustrated. The Protestants considered this occurrence as a singular interposition of Providence; and when Lord Sussex related the story to Queen Elizabeth, she sent for Elizabeth Edmonds, the instrument of their preservation, and settled upon her forty pounds a-year for life.

KING CHARLES THE FIRST FOND OF GOLF.

KING CHARLES the first was addicted to golf, if we may believe the following curious story from Wodrow's amusing "Analecta."

February, 1714.—My Lord Ross tells me that he had this account, when in England, from Sir Robert Pye himself, who was a neighbour of his when he lived at Pesey. Sir Robert then was an old man, of about eighty years, and he told him that, when a young man, he came down (1642, I think,) with King Charles the first to Edinburgh. That the King and Court received frequent expressions from the Queen; that one day the King desired those about him to find some body who could ride post, for he had a matter of great importance and haste to despatch to the King, (Queen,) and he would give a handsome reward to any young fellow whom he could trust. Sir Robert was a young sturdy fellow, and standing by, he undertook it. The King gave him the packet out of his own hand, and commanded him to deliver it out of his own hand to the Queen, and to nobody else. Sir Robert undertook and made his journey in less than three days; and when he came, got access to the Queen, and delivered the packet. She retired a little and opened it, and pretty soon came out, calling for the person that brought the letters, and seemed in a transport of joy; and when he told her what he was, and his diligence to bring it quickly to her Majesty, she offered even to embrace him for joy, and said she was mightily obliged to him, and would never forget that service. By what he learned afterwards, he supposed the contents were about the affairs of Ireland, and was of opinion that the King sent by him the warrant under the Privy Seal or Signe Manual for the rising of the Irish Rebels. That he either was present (returning again to Edinburgh to the King) or heard from some who were present, that the King received the full accounts of the massacre in Ireland when playing with the Court at the Links of Leith at the golph, and seemed no ways commoved with it, but went on very cheerfully at his game.

CURIOUS EXTRACTS

FROM THE CALEDONIAN MERCURY—1726. (No. 983.)

Rome July 13—1726

The Chevalier de St George, who has dismissed the major part of his servants, still persists in causing his eldest son to be educated in the persuasion of the Church of England, to the great grief of the Princess Sobieski, who is the more concerned at it, because that Young Gentleman begins to profess it publicly: of which they give this one instance, that as he passed by a church, attended with the Duke of Inverness, as they stile him here he did not kneel down at the singing of the Ave Maria.

London, July 26. The Duke of Liria, son of the Marshall Berwick, is expected here next week from Spain, to visit his grandmother, Mistress Godfrey.*

It is Stated in this St James's Evening Post, July 23, "That Dr Francis Atterbury, late Bishop of Rochester, has accepted of the command of a regiment of Horse in the Emperor's service, and was accordingly set out to 's post at Venlo."†

Mr John Davidson, writer, of Edinburgh, is sworn in to the office of Clerk of the Justiciary, in room of Lord Leslie deceased.‡

GORDON, AUTHOR OF "ITINERARIUM SEPTENTRIONALE."

This has been omitted in the collection of letters written by, or addressed to, the Rev. Robert Wodrow, published by the Society bearing his name. The letter is valuable, as relating to Gordon, the author of the "Itinerarium Septentrionale," of whom so little is known. According to Watts, he died in Carolina, about 1760.§

"Glasgow, August 6, 1725.

"My good friend Mr Gordon having spent a great deal of pains in recovering and preserving any thing of Antiquity in Scotland and the North of England, is come to this country to take an exact survey of the Roman Wall, and hearing you had several things worth notice in your collection that may be of use to his design, is very desirous of seeing them. I know I need not recommend any lover of Antiquity to you, nor beg the favour of allowing Mr Gordon of takyng a copy or draught of what is for his purpose. I

† The notion of the Bishop becoming Colonel of a horse regiment is amusing enough. This evidently was "a base invention of the enemy."

‡ This must have been Montgomery of Lainshaw, who, as heir of line of the last Lord Lisle, assumed the title, and bore it all his lifetime.

§ Most of our readers will remember that the conversation between Monkbarns and Lovel, in the novel of the Antiquary, commences by the latter inquiring what book it was the former seemed to dwell on with such bibliographical delight,—and was informed that it was Sande Gordon's "Itinerarium Septentrionale."

would have seen you with Mr Gordon, but the weather is too warm. I am, Reverend Sir,

ADDRESSED TO

THE HON. MISS MURRAY,

Daughter of Lord Elibank—attributed to Professor Richardson, and not included in his works.

ON SEEING THE HON. MISS MURRAY, AT THE REVIEW OF THE ROYAL HIGHLANDERS ON THE GREEN OF GLASGOW.

GLASGOW, April 1776.

"O quam te memorem virgo! namque haud tibi vultus Mortalis."

VIRGO.

On Glotta's plains, beneath a shade,
An artless swain attun'd his reed,
The echoes round him rung;
Disporting Driads join'd his song,
And jocund swains did round him throng,
While MARY's charms he sung.

Thou virgin of angelic mien!
More lovely far than beauty's queen,
More sweet than blooming May!
As Pallas wise, as Cynthia chaste—
Around thy tender snowy breast,
Love and the Graces play.

When walking with thy noble sire,
Like Venus, queen of soft desire,
With Mars on Ida's grove;
So gracefully you stalked along,
Struck with your charms, th' admiring throng
Proclaimed thee queen of love.

The warblers hail'd thee from the spray,
And virgin throngs, the gladsome lay,
In spite of envy join'd;
And proud t' admire thee, blooming maid!
Clyde 'bove his currents raised his head,
While Nereids throng'd behind.

Nor has indulgent Heaven kind,
Thy worth to outward charms confin'd;
Thou'rt virtuous as thou'rt fair.
May nought disturb her peaceful hours,
But ever, ye immortal powers!
Let MURRAY be your care.

EPITAPH ON ARCHBISHOP LAUD.

Here lies York's famous Metropolitan,
Who was for God, his King, and State: the man
That freed North Wales from blood-shed and from thral,
From the sad misery of War, and all Those Hardships great, that would have ruine brought
To men's estates, their persons, all to naught.

These lines occur in a very scarce poetical tract bearing this title—"Vindication of the late Archbishop of York, from a Scurrilous Libel, printed in the Character of a London Diurnal, wherein England's Apostates are Discovered, a Poem, 4to, 1647." The poor Archbishop was so unpopular with the Puritans, that any thing to his praise deserves to be noticed. Had Charles been a King, in the proper sense of the word, he never would have allowed Laud and Strafford to perish on the scaffold.

* Wodrow, in the MS. Index of his letters, has described this as from "Mr R. Simpson about Mr Gordon the singer." Does he mean to say that Gordon was a professional singer?

Varieties.

MASSACRE OF GLENCO.—Smollett, in his History of England, says "the King, alarmed at the outcry which was raised upon this occasion, ordered an inquiry to be set on foot, and dismissed the Master of Stair from his employment of secretary. He likewise pretended that he had subscribed the order amidst a heap of other papers, without knowing the purport of it. But, as he did not severely punish those who had made his authority subservient to their own cruel revenge, the imputation stuck fast to his character; and the Highlanders, though terrified into silence and submission, were inspired with the most implacable resentment against his person and administration." This affair was taken into consideration by the Scots Parliament in 1695, and a Commission was then granted by the King to inquire into it. The Parliament ordered the King's Advocate to prosecute the Earl of Breadalbane for treason; and having had a copy of the report of the Commission laid before them, they agreed, July 10, on an address to the King, in which they declare unanimously, that his Majesty's instructions of Jan. 11 and 16, 1692, contained a warrant for mercy to all without exception who should offer to take the oath of allegiance, though the 1st of January 1692 was past, and contained no warrant for the execution of the Glencomen made in February thereafter. "We found," so it follows in the address, "that the Master of Stair's letters exceeded your Majesty's instructions; that in the letters the Glencomen are distinguished, not as the fittest subjects of severity, in case they continued obstinate, and made severity necessary, according to the meaning of the instructions, but as men absolutely and positively ordered to be destroyed, without any further consideration than that of their not having taken the indemnity in due time; and their not having taken it is valued as a happy incident, since it afforded an opportunity to destroy them.—We agreed that Lt.-Col. Hamilton was not clear of the murder;—and that Capt. Campbell of Glenlyon, Capt. Drummond, Lieut. Lindsay, Ens. Lundie, and Serj. Barber were the actors in the slaughter of the Glencomen under trust.—As the Master of Stair's excess has been the original cause of this unhappy business, and as he is absent, we beg that your Majesty will give such orders about him, for vindication of your government, as you in your royal wisdom shall think fit; and we humbly desire your Majesty would be pleased to send the actors home [from the army then abroad], and to give orders to prosecute them according to law." The 14th article of the instructions of Jan. 16, 1692, follows. "WILLIAM R. As for Maclean of Glenco, and that tribe, if they can be well distinguished from the rest of the Highlanders, it will be proper, for the vindication of public justice, to extirpate that set of thieves. W. R.]"

SINGULAR PROCESSION IN AULD REEKIE—ANNO 1736.—"July 10. Yesterday nine winches of the Town made an 'amende honorable' through the several streets of the city—the hangman attending them, and Drums beating to the time of "Cuckolds-come-dig." Seven of them were afterwards sent to the House of Correction. They were very naked and meagre beings, and fools into the bargain, for driving a trade which afforded neither food nor Rayment."—CAL. MERCURY.—[What would our good folks now-a-days say to so very strange a procession?]

CUTTY STOOL.—It is not generally known that this Popish relic of penance was unsuccessfully attempted to be put down so far back as 1776. The following extract from a periodical of the time will verify the accuracy of our assertion:—"On Friday, May 31, in the committee appointed by the general assembly for bringing in overtures, a motion was made to bring in an overture for changing the punishment of those found guilty of fornication and adultery from standing on what is called the 'stool of repentance,' into a pecuniary fine. The motion was warmly supported, and as warmly opposed. After a long debate, the gentleman who made the motion agreed to withdraw it; so that the affair was dropped for the present."—Whether the Cutty Stool still lingers in some remote part of Scotland in these intellectual times, we know not; but some twenty years since we saw one, "in viridi observantia," in a church in Dunfermline.

REMARKABLE INSTANCE OF RESENTMENT.—We have a remarkable instance of the continuance of resentment, from Newcastle, of Sept. 6, viz.: "A quarrel having happened between Mr Fitzgerald and Mr Hamilton, when Lieutenants of Marines on board the Centurion, in Com. Anson's voyage, in which Mr Fitzgerald cut a piece off Mr Hamilton's nose with a case-knife, they were separated by some gentlemen; and, to prevent further mischief, the Commodore put Mr Fitzgerald on board the Pearl, and Mr Hamilton on board the Wager, with orders that they should not get on shore together. On May 14, 1741, after rounding Cape Horn, the Wager, Capt. Cheap, was wrecked upon two uninhabited islands, on the coast of Patagonia, in the South seas; where the Captain and crew disagreeing, Mr Hamilton and the Surgeon choosed to share the Captain's fate. The Indians carried these unfortunate gentlemen to St. Jago de Chili, and delivered them to the Spanish Governor, who used them with great humanity. From thence they were sent to Old Spain, and permitted to come home to England; and they arrived at London some time ago. Though it might have been expected, that so long a time, and the great variety of odd circumstances Mr Hamilton had gone through, might have erased the remembrance of the above quarrel, at least cooled his resentment, no sooner had he set his foot on English ground, than he inquired after Mr Fitzgerald; and as soon as he was informed that he was Captain of a company of foot at Fort Augustus, he set out thither to fight him. At Mr Hamilton's arrival at the camp, the challenge was immediately given, and readily accepted. The duel was fought in the rear of the regiment to which Capt. Fitzgerald belonged, when Mr Hamilton run Mr Fitzgerald twice through; but neither of his wounds are mortal; and if it had not been for a Sergeant of the fusiliers that beat down the third pass, Mr Fitzgerald's days would have been ended. However, he is now recovered, and is at Inverness."—SCOTS MAGAZINE, 1746.

AN INDENTURE A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.—After the usual preliminary clauses, it sets forth, that if the said J. D. (the apprentice) shall be "guiltie of the foul fact of fornication, (which God forbid,)" he shall serve two years to his master, over and above the appointed time of his apprenticeship.

LACONIC EPITAPH.—The following epitaph was copied from a Stone in the Church-wall of Dowallie, Perthshire. It is without date, but evidently of great age:—

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A LADY, who is a constant reader of the JOURNAL," will find the matter to which she refers in some measure explained in an article in our present number. Farther particulars will be found in the work alluded to. We will be happy at all times, as far as in our power, to answer the queries, or attend to the requests, of our fair readers.

"J. D." is quite correct. By an overlook, the Scottish MERK, in No. 8, p. 114, is stated to be in value about "Thirteen Shillings STERLING." Now a Merk Scots is Thirteen-pence and a Plack; or, as any unfortunate Jaryman who has been fined for being five minutes behind his time in the Court of Justiciary knows, his penalty of a hundred merks Scots amounts to £5, 11s 1d. 1-3d sterling. The conclusion therefore come to, (p. 16,) that Alexander would net about £150,000 sterling, is fallacious.

THE COUNTRY OF THE CLAN IVOR OF SIR WALTER SCOTT, AND THE AL- BANY OF ANCIENT HISTORIANS.

GLENQUOICH, the country of the chivalrous M'Ivor vic Ian Voir, situated half-way between Crieff and Aberfeldy, is little known to the tourist. This may have been partly owing to its secluded situation, and partly to the wretched condition of the inn, at Amulree, for many years. The traffic on the road being insufficient to support a well-kept place of entertainment, it was for some years converted into the residence of a common farmer, who was equally ignorant of the requirements, and regardless of the comforts, of a respectable class of travellers. The noble proprietor of the estate has lately, however, sent one of his own old landlords to the place; and, for his encouragement, the gentlemen tourists who frequent and patronise the house, have the liberty of the whole trout-fishing of the district; which, we venture to say, is scarcely equalled in Scotland for its extent and variety.

But a visit to Glenquoich will amply repay, not only the lovers of the gentle art, for their trouble, but also those of the lore and antiquities of the olden time, and of the lovely and sublime in Highland landscape. At the entrance of the wild and romantic Glenalmon, through which the tourist passes on his way from Crieff to Amulree, he will find traces of a Roman encampment; while, in the cleft of two dark mountain ravines, peering over it, high upon the face of the hill, like the eye of the mountain eagle, is to be seen the extensive ruins of one of those Celtic fortalices, or watch-houses, commonly called Fin-houses. In Gaelic Fingal is called Fin or Fion; and it is remarkable that the vitrified and circular forts, the remains of which are still numerous in the vicinity of the more northern route of the Romans, and which were evidently erected to watch and direct their movements, should still be called by the same name in the traditions of the people of these regions.

The centre of Glenalmon, by the side of the road, is also to be seen a large stone, surrounded by the remains of a circular dyke, well worthy the notice of the literary tourist. This stone covers the grave of Ossian, whose remains, consisting of bones and ashes, were found buried in the soil, enclosed in the "four grey stones" so pathetically described by himself. By the side of this stone is the peaceful mound called "the soldier's grave;" and which, being annually covered with a green turf, by the road-makers of the district, (for some reason which we had no time to ascertain,) presents a striking but not inappropriate contrast to the cold, desolate, and moss-grown monument of the warrior and bard of the days of other years. It would seem as if the modern war-worn wanderer had crept to the tomb of the aged hero, and contentedly resigned his spirit to wander, with that of Ossian, upon the clouds of the surrounding district. Mr Newte, in his work called "Prospects and Observations on a Tour in England and Scotland," London, 1791, states, that, when the soldiers of General Wade were making the road through Glenalmon, they came on a stone of "an enormous size, measuring seven feet and a-half in length, and five in breadth. They raised the stone with large engines, and discovered under it a coffin full of burnt bones. The coffin consisted of four grey stones, such as are described by Ossian, and which still remain. Ossian's stone, with the four grey stones in which his body are said to have been deposited, are surrounded by a circular dyke two hundred feet in circumference, and three feet in height. The military road passes through its centre."

Before the tranquillity of Glenalmon was disturbed by the road-making General Wade and his soldiers, it was impossible to conceive a spot more lonely and romantic than that chosen for the grave of Ossian. It is exactly such a spot as the imaginative admirer of the aged bard would have selected for his sepulchre, were the wholescenery of the Highlands before his eye, and submitted to his choice. Nor is it less appropriate on account of its scenery than the associations that are likely to have been connected with it. At the head of Glenquoich there is a Celtic fort, which had evidently been constructed for the defenders of the pass that opens northward, within a few miles of one of the stations taken up by the Romans after the battle of the Grampians. The ancient trailroad through the glen was in all probability explored by the Romans, with a view to their northern progress; for there are some tumuli in the vicinity, marking, apparently, the arena of a skirmish between the defenders of the pass and the invaders. Within three miles of this pass, eastwards, (towards the grave of Ossian,) are the remains of Caistialchroe; i. e., the castle or fortalice of the booths; erected also, evidently, for the accommodation of the defenders of the pass of Corrie, which runs parallel with the western pass already mentioned, to the vicinity of the same station. The next pass, running nearly parallel with the two above mentioned, is that of Glenalmon, at the south-east end of which are the great Celtic forts and remains already mentioned. In the vicinity of this latter a battle must have been fought, from the number of cath, or battle stones, still existing there. Nor could we discern any traces of Roman roads or camps from the one above mentioned between Crieff and Aberfeldy. There is certainly a great cairn on the moor, half-way between Amulree and Aberfeldy, which indicates the field of no ordinary battle; but no Roman remains are to be found in the vicinity; and we were not fortunate enough, during our short stay at Amulree, to discover any person capable of giving us the history of the "Carn-glas," or grey cairn, as it is called.

In the absence of all traces of Roman roads or encampments, between the south-east end of Glenalmon and the great northern encampment at Fortingall, we may venture to conclude that the Caledonians had been successful in the defence of these three glens or passes; and that the Romans had accordingly detoured towards Perth, and subsequently proceeded northward by the wider and safer passage of Strathay. The probability, therefore, is, that the scene of Ossian's grave had been selected, not more for the wild and lonely beauty of the spot itself, than for its association with a successful struggle in defence of the country of the Albani, his father's tribe, against the legions of "the kings of the world."

Mr Newte, in reference to Ossian's grave, states that he had "further learned, that when Ossian's stone was moved, and the coffin containing the supposed remains discovered, it was intended, by the officer commanding the party of soldiers employed on the military road, to let the bones remain within the stone sepulchre until General Wade should come to see them, or his mind be known on the subject. But the people of the country, for several miles round, to the number of three or four scores of men, rose with one consent, and carried away the bones, with the bagpipes playing, and other funeral rites, and deposited them, with much solemnity, within a circle of large stones, on the lofty summit of a rock, sequestered and of difficult access, where they might never more be disturbed by mortal feet or hands, in the wild recesses of the western Glenalmon. One Christie, who is considered as the Cicerone and antiquary of Glenalmon, and many other persons, yet alive, attest the fact, and point out the second sepulchre of the son of Fingal."

An island on the south side of Lochfraoch, (which was evidently at one time of much larger dimensions than it is at present—so that the island may have formerly been as near the north as the south side), is the scene of the ancient ballad of Fraoch; an imperfect copy of which was published in Hill's Collection, at Perth, about sixty years ago. The tradition states that Mai, or May, (which appears to have been the ancient name of the loch also,) was in love with Fraoch, and that Fraoch did not reciprocate her passion, being in love with her step-daughter. The island was remarkable for a shrub, the fruit of which was supposed capable of affording "a balm for every wound, and a cure for every woe;" but it was defended by a venomous monster, who made his lair at the foot of it. Tradition does not describe the animal; and all we could learn on the spot was, that the place had, for a long period, been almost converted into a desert by another animal or monster of the same description, which was rapacious for human victims. The monster is called the Beist in the poem, as well as the tradition connected with it.

Fraoch was one of the warriors stationed at Caistialchroë—the castle of the booths—to defend the pass of Corrie against the Romans, and appears to have been thoroughly imbued with those principles of romantic chivalry ascribed, by tradition, to the Fingalians. May, who seems to have been not less crafty and cruel than she was exquisitely beautiful, finding her love slighted, and her step-daughter preferred, determined to be revenged, and availed herself of the chivalrous feelings of Fraoch for the accomplishment of her purpose.

She feigned sickness, and, sending for Fraoch, engaged him to attempt "the adventure of the tree," and to bring her a bunch of the charmed fruit. To refuse would have been considered inconsistent with the romantic heroism of the times. Fraoch, accordingly, committed himself to the flood, and, swimming from the northern shore to the island, returned to her in safety, with a bunch of the fruit. She then feigned that her cure could only be effected by the possession of the whole shrub; and Fraoch again undertook the adventure, the result of which is told in the verses.

We have, in our younger days, seen an elegant version of the poem of Fraoch; we think in Stewart's collection; but that one now before us is the barbarous one of Hill's; which seems to have been copied from oral recitation by some one who did not understand Gaelic, and contented himself by taking down an imitation of the sounds of the reciter's voice. The following verses will, therefore, appear to the Gaelic scholar as a plagiarism rather than a translation—since we have merely transcribed the adventure, rather than the original ballad, in our version:—

DAN FHRAOICH—(FRAOCH).

Ah me, the voice of war may rave
Around thee, Castlereoe,
And warriors to the conflict rush,
And maidens sink in woe;

But never more shall Fraoch Macfay,
Respond to wars alarms,
Nor lead, to meet his country's foe,
The Finian hosts in arms.

In yonder cairn the fair-haired chief,
Alas! is lowly laid—
He fell, because he lov'd not May,
But Carol's beauteous maid.

May lov'd him with a guilty love,
And he escaped the snare;
But who escapes the vengeful ire,
That fires the wicked fair.

She feigns a sickness dark and deep,
On sorrow's couch she lies,
Her large blue eyes shine through her tears,
Her bosom heaves with sighs—

Her eyes that shone like humid stars,
O'er Almon's showery glen—
Her bosom, where love sat enthroned,
To rule the hearts of men—

Her rounded arm of purest snow,
Beneath her cheek is laid,
And o'er that arm and lovely cheek,
Her heavy hair is spread

In flowing traces, soft and bright,
As if they would conceal
The lustre of her dazzling charms,
Or show them through a veil.

She sent for Fraoch—the warrior came;
She, trembling seized his hand,
And fondly gazing in his eyes,
Thus breathed in accents bland:—

"My health is gone, my heart is sick,
I sink in hopeless woe,
And feel the heavy hand of death
Press'd coldly on my brow.

"Is vain for me, in May's fair Isle,
Is hung, on wavy boughs,
The charm'd fruit, which heals men's wounds,
And soothes young matron's throes;

"And from the mem'ry gently blots
The wild and tortuous train,
Of whirling thoughts, that tear the heart,
And throb within the brain.

"Oh, why should I desire to live?
To nurse a bootless flame?
Not hence frail joys and fleeting charms,
Rarewell to love and fame!

"And yet—oh, yet, I'd cling to life,
Will, fondly, I would prove,
That in the generous heart of Fraoch
There's pity, if not love.

"But why should Fraoch attempt a deed,
Which none of mortal men
Have yet achieved, though some have dared
To seek the monster's den?

"Back! warrior, back! oh do not tempt,
The monster to the strife;
Why should thy blooming form be marr'd
To save May's hated life?"

The stately warrior, proud and high,
At her alarm smiled—
"I never shrink from a behest,
From peril ne'er recoil'd.

"And, oh, I do not hate thee, May,
But dearly long to prove,
I value thee above all on earth—
Save my fair fame and love.

"Come! test and prove me:—for thy sake
I seek the monster's den,
Though I would rather meet in strife
The first of mortal men!

"But I love Carol's peerless maid,
And if for thee I fall,
Oh comfort her—she loves but me,
Though she is loved by all."

The warrior sought, with graceful steps,
The dark loch's wave-worn side;
Then quickly, fearlessly advanc'd,
And plung'd him in the tide.

He found the monster sound asleep,
But his extended claws
Appear'd to grasp the glowing fruit—
And eke his hideous jaws.

With daring hand he snatch'd a bunch,
Then sought the northern strand,
And, bounding to the house of May,
Consign'd it to her hand.

"Alas!" she sighed, "heroic youth,
Thy task thou'st bravely done;
But, ah, the virtue of the shrub
Is in the root alone.

"But do not thou again attempt
The adventure of the tree;
It claims a warrior firm and stern,
And not a youth like thee."

His pale face flush'd, his warlike form
Assum'd a loftier size;
Again he sought the subtle loch,
And through the flood he plies.

The playful waves, with am'rous curl,
Embrace his snowy side,
And brighten as they touch his form,
Upborne upon the tide.

He snatch'd the tree, and, at his grasp,
The crashing roots give way—
The monster fiercely spurns his lair,
And plunges in the bay.

Speed Fraoch! oh speed thee to the shore—
See how the monster plies;
The waves are churned in his course,
And lighted by his eyes.

Scarcely had the warrior touched the strand,
Before its spear-like claws
Had seized him, and his mighty arm
Was crush'd within its jaws.

Alas! behold the youth distress'd—
Oh had he but a knife!
No tears should bathe the maiden's cheeks,
And short had been the strife.

He rais'd his voice, the maiden came,
Like lightning to the strand;
The dirk he left upon the beach,
She gave into his hand.

He plunged it in the monster's throat—
It fell upon the shore;
But, ah, the hero's manly breast,
Is torn and steep'd in gore.

"Where art thou, love?" he faintly cries;
"The mist obscures my sight;
Oh let me feel thee in my arms—
My bosom's joy and light.

"Now, let us rest—a moment rest—
Upon the dusky shore;
Thy breath will animate my heart,
My failing strength restore."

He slowly sinks upon the beach—
Ah me, what tongue may tell
The piercing wildness of her shriek,
As on his breast she fell.

THE REGALIA, OR "HONOURS" OF SCOTLAND."

At the period of the Union, every reader must remember the strong agitation which pervaded the minds of the Scottish nation, who could not, for many years, be persuaded to consider this incorporating treaty in any other view than as a wanton surrender of their national independence. So deep was this sentiment; that a popular preacher in the south of Scotland, who died about the middle of last century, confessed to his friends, that he was never able to deliver a sermon, upon whatever subject, without introducing a hit at the Union. While the public mind was in such an inflamed matory state, and watching, as it were, for subjects of offence and suspicion, the fate of the Regalia, the visible mark and type of Scotland's independence, excited deep interest. The opposers of the Union, availing themselves of this feeling, industriously circulated a report that the Honours of the kingdom were to be transported to England, as a token of the complete humiliation of her ancient rival. This surmise was circulated in lampoons too coarse for quotation, and it served to animate one of Lord Belhaven's eloquent invectives against the projected Union. "Hannibal," he exclaimed, calling on the Scottish nobles and commons to unite against the public danger,—"Hannibal is come within our gates; Hannibal is come within the length of this table; he is at the foot of the throne. He will seize upon these Regalia; he will take them as his spolia opima. He will whip us out of this house, never to return again."

As if to show that these apprehensions were not entertained without grounds, and that the surreptitious removal of the Regalia was an evil to be guarded against, it was moved by the opposers of the Union, when the twenty-fourth article of the treaty was under discussion, "That the Crown, Sceptre, and Sword of State, Records of Parliament, &c., continue to be kept as they are within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland; and that they shall so remain, in all times coming, notwithstanding the Union." The amendment was readily adopted by the framers and managers of the treaty, sufficiently willing, in their turn, to show that they meditated no such gratuitous insult upon their country as was imputed to them. The clause passed unanimously, and forms part of the great national treaty.

The Sceptre of Scotland performed its last grand legislative office, by ratifying the Treaty of Union, on the 16th of January, 1707. The Earl of Seafield, then Chancellor, on returning it to the clerk, is reported to have brutally and scornfully applied the vulgar phrase, "There is an end of an auld sang;"—an insult for which he deserved to have been destroyed on the spot by his indignant countrymen. The rest of the Session was employed chiefly in passing private bills; on the 25th of March it was adjourned—never to meet again;—and on the 28th of April, 1707, the Parliament of Scotland was finally dissolved by proclamation.

From this period the charge of the Regalia, which devolved on the Earl Maréchal during the Sessions of the Scottish Parliament, terminated for ever; and in surrendering them, for the last time, to the Earl of Glasgow, Treasurer-Depute of Scotland, William, the ninth Earl Maréchal, displayed a feeling extremely different from that evinced by Lord Seafield. That noble person having opposed the Union in all its stages, declined witnessing in person the final consummation, by the surrender of the Regalia to dust and oblivion. He appeared, however, by his procurator, William Wilson, one of the depute-clerks of Session, who took a long protest, which has been often printed, describing the Regalia in terms which lead to an exaggerated idea of their value; protesting that they should not be removed from the Castle of Edinburgh, without warning given to him, or to the successor in his title and office.

A numerous body of respectable witnesses placed their names to this instrument. One copy was deposited in the chest, and many others were distributed by the Earl Maréchal to the Universities and other public bodies throughout the kingdom.

The Regalia of Scotland, with the Treasurer's Mace, were deposited in the great oak chest with three keys, which is often mentioned in the Records as a place wherein they were kept. The chest was left in the Crown-room of Edinburgh Castle, a vaulted apartment in the square, having the window defended by strong iron gratings, and the entrance secured by a strong grated door of iron, and an outward door of oak, thick studded with iron nails, both fastened with strong locks and bars. It does not appear to whom the keys of the Crown-room and chest were intrusted, nor have they ever since been found.

The government of the day were, no doubt, glad to have these objects removed from the sight of the Scottish public, connected as they now were with feelings, irritable, and hostile in a high degree to the Union, and to the existing state of things. But when the people observed that the Regalia were no longer made visible to the subjects, they fell into the error of concluding that they were either no longer in existence, or had been secretly transferred to England. The gratuitous absurdity of so useless a breach of the Union, was, in the opinion of many, no reason for disbelieving the injurious surmise. They said such insults were often committed in the mere wantonness of power, or from the desire to mortify a proud people. Mons-Meg, it was remarked, though regarded then as a national palladium, and though totally useless except as a curiosity, had been removed to the Tower of London, in the pragmatical wantonness of official authority, and to the great scandal of the Scottish populace. It was argued, that a similar senseless exertion of power might have removed the Regalia, or that they might have been withdrawn on mere political grounds, lest they should have fallen into the hands of the Jacobites, who more than once threatened to surprise Edinburgh Castle. These suspicions were strengthened by the recollection, that, from some circumstance which has never been explained, a crown has been always shown in the Jewel Office of the Tower, said to be that of Scotland. Whether the royal ornament be the Crown of the Scottish Queen, mentioned in Tennant's Inventory, which may have been carried by James VI. to England, or whether it be the Crown made for Mary of Modena, Consort of James II., or some other diadem, is a question we have no means of deciding. That it is not the royal Crown of Scotland, is now evident. But it was long suspected to be so; and even Arnot, the historian of Edinburgh, influenced perhaps by certain political prejudices, gives currency to the surmise that the Regalia had been secretly removed from the kingdom. "Since the Regalia," says that author, "were deposited, no governor of the Castle, upon his admission, has made inquiry if they were left secure by his predecessor."

No mortal has been known to have seen them. Whether it was, that the Government entertained a jealousy that the Scots, in their fickleness or disgust, would repent themselves of the Union, or that they dreaded the Regalia might, upon an invasion, fall into the hands of the House of Stuart, it appears probable that the Regalia have been privately removed, by a secret order from the Court; for it is impossible that any governor of the Castle would abstract them without authority. If, after this general surmise, so publicly thrown out, the officers of State and governor of Edinburgh Castle will not make personal inquiry, whether the Regalia of Scotland be in the Castle, the public will be entitled to conclude, that they are not there, and that they have been carried off by private orders from Court."

These feelings, however, passed away; the memory of the Regalia became like that of a tale which had been told, and their dubious existence was altogether forgotten, excepting when the superstitious sentinel looked up with some feelings of awe at the window of the mysterious chamber which had not been opened for a century; or when some national bard apostrophized

—"The steep and iron-belted rock,

Where trusted lie the monarchy's last gems,
The sceptre, sword, and crown, that graced the brows,
Since Father Fergus, of an hundred kings."

—ALBANY, A POEM.

In the year 1794, the Crown-room was opened by special warrant under the Royal Sign Manual to search for certain records which it was supposed might possibly have been deposited there. The dust of a century was upon the floor; the ashes of the last fire remained still in the chimney; no object was to be seen, excepting the great oak-chest so often mentioned, which the Commissioners had no authority to open, their warrant having no relation to the Regalia. The Crown-room was secured with additional fastenings, and was again left to solitude and silence; the fate of the Honours of Scotland remaining thus as uncertain as ever.

At length, in 1817, his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, afterwards George the Fourth, influenced by that regard for the history and antiquities of his kingdom which well became his high station, and not uninterested, we may presume, in the development of the mystery which had so long hung over the insignia of royalty, was pleased to offer his warrant to the Scottish officers of State, and other public officers therein named, directing them to open the Crown-room and search for the Regalia, in order that their existence might be ascertained, and measures taken for their preservation.

In virtue of this new warrant, many of the Commissioners being detained by absence from Edinburgh, the gentlemen under-named assembled in the Governor's house, for the purpose of executing the duty entrusted to them, viz. the Lord President of the Court of Session, the Lord Justice-Clerk, the Lord Chief Commissioner of the Jury Court, Major-General John Hope, the Solicitor-General, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Mr Walter Scott, one of the Principal Clerks of Session, William Clerk, Esq. Principal Clerk to the Jury Court, Sir Henry Jardine, King's Remembrancer in Exchequer, and Thomas Thomson, Esq. Deputy Clerk Register of Scotland.

It was with feelings of no common anxiety that the Commissioners, having read their warrant, proceeded to the Crown-room; and having found all there in the state in which it had been left in 1794, commanded the King's Smith, who was in attendance, to force open the great chest, the keys of which had been sought for in vain. The general persuasion that the Regalia had been secretly removed, weighed heavy on the mind of all while the labour proceeded. The chest seemed to return a hollow and empty sound to the strokes of the hammer; and even those whose expectations had been most sanguine, felt at the moment the probability of disappointment, and could not but be sensible, that, should the result of the search confirm those forebodings, it would only serve to show that a national affront and injury had been sustained, for which it might be difficult, or rather impossible, to obtain any redress. The joy was therefore extreme when, the ponderous lid of the chest being forced open, at the expense of some time and labour, the Regalia were discovered lying at the bottom covered with linen cloths, exactly as they had been left in the year 1707, being about a hundred and ten years since they had been surrendered by William, the ninth Earl Marshell, to the custody of the Earl of Glasgow, Treasurer-Depute of Scotland. The relics were passed from hand to hand, and greeted with the affectionate reverence which emblems so venerable, restored to public view after the slumber of more than a hundred years, were so peculiarly calculated to excite. The discovery was instantly communicated to the public by the display of the royal standard from the Castle, and was greeted by the shouts of the soldiers in garrison, and a multitude of people assembled on the Castle-hill; indeed, the rejoicing was so general and sincere, as plainly to show, that, however altered in other respects, the people of Scotland had lost nothing of that national enthusiasm which formerly had displayed itself in grief for the loss of those emblematic Honours, and now was expressed in joy for their recovery.

There was found in the chest with the Regalia a silver rod or mace, topped with a globe, apparently deposited there by the Earl of Glasgow, and which proves to be the mace of office peculiar to the Treasurer of Scotland. It is mentioned in the discharge granted by the Privy Council to Sir Patrick Murray, in 1621.

In order to gratify a curiosity which has something in it so generous, his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, to whom these proceedings were reported, was pleased to commit the charge of the Regalia to the officers of State, that they might be exhibited to the public under proper precautions for their preservation.

In consequence of the powers entrusted to them, the officers of State named Captain Adam Ferguson, son of the celebrated Historian, and long an officer of the Peninsular army, to be the Deputy-Keeper of the Regalia. With equal propriety of selection, two Yeomen Keepers were chosen, veteran non-commissioned officers of excellent charafter, who shared the dangers and fate of Waterloo. The room in which the Regalia are exhibited to the curiosity of the public is handsomely fitted up in the form of a tent, and where they are properly protected from the risk of injury. The dress of the attendants being that of the ancient yeomen of the guards, as represented in a curious picture of the Duke of Albany and Queen Margaret, preserved at Luton, joined to the military medals which the men themselves had gained, has an antique and imposing appearance, well corresponding with the character of the relics of ancient monarchy entrusted to their charge.

THE BRODIE MANUSCRIPT.*

BURNING OF WITCHES IN FORRES.

[From the "Forres Gazette," a monthly newspaper, well conducted, and of good local circulation.]

In the year 1663 a crusade was prosecuted against the witches in the north, under the auspices of Mr Colville—the celebrated witch-finder. We have been informed that among other infallible tests was that of forcing a darning needle an inch into the fleshy parts of their bodies. If this operation drew blood, and gave extreme pain, the victim was released; if not, she was set down as in compact with the Evil One. This test is not hinted at by Mr Brodie. It is a fact worthy of remark, that if a person rub a noodle with ear-wax, he may safely drive it an inch or more, without feeling pain, into the calf of his leg, or any other muscular part of the body, and may withdraw it without the slightest appearance of blood. Mons. Piccioni, an Italian portrait painter, frequently performed this feat, for a little diversion, in our presence, with the result stated. Mr Colville, with a knowledge of this trick, might have applied his test, and burned both old and young women in scores for witches. We have put together all the notices of the witch hunting and burning which occurs in the volume, omitting the intermediate entries. These notices are highly curious and interesting, and while they exhibit the scruples that some conscious men had against taking part in such proceedings, they give a melancholy manifestation of the anxiety of even otherwise intelligent men to find these poor old women in league with Satan, and at every sacrifice of feeling purge the land with their blood! The Bailies of Forres carried the sentence into execution, probably at the howe of Drumduan—the usual place—although it appears they did not engage in it without some reluctance. Brodie was strongly impressed with the idea that these women were in regular combination with Satan, but his zeal was not according to knowledge. We suspect Bishop McKenzie of Elgin had a strong hand in the burning of the witches, which took place in his diocese at this period.

* The MS. diary of Alexander Brodie of Brodie, in the vicinity of Forres. He was a staunch Covenanter, and an eminent man in his day. He was a Senator of the College of Justice, and one of the deputies sent by the Parliament to Holland before the Restoration, to confer with the Prince, afterwards Charles II.

Edinburgh—1662-3.

June 15. Fast day. Among other things I am desiring this day to lay to heart the prevailing of the devil by witchcraft. Oh this is a sad token of displeasure when thou permits him to deceive, tempt, and to prosper, and ther his visible kingdom takis ishue expresslie, as thou had given up that place where I had my residence, and the inhabitants of it to be the divel's property and possession. What comfort can I have in it. Shall I not bewail this dispensation—the many snares—the spreading of sin—the destroying so many immortal souls, and even in that place where I live. What does this say to me? Oh search, search for thy name's sake; discover in the meantime, and destroy as thou discovers his works. Let the land be purged and not given over for thy name's (sake), nor do thou charge this sin on me, or on my father's hous—nor the causes of it; nor our accession to it, &c.

19. Dr Yong dined with me. I did see the Ladi Kenmour afternoon, and found much bitterness, passion, and heat in her against the times.

22. I met wit Mr Coluill, and conferred anent witches. He told me, 1st, A deposition that they saw persons there cannot, without other evidence, prove them present, becaus the divel can mak appearances fals. 2, He said the mark is not infallible, becaus physicians think, by natural means, the flesh may be deadened, and feeling taken away. 3, That they could not reallie transport themselves whether they pleased, for they would be oft at that same instant in thos places visible lying on their back, quhill they seemed in their imaginations to be carried to other places far off. 4, Lykwise as to shapes; but what to say as to shape or form trulie I cannot tell. He said he would have me on a particular commission, but this I desired not, nor will I put myself on any such employment; albeit as to serving God in this if cald, I would get grace to glorifi him and to follow his call. But 5, The men of the tyme have me in that dislyk that they will not be thankful to have me made use of in ani thing; so I reverence the Lord's providence, but my mind shall still be lifted up to God for mercie to the land in this particular, and that he would glorifi himself in discovering and destroying all these and other works of the divel—may rais up zealous and able men, and willing, and of good understanding for this effect; and that he would not give over the land to be possesst by divels; for the land is his; he has set up his name and tabernacle in it; and we are called by him. Oh give not over as thou art threatening; but recover for thy name's sake. Destroy this dragon, for he fights against our Michael; he and his angels—his wicked angels; his natur, operations, working, subtilti is kept from our sense and reasoning, nor can we get it learned without thou open our eyes, and tak away the veil that's on our minds, and on thy word. He knows what we are about, we know not what he is about, nor when or how he works. All that we do or ar is obvious to him, but nothing that he does is obvious to us; nay, nor the poor wretches whom he deludes; this is their disadvantage, his advantage. But let this be made up in our head Jes. Ch., for he has far mor odds of him than he has over us. Being God—the son of God over al blessed for ever to whom is committed al power in earth and heaven, whom divels are bound to acknowledge and obey, who has conquered him already in our nature, spoiled, disarmed, vanquished, and triumphed over him—the blest seed that should bruise the head of the serpent; in whom al the nations of the earth ar blest. Who has redeemed best mankind by his blood, and delivered us from satan—his rag, dominion, power, temptations; wyle, violence, that we may serve the living God all our lyfe. Satan is that evil up which fell from his place; the father of lies; is as the serpent from the beginning; the serpent, old, steeled, red dragon; accuser, tempter, the leviant; Lucifer, enemie to mankind and our salvation; the roaring lion; adversarie: head of thos members and instruments whom he helps and strengthens to work al ungodlines and unrighteousness; opposit to God and his nature purely and perfectly. The destroyer; keeper of the bottomless pit; prince of darkness. But our head and Lord is by natur the son of God, as well as man, so that God is satan's enemie, when he has to do with us. The Saviour of mankind: Jehovah our righteousness; the holi One of God; ful of grace and ful of truth; in whom the Godhead dwells bodilie; who has received the spirit without measure, &c., &c.

June 29.—D. D. I found bodilie infirmities upon me, which did hinder me from the public worship afternoon. I found my inclination pron to lean to frets and superstitious observances. But for thy word which I will have recourse to, for light to direct my steps.

July 7. I returned to Edr having heard som report from Mr Alex. Colville of the witches he had caused to be apprehended and burnt. My son and his wife went out to Newbottle * * * * * Oldman's basie with thes poor children of mine. Bishop Haliburton of Dunkeld came over (from the cairn) with us.

and . . . (Returned to Brodie.)

Sept. 28. I desir, if the Lord permit, to set the Sabbath apart, both in humble thankfulness to praise him for his common mercie in my return, and in the ishue of our troubl. As lykways to be warned for the outbreking of sin in this place, with the prevailing of the divel; and to supplicat the Lord that his wrath may be turned away. He would not let himself be driven out of his own land by sathan; nor out of this place. We would thank him, and pray the Lord to give his spirit, wisdom, zeal for finding out the crafty workings of the divel, and that he may be cast out.

My son went to Aldern to see the trial of Elizabeth Haddon; who adhered to her confession, and was condemned.

I was desired to goe to Aldern anent Elizabeth Haddon: had som reluctance lest I should be led out of my line and calling; yet efter an answer to God, I obeyed, but did not see or speak with the poor woman, knowing that it was the will of the Lord that she had the commission, and she did forbear. I heard much of her blaming Bessi Hay as a teacher and partner in the witchcraft * * * Let God manifest himself in making wickedness manifest, and in bringing it to light. I neither would press her to tell nor yet hinder her, only exhort her to do nothing ignorantli, or out of ani sinisterous end * * * Let God have glori.

D. D.—Oct. 5. (Among other evils lamented under this entry there is) 6thly. The sin of witchcraft and divelrie which prevailed, and cannot be gotten discovered and purged out. Satan having set up his very throne among us.

Oct. 7 and 8. I heard that at Inverness there was non of the witches condemned, and desired to consider this, and be instructed. This, if God prevent not, will be of verie ill example.

April 18, 1664. This was a meeting of the Commissioners for the witches. Moorton declined, so did Park this day. They becam obstinat and denied all that they had confessed. I was in great darkness anent this matter; being desirous that sin might be discovered and punished, on the one pt.; their denial; difficulti of proving, and the restriction of the commission, on the other pt., straitening. I again and again besought the Lord to mak truth appear, and to bring it forth to victorie—to guid the Judges and to give them understanding; to guid us that we be not blinded wt. carnal passion or prejudice or mistake; to open the hearts and mouths of the poor wretches and to order this matter to his glori. It troubled me that ani constraint should have been used to them—that they should have been beaten. My piti needs to be guided, and my fear and my zeal.

April 23. I kept at Forres anent the witches, and desir to have my soul exercised before the Lord, for ordering that matter, and going before us, giving light and understanding: opening the way and guiding us in it, that he may be glorified, sathan and his kingdom borne down, and wickedness punished. This is a work of darknes. The Lord did then discover a litl mor clearnes in the commission for the encouragement of thos employed. I thought fit one should be directed to the Bishop to communicat with him, and to get his advice. Let not this turn to be a snare to us. Grang, his absence, whether voluntari or of necessity I know not, but it hindred ws.

29. This day we wer called to Forres, anent the witches. Moorton was so scrupulous that he would scarce meit, but resolved not to vote. Again I desired grace from the Lord for my own and my son's direction, that in this we may not do our own work, nor follow ani base passion, or blind zeal of our own spirits. That thos may be guided which are appointed to Judge, and God may vouchsaf mercie to the poor witches to open their eyes, and their mouth, to get himself glori in them. He may direct the whole matter in his wisdom and mercie, for his glori, and the bearing down of wickedness. That witnesses Sys. and pnrns. may be guided; and I cast all over on his Majestie.

There was litl don, becaus there was not a quorum of the commissioners. Moorton declined even after he promised, which made our meeting uneffectual. I desired to consider this, and to repare the Lord's providence, and yet depends on him for further counsel; and commits the ordering of this matter to God.

May 1. This day was appointed for trial of the witches; we had met with other impediments hitherto; what we may meet with, or what may fall out this day we know not. Let's desir to comitt ourselves, even our minds and spirits to God, and the ishue and ordering of that which we are about, that it may be to his glori; the bearing down of sin; terrour of others, and the comfort of thos that are employed in it. And the Lord did accordingly give som ishue. The poor creatures wer found gulti, and condemned to die. The witnesses agreed clearly and fullie, but sathan hardened them to denie; lat the Lord overcom their obduratenes in his own tym. Grange was not clear, albeit he consented to the assize, yet he was avers from the sentence of death. I desired to be touched with som human affection towards thes wretched creatures, and bewail their sin and miserie. But I cannot win to thoughts of God and his holines, suitable to him, nor of eternitie, and his justice, &c. They did recommend it to the Baillies of Forres to tak car of the prisoners, and provid for the execution, which did so irritat that ther was no peace. I desired not to be looked on as the pursuar of thes poor creatures, and therefor left it on them. Let the Lord guid my spirit in what remains. Park cam home with me and noo importunitie could stay him al night.

2. I sent to Mr Henri to com and wait on the witches, to see if God would open their heart to give God glori, and confess their sins, &c.

May 4. The L. of Eight cam and saw me, and in the afternoon Isobel (Elder) Elsher, and Isobel Simson wer brunt at Forres: died obstinat, and the Lord seems to shut the dor, and that that wickedness should be discovered and expeld out of the land. Oh let the Lord glorifi himself, bring down the kingdom of sathan and deliver us.

THE EARL OF MELROS (AFTERWARDS HADDINGTON) TO K. JAMES VI.

[This letter gives a very interesting account of a sea fight, in 1622, between two Dutch vessels and a Dunkirk vessel, in the Frith of Forth, directly opposite Leith.]

Most Sacred Soverayn,

Your maiesties letter, commanding the Dunkerker, being in the herbrie or roade of Leith, to be used as subjects of a prince in friendship with your maiestie, and to be furnished of necessaries for themselves and their shippes, at reasonable rates, was presented to your counsel upon the eleuint of this moneth, and assurance guen to the bearer and capten of the ship, that, behaving themselues peaceablie, they could be no worse vsed nor your maiesties owne subjects. Commandement was then guen to the prouest and bailies of this towne, that they and their water bailie in Leith, sould sie your maiesties will in that busines fullie accomplished. The shipplay in the roade, and the souldiours repaired to land as they pleased, till Wednesday at night, that two Holland waughters arriued, and fand a pinage of theirs neere the Dunkerker, who, about one in the morning, assailed the Dunkerker, who made good resistance, and first repulsed them from boarding, and thereafter by the space of two houres, interchanged a great number of shot on either side, and many wounded. Before foure, some of the Dunkerkers, who were a land, and saw what had hapned, came and aduertised me that the combat wes onlie surceased, because the ebbing sea had broght all the shippes on ground, who, so soone as the water sould rise, would renew their combat, which they prayed me to prevent. My Lord Chancelar and Thesaurar being absent, I made speedie warning to the small number of counsellors being in towne, to conueene, and directed the prouest and bailies to come before them, and likeways sent for the constable of the castell and admirall depute. Meeting first with the magistrates, I directed them to warne their citizens to be in armes, readie to marche whether the counsell sould command them for your maiesties seruice, and commanded the constable to haue the cannoners, with ordonance, and all necessarie furniture, readie to be employed in your seruice, by the counsell: Who, conueening, sent a charge with the water bailie, with ane herald and trumpetour, to command both parties, in your maiesties name, to keep your peace, and forbear inuasion one of another, vpon the land or narrow waters, and that each ship sould send a principall man to the counsell. Which being obeyed, I told the Hollanders, in your maiestie and your counsels name, that great offence was taken at their presumption, to trouble any man, being subiect of a prince in amitie with your maiestie, in the verie mouth of the principall herbrie of this your kingdom, they of all others being most bund in humble respect to the effects of your royall fauour to them, notour to all the world. They excused the mater, compleaning that the Dunkerker had, within your maiesties waters, assailed and forced their cuntrie shippes, killed of their men, and had deteaned a number of prisoners, whom, they requiring to be rendered, the others refusal to do them reason, had made them to repaire violent injurie by lafull inuasion, and desired that the counsell might cause the Dunkerker restore their men. I answered, that your maiestie was friend to both, but that your counsell wer not to be arbiters of their controuersies, but freindlie receiuers of both parties, who sould behane them selues peaceablie, and of new commanded them to forbear all violence to their aduersars in this cuntrie, or your maiesties narrow waters: and thereafter, calling for the Dunkerker, told him of the Hollanders complaint and wrong done by him, on your maiesties coast, which he denied, affirming that what he had done wes in the rowme sess. We proponed the restitution of the prisoners, which he excused; but both promised to keepe your maiesties peace. The Dunkerker desired parmission to enter the herbrie of Leith, which wes granted, and I think the others will do the like. The admirall depute wes directed to try what the seamen at Leith could performe, if we had found any of the strangers disobedient. He reported that they were altogether vnable, and saw no way to force them to obedience, but by bringing ordonance from the castell to the shoare, to ding them so long as they could be within shot.* If they shall keep promise of obedience, we will be released of that difficultie at this time; but I will humbly beseech your maiestie to consider and direct what course, your counsell shall take at the like occasions, which may frequentlie occurre heirefter, in respect of the number of warre shippes of both parties, in thir seas of late, now liklie to continew, unless your maiestie, by your excellent wisdoms and royall autoritie, prevent it. We have commanded the captaines of both parties to be before the counsell tomorrow, and are informed that he who hes charge of the Hollanders, is called Monsieur de Hautain, and is admirall of Zealand, of good qualitie and accompt amongs the estates.

This accident hes given ws proof of the incommoditie of my Lord Chancellars absence, who hes bene sickke thir fiftene dayes, that mens hopes and despairs of his recovery, have many times changed. He is eased of his paine but so weak, as if he escapes, which is greatlie wished, it will be long before he recovers his strength.†

SOME ACCOUNT OF A MS. OF SIR THOMAS URQUHART'S EPIGRAMS.

The knight of Cromarty was a celebrated person of his time; but his works now-a-days, with one solitary exception, are only known to the literary antiquary. This exception is his translation of Rabelais, which is admitted, by all competent authorities, to be the very best version of any foreign author, ancient or modern, that has ever appeared in the English language. Urquhart caught the spirit of Rabelais, and the result has been a complete transfusion of the Frenchman's wit, style, and pleasantry, to his own pages—no doubt accompanied by all the coarseness and indelicacy of the original. If we were believers of the Metempsychosis we would be much inclined to conclude that the soul of the Satirical Mediciner had, after some short sojourn at an intermediate "station," taken possession of the body of the whimsical Knight of Cromarty.

Recently (1836) a collected edition of all Urquhart's printed works, with the exception of Rabelais, was privately printed in 4to, and presented to the members of the Maitland Club, by a fellow member—the late much lamented Mr Stirling of Glesbervie. To supply this omission, Mr Thomas Gibson, Bookseller, 87, Princes Street, printed the portions of Rabelais translated by Sir Thomas, of the same size and on the same paper. In this way the works of Sir Thomas, in two handsome volumes 4to, with proper title-pages, can occasionally be procured, by those who wish to become acquainted with all the productions of this very odd author. The price of the two tomes will, we fear, be in due proportion to their great rarity, owing to the limited impression.

In the works are included his Epigrams, of which there were, apparently, two editions printed at London, in 1641 and 1646. Upon a collation of the two, it turns out that the latter is just the former, with new title-pages—the pagination being the same; there being not the slightest variations in the text, and the enumeration of errata actually remaining as before. These poetical curiosities bring high prices when they occur for sale, and we have known seven guineas paid for a copy.

At the time of the republication by Mr Stirling, that gentleman did not know that there existed a very valuable and unpublished MS. of the Knight's, containing a great mass of Epigram's hitherto unpublished. But so it was. There did exist, in the library of the Earl of Hyndford, an original autograph; and there it might have remained, had not the demise of the Earl, and the imprudence of his successor, caused the dispersion of his very curious and valuable collection. The books were sold by Mr Tait in 184; and the MS. in question was disposed of, not to the Library of the Faculty of Advocates, where it ought to have gone, but to a private gentleman. At the time we took notes of the MS. and its contents, knowing well that manuscripts and scarce books, when not deposited in a public library, are apt to be lost sight of entirely.

The MS. is dedicated to the Marquis of Hamilton.* The following is an exact copy of the title:—

Ten Books of Epigrams; the Curiosities whereof, for Conception, Stile, instruction, and other mixtures of show, and substance, being no
lesse fruitful,
Then pleasing to the diligent
Peruser, are entituled
APOLLO and the MUSES.

Written by the right worshipful
SIR THOMAS URCHARD, Knight."

There is prefixed—"The Isagoge, or introduction, whereby some reasons therein being deduced for the several dedications, the specified number of my Epigrams and other points of the lyk consequence I make bold to stop the reader's patience for a while."

It commences—

"Now land and sea with wars are gal'd so sore
That by a militarie Metaphore
Such melancholious fancies to expell
As violently in some spirits dwell
From the nine Fosters of the two top'd hill
And Prince of their Cyrræn State, I will
To the whole Isle of Brittain heer present
Of Epigrams a compleet Regiment," &c.

In all, it occupies eight pages, and is followed by the Premonition, and then the "Prolog."

* The same nobleman to whom the printed editions are dedicated.

* This is a singular proof of the insecurity of Leith at the time (1622); for, destitute of fortifications, the town was exposed to the tender mercies of any unfriendly power, thinking it worth their while to take possession of it.

† The Lord Chancellor (Dunfermline) died the day after at Pinkie House, at between six and seven of the clock. The news had not reached Lord Melrose when he wrote the above letter to the king.

The first book is dedicated to the Marquis of Huntly. The following may be taken as a specimen:—

ON WOMAN. (No. 25.)

"Take man from woman, al that she can show,
Of her own proper, is nought else but wo."

TO A CERTAIN GENTLEWOMAN, CONCERNING CUPID
AND A NEW-BORNE BABE OF HER'S. (No. 33.)

"Because one lovely boy your eyes did enter, Another issued at a lower center."

This book contains 110 Epigrams.

The second book is dedicated to the Earl of Arundel; it also contains 110 Epigrams.

The third to the Earl of Northumberland.

The fourth to the Earl of Pembroke.

Both contain 110 Epigrams.

From the last book, this may be selected:—

TO THE EARL OF STERLIN A LITTLE BEFORE HE DYED.
(No. 7.)

"In th' universal list of al the spirits
That either live or are set down in storie,
No tyme, nor place can show us one who merits
But yow alone, of the best poet the glorie
That ever was in state affaires employed
And best statesman, that ever was a poet."

The fifth is dedicated to the Earl of Dorset.

The sixth to the Earl of Holland.

The seventh to the Earl of Newcastle.

The eighth to the Earl of Strafford.

The ninth to Lord Craven.

Each book contains 110 Epigrams.

The tenth, dedicated to Lord Gaurin (Gowran), contains 113 Epigrams.

The "Epilog" follows—then the Valediction, and Adieu to the Muses, in verse; next a "Corollarie," in which Sir Thomas states that "one morning, for lake of more serious employment," he began to figure to himself what "might be the conference betwixt a young wedded couple of accomplished lovers the first night of their marriage, and having so couched by write, the expression of their mutual entertainment, that almost every encounter thereof cannot choose but savour in the hold of any judicious poet, the relish of an Epigram. I shall not think it very much amisse by placing this luffing discourse upon that purpose in forme of a desert," &c. Accordingly the Dialogue follows in verse, and the married pair say a vast number of amusing things, which, for obvious reasons, would not exactly suit the pages of a modern miscellany.

The Animalversion, which comes next, is interesting. It is in prose, and contains many particulars relative to the author. It appears that Urquhart "contrived, blocked and digested those eleven hundreth epigrams in a thirteen weeks tyme." Some leaves of verses precede "a Table for the more easie finding out of such epigrams as treat of one subject throughout al the ten books. Next we have an Index of the "harsh-est and most difficult words contained in the preceding Epigrams"—then a list of proper names, &c.

The volume is in very indifferent binding, and has the autograph of "Banff" on the boards.

The last leaf has upon it "Liber Georgii Ogilvie, master of Banff, 1683." There are also these names written there—"Andrew Fordyce," "Pat. Gordone, witness." How the Lords Banff got the MS. does not appear; but the mother of the first Lord Banff (so created 31st August 1642) was Helen, daughter of Walter Urquhart of Cromarty, who, according to Wood, married Sir Walter Ogilvie of Banff, who died between 1625 and 1628.

CASTLE GLOOM.

CASTLE GLOOM OR CAMPBELL, an ancient residence of the Argyle family, stands upon an isolated rock at the basis of the Ochil Hills. The date of the building is unknown. Tradition ascribes its construction to the Picts. It is of an oblong shape, and in the day of the "bow and arrow," must have been a position of great strength, defended as it is on three sides by almost perpendicular rocks some hundred feet in height; and on the other by a broad, deep fosse, or moat, which extended east and west till it reached the mountain streams, called "Care" and "Sorrow," the waters of which uniting rush down the rocky glen below with a stunning noise. But notwithstanding all these advantages, Montrose laid siege to it—took it, and burned the greater part to the ground. The "Donjon Keep," the strongest part of all old places of defence, still remains entire. A spiral staircase of about eighty-four steps, in good condition, leads to the top. In ascending this stair nothing but desolation meets the eye—every chamber is damp, desolate, and bare, and crumbling fast to decay. Time, that silent destroyer, is ever busy at his work, and in a few years a mass of ruins will be all that remains of the once princely tower of Campbell. Solitude reigns around, broken only by the dashing cascade—the caw of the rook, or the merry laugh of some visiting party.

O! Castle Gloom, thy glory's gone,
Time moulders doon thy wa's,
And o'er thy ivy mantl'd tap
The wintry tempest blaws.

The jackdaw nestles in thy tow'rs,
Devoid of every fear,
And spiders spin their airy webs,
Where hung the sword and spear.

Thy warder's tread no more is heard,
In echoes deep and long;
And in thy wild dismantl'd ha',
Is hush'd the minstrel's song.

At some distance below the castle is a small circular piece of ground, in the middle of which stands a rock covered with scanty vegetation, where John Knox frequently preached; and close at hand grows the holy bush, among whose branches, it is reported, the Reformer had often to hide himself when pursued by his persecuting enemies.

"Kemp's Score," a fearful looking chasm between two solid masses of rock, lies a little to the east of "John Knox's Pulpit." Whether it has been thrown out by some awful convulsion of nature, or worked by the hand of man, remains a mystery. Some say the latter, in order that the garrison might be supplied with water. It is about a hundred yards in length, and two in breadth. About half-way down there is a spacious cavern, the retreat of a bandit called Kemp, from whom the place takes its name. Of late years it was much frequented by smugglers, but these have dropped away, and its only inhabitants now are the bat and the owl. J. C.

[Chambers' Gazetteer of Scotland, says, "the ancient name of the Castle was the Castle of Gloom, and the hill immediately behind it still retains the same appellation. The mountain streams that flow on the different sides, are still called, the one the Water of Care—the other the Burn of Sorrow; and after their junction in front of the castle they traverse the parish or valley of Dollar or Delour. We believe it to be more likely that Gleume, or Coeh Leume, the original name of the castle, is Gaelic, and means the place of the Mad Leap, that the Water of Care was the glen of Car or Castle, and that Dollar is Dalor, the high field; the Burn of Sorrow might easily be added by fancy—if not the Burn of Care also. At what precise time the castle and surrounding land came into the possession of the Argyll family is not certainly known; but it is conjectured that they were included in the splendid grant which was made by King Robert Bruce to Sir Neil Campbell of Lochow, on his marriage with Lady Mary Bruce, the sister of that monarch. In 1493 an Act of Parliament was passed for changing the name of "the Castle called the Gleume, pertaining to our consing Colin, Earl of Argyll," to "Castle Campbell," and it continued in the possession of the Argyll family until the year 1807, when it was sold to the late Crauford Tait, W.S. It is now for sale; and there was a report that Lord Campbell was about to buy it.]

TWO LETTERS FROM SIR ALEXANDER HAY TO JOHN MURRAY, AFTERWARDS EARL OF ANNANDALE.

I.

SIR,—There is nothing that I can wryte from hence bot it is so spedely advertised by these who haif the charge, that I holde it a neidless poynte in me to trouble any with renewing of state advertismentis. Their pairtes affordes not nather muche nor greit mater. So long as it pleases God of his infinite mercy to prolonge our maisteris gratiuous government over us, there is nothing to be expected heir bot all dewtifull obedience; and albeit now and then there may fall ~~some~~ incidentis, so is there no bodye of nevir ~~double~~ constitutionn, bot will haif a catharre, or ~~some~~ other distemperature. Alwayes our Iyles ~~which~~ is finished, and our lieutenant, the Erle of Argyll, returned yesternight, and wilbe with ~~them~~ all this day. By many it is thought, ~~that~~ goode will did secunde the dowtye whiche they ar bounde to do, thir frequent iylnd ~~employmentis~~ walde not occure so often. I wrotte ~~before~~ in my former lettres that account being ~~taken~~ what this Iyla* hathe stooode his maiesties

* Gleume.—This fine and valuable Island had long been ~~occupied~~ by the Campbells, who ultimately were successful in driving Sir James McDonald from possession. A cofferis into thir tuo voyages, and specially in the accomptes of admiraltye there, I doubt if the rent of our whole Iyles will recompense it in ten year. Sen it is now quyt, it is fitting the purchesseris of the new right ather secure it heirefter, and disburdeyne his maiesties cofferis of furdur charge, or then surrender it to his maiestie: for when thir employmentis ar so profitable in present pay, and a preparatioun for making suite at courte for service done, how easie a mater it is to haif some of these vnhalloved people, with that vnchristiane language, readye to furneis fresh wark for the tinker, and the mater so caryed as that it is impossible to deprehend the plotte. But leiving this vntill the loutennant mak a relationn of his service, wo haif had in the boundis of Cathnes, some barno yairdes brunte to the Lord Forbes, a barbarous actioun, and pernicious in so skairse a year, alwayes, howevir, baiese lownes be actouris, it is muche to be feared that without setting on of greiter, these thinges wald not be interprysed. In the other partis of the cuntrey there is greit quyvetnes and obedience; and there is a very dewtifull nobelman, your maiche the Erle of Kingorne deceissed,* concerning whois waire no doubt you will heir be the officeris whome it concerns, who in this same particular, without regard of any manis swite, howevir otherwayes he affectis them, caryes no other sounde bot a good compositioun to his maiestie, and haistenis to haif it put to the best, that suiteing and importuneing his maiestie there, hinder not his profit heir. We haif now ane act registrat in our exchequer bookis, whereof I cannot find these hundreth yeiris past any lylike president, to witt, to lay vp so muche every moneth in stoire.† It is one of the most dewtifull courses that evir wes intendit for the kinges service; for if we had ones bot ten thousand pundis sterling in stoire, not to be stirred, the report of it wald do as muche to reteyne our peple in obedience as the interteyneing of a continuall garrisoun. The povertye of the crowne is the caus of the insolence oftentymes of people who propone to them selfis befor preparatioun can be made for thair perswite, ather a compositioun, or then tyme to escaipe; bot when it is knowne to be in reddynes, it will stay them to sturre. His maiestie will find the goode of this in a short progres of tyme; and I pray God that nothing from thense hinder the going forward of it. The Erle of Mar is there alreddy;‡ we looke the chancellour|| sall shortly tak jorney. I pray God in these busynes very interesting account of the McDonalds, and the causes which led to their downfall, will be found in the second volume of the Spottiswoode Miscellany, p. 380.

* He died December 19, 1615, which fixes the date of this letter.

† The Scotch thus seem to have originated the idea taken up by the English nearly two centuries later, of a sinking fund.

‡ John, Earl of Mar, a great favourite of the King's—he was his majesty's play-fellow in youth, and James was much attached to him. When boys, the king accused him of "slaiting," i.e. cheating him at some game they were playing, and when writing him in after life often called him John o' Shaitis. This anecdote is given by Mr George Erskine, Baillie of Allon, in his MS. History of the Mar Family.

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE AND TREASONABLE PRACTICES OF

DR FLORENCE HENSEY,

Who was "Hanged, Drawn, and Quartered at Tyburn," on the 12th of July 1758.

FLORENCE HENSEY was born in the county of Kildare, Ireland. From thence he came very young to England, soon after went over to Holland, and was educated in the University of Leyden, where he studied phisic. His natural parts were rather phlegmatic than sprightly, so that he made greater advances in phisic and the laborious sciences, than in polite literature. He afterwards travelled through Switzerland, Italy, Portugal, Spain, and France. By these travels he gained a competent knowledge of Italian, Portuguese, and Spanish; and his residence for some years at Paris enabled him to speak and write the French tongue with great fluency.

During his travels abroad, he supported himself in quality of a physician, and came over to England in hopes of settling there in that character. But either he had not interest or merit to recommend him; for he had no patients of any consequence. His prescriptions, however, few as they were, served to detect him.

Having continued a literary correspondence, since he left Leyden, with a fellow-student at Paris, who had lately got into the Secretary of State's office for Foreign Affairs, Hensey wrote to him a letter, informing him in general terms, "that he should be glad of an opportunity of doing him any service that lay in his power, and executing any commissions he might have in London." This general invitation his correspondent shrewdly construed into a desire of commencing a criminal correspondence; but as he did not think proper to hazard any communications, till he should be convinced of the Doctor's real intentions, he returned for answer, "that he was infinitely obliged to him for the service he offered; and that, if he understood him rightly, their correspondence might be rendered more advantageous to both, by changing their topics from literary to political." The Doctor, in a second letter, commended his friend's discernment, adding, "that if he could obtain for him a recompense suitable to the trouble, he would endeavour to make his intelligence of the utmost importance." By the next post he received an answer, containing instructions, directions, and an appointment of 500 livres (about £25 sterling) a quarter. The instructions were, to send lists of all our men-of-war, in and out of commission; their condition, situation, the number of men on board each; when they sailed, under what commanders, from what ports, and their destinations; accounts of the actual number of our troops, what regiments were complete, and where, when recruiting, they were quartered or garrisoned; the earliest account of any enterprises against France; plans of fortified places in England, America, &c. His letters were to be directed, by an outside cover, to certain persons at Cologne, the Hague, and Bern in Switzerland; and they were to forward them to Paris.

The Doctor was far from being satisfied with this stipend; he however accepted of it, in hopes by his merit to obtain a greater salary. With this view he endeavoured to insinuate himself into the favour of some clerks in the public offices, in order to obtain an early acquaintance with naval and military affairs; but this not answering his end, he passed his time chiefly in the political coffeehouses about town, particularly Tom's in Devereux Court; the largeness of his peruke, and the sanction of doctor, rendering him unsuspected among the physical gentlemen that resorted there. He often pushed himself into the back room at Old Slaughter's, and plied at the Mount, under pretence of reading the Hague Gazette, though he had got it by heart before at the 'Change. He was a constant customer at the St James's or the Smyrna, on a council-day; and never failed being at the Cocoa-tree after the house was up. By this means he got acquainted with many particulars, that remained perfect secrets to the public a long while. It is confidently asserted, that it was revealed in council so late as the 24th of July, to attack Rochefort; and that Hensley's letter of the 29th of the same month, particularly mentioned this resolution, though General Mordaunt and Admiral Hawke were at that time unacquainted with it.

He never entered into any political controversies; but when he did, and there was an absolute necessity of giving his opinion, he always decided in favour of England. By this means, though a Papist, he was never suspected by those he conversed with; and they were free and open before him, as he passed for a man of a philosophical turn, who never troubled himself with any political concerns. Nor was he suspected of any such illegal practices in the house where he lodged, having appointed a coffeehouse near St Clement's Church for the receipt of his letters under a fictitious name.

He had continued his correspondence from the beginning of the year 1756, without any material interruption, writing upon the margin of a newspaper such news and observations as were not there contained. By this means the examiners of the Post Office were deceived, and let these letters pass, imagining there was nothing more contained but the newspapers. At length his employers complained of the insignificance of his intelligence, and the necessity there was of extending his plan, otherwise they would discontinue his appointment; and actually threatened to deduct a guinea for every letter that did not contain some advice of importance. This letter, which was transmitted from Paris by the Hague, contained nothing seemingly but a few wide lines, wrote upon the most trifling, complimentary subjects; and was therefore released, and conveyed to him by means of the fictitious direction. An answer to this came from him, which was sent by Holland to Paris. This letter, which then appeared upon examination to be nothing but an answer to the compliments, contained (as has since been found by the copies he kept by him) a representation of the smallness of his income, which was not sufficient to make him neglect his practice, and keep such company as proper intelligence was to be obtained from.

These wide-wrote letters had their desired effect, by passing unnoticed for some time at the Post Office. At length the Secretary, suspecting there must be something more contained than these corresponding trifles, held one to the fire; when many lines, wrote with lemon-juice, between the black ones, plainly appeared.

This letter, which was dated from Twickenham, after giving a very exact account of the state of our finances, the condition of our fleet and army, their disposition, how many ships guarded, and how many troops lined the coasts of England, concluded with asserting, that "the only means of preventing the success of the expedition (to Rochefort), would be, to make a powerful diversion upon the coast of England, with a considerable body of troops; that, by thus attacking us in our very vitals, we might be engaged at home, and so prevented from being able to send a number of troops abroad sufficient to give them any real annoyance."

The discovery of this letter unravelled the whole mystery of all the former; and henceforward all letters directed as before were stopped, and those that came from abroad were intercepted. The real person to whom they were directed was soon found out, and his haunts were as soon known.

Being a Papist, he never failed going to one of the ambassadors' chapels of a Sunday; and as the Spanish minister's in Soho Square was that which he most usually frequented, a Secretary of State's warrant being issued for his apprehension, he was waylaid coming from thence by two of his Majesty's messengers on Sunday the 21st of August last, and after being dodged to two houses in Dean Street, and from thence to the Montpellier coffee-house, facing Greek Street, where he dined, he was seized in St Martin's Lane, and conducted to one of the messengers' houses in Jermyn Street.

His lodgings, at Mr Blount's in Arundel Street, in the Strand, were then searched; and there were found in his bureau twenty-nine rough draughts of letters, which had been wrote in lemon-juice between the black lines; and those he had received, wrote in the same manner.

In those which he had received from abroad, were complaints of "insignificance of his intelligence, and how they were better served by a person who lived (or had lived) at Colchester; that there was no need of acquainting them with what the Duke was doing in Germany, they being much earlier and better informed than he could instruct them; and instructions how to write with greater safety and dispatch, by directing all important letters to his brother, who served as chaplain and under-secretary to the Spanish minister at the Hague."

These instructions he closely followed, as appeared by the rough draughts of his letters, which latterly contained more important intelligence, as well with respect to the disposition of our fleets and armies, as secrets of the Cabinet; which it is surprising how he could get, and which can be accounted for no other way than by his frequenting such coffeehouses as these things, it is supposed, were mentioned at. It appears he gave intelligence of Admiral Holburne's destination to America, a few days after the Admiral's instructions were signed; and was particularly minute with respect to the number of ships and troops on board, with the day of their departure, &c.

This improvement in his intelligence is to be attributed to the increase which his salary now received; for instead of 500 livres a-quarter, he was promised that sum every month; and was also given to understand, that if there were any hopes of procuring any intelligence of great consequence, he should not spare expense, as he might assure himself of all possible encouragement. But this rich endowment was but of short duration; for he received but one month's salary before he was taken into custody; when his poverty was so great, that all his cash, both in his pocket and his bureau, did not amount to one guinea.

During his confinement at the messenger's, he was particularly reserved, very seldom entered into any conversation, and never mentioned any thing that related to his own affairs. This precaution was of very little use, as he afterwards found. But he all along imagined, that things would not be pushed to extremities, and that he could, by the intercession of friends, procure a mitigation of his punishment. But his friends were, like most others, merely temporary:—his coffeehouse acquaintance all disowned him; and those persons who were any wise connected with him, were, through necessity, obliged to be evidences against him; otherwise they would have been guilty of misprision of high treason, and liable to have suffered accordingly.

After many examinations before the Secretary of State, in which he made the most trifling excuses, he was committed to Newgate on the 9th of March 1768, by the Earl of Holderness, one of the principal Secretaries of State.

He was indicted in Easter term, the Solicitor of the Treasury being Prosecutor for the Crown; and being brought from Newgate to the bar of the Court, he was arraigned for High Treason, in adhering to the King's enemies, and carrying on, by letters, a treasonable correspondence with one La Roche, and P. de Franco, as appeared by the answers he received to his letters, from these French correspondents. To this indictment he pleaded Not Guilty. He had a copy of the indictment delivered to him, and he was ordered to prepare for his trial on the 12th of June following.

He was accordingly, on that day, conducted from Newgate in a hackney-coach, the irons which he wore being taken off; and between nine and ten o'clock that morning brought into the court of the King's Bench: where, being put to the bar, the jury were called, and the prisoner was arraigned on the indictment; to which indictment he again pleaded Not Guilty.

The identity of the hand-writing was the principal point to be proved. This was done by several creditable witnesses; namely, Mr M——, on whom he had several bills of exchange, Dr W—— of Westminster, and several apothecaries, who had received prescriptions from the Doctor, for patients that he had under his care, which they had kept on their files.

Various points of law were started by the counsel for the prisoner; but the sophistry of their arguments was easily combated by the Counsel for the Crown. Lord Mansfield made a very candid and judicious recapitulation of the various points upon which the evidence turned; remarking, at the same time, that though clemency was one of the most god-like of attributes of humanity, it was necessary that gentlemen of the jury should consider the heinousness of the crime and the credibility of the witnesses, and then let their consciences give the verdict.

So impartial and favourable a charge could not fail of extorting the approbation of every spectator; and the prisoner himself was obliged afterwards to own, that he did not expect so much clemency from his Lordship, whom he had, with the rest of the nation, so highly offended. The jury found him guilty.

When the jury returned into Court, he was scarcely able to support himself, and it was with some difficulty he held up his hand at the bar. The foreman of the jury having pronounced him guilty of High Treason, he was asked by the judge, whether he chose any particular time for receiving sentence; and he desired the Wednesday following.

He was carried back to Newgate in the same manner he came, and there close confined, and again fettered. In returning to prison he spoke very little, saying only, "His spirits were greatly fatigued, and he was worried to death."

Being again brought, June 14, to the bar, he received sentence to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

During the reading of the sentence, he held his handkerchief up to his face. Upon being asked if he had any thing to offer in his behalf, he desired a fortnight to prepare himself for his end; and the Court, through their great lenity, allowed him till the 12th of July.

Upon his return to Newgate, he expressed great satisfaction at the candour and indulgence of the Court, seemed thoroughly sensible of the heinousness of his crimes, and convinced of the justice of his punishment.

THE OLD PALACE AT WESTMINSTER.

IN 1065 we find William the Conqueror holding his Court at Whitsuntide in the Palace of Westminster, on which occasion he received the homage of his subjects, and knighted his youngest son, afterwards Henry I. William Rufus held his Court here in 1099, and the following year kept the festival of Whitsuntide within the magnificent hall which had recently risen under his auspices. During the reign of Henry I. the Confessor's Palace appears to have been the constant residence of that monarch, and of his pious and gentle consort, Matilda, daughter of Malcolm the Third, King of Scotland, and niece to Edward Atheling. During Lent, the good Queen was constantly to be seen issuing from the palace—barefooted and clothed in a garment of horse-hair—crossing the Old Palace-yard to the "Old Chapter House," where she performed her devotions, and washed the feet of the poor. She died in Westminster Palace, on the 1st of May, 1118, and was buried within the walls of the Chapter House, which had so often been witness to her charities and her piety. Henry III. the successor of King John, made great additions to the Palace of the Confessor. During his reign we find numerous notices of his having kept his Court and held divers festivals at Westminster. Here especially, in 1285, took place the interesting betrothment of Isabella, the King's sister, to the Emperor Frederick. "In February 1235," writes Matthew Paris, "two ambassadors from the Emperor arrived at Westminster to demand in marriage for their master the Princess Isabella, the King's sister. The King summoned a Council of the bishops and great men of the kingdom to consider the proposals of the Emperor; to which, after three days' consultation, a unanimous consent was given. The ambassadors then entreated that they might be permitted to see the Princess. The King sent two confidential messengers for his sister to the Tower of London, where she was kept in vigilant custody; and they most respectfully brought the damsel to Westminster into the presence of her brother. She was in the twenty-first year of her age, exceedingly beautiful, in the flower of youthful virginity, becomingly adorned with royal vestments and accomplishments, and thus she was introduced to the imperial envoys. They, when they had for a while delighted themselves with beholding the virgin, and judged her to be in all things worthy of the imperial bed, confirmed by oath the Emperor's proposal of matrimony, presenting to her, on the part of their master, the wedding-ring. And when they had placed it on her finger, they declared her to be the Empress of the Roman empire, exclaiming altogether, "Vivat, Imperatrix, Vivat!" In due time the Emperor dispatched the Duke of Louvain and the Archbishop of Cologne, with a suitable train, to escort the fair bride to Germany. They were received by King Henry with all due honours, and, previous to their departure with Isabella, we find the King entertaining them, on the 6th of May, with great magnificence at Windsor.—Literary and Historical Memorials of London. [Edward the First was born here. It was the residence and scene of the debaucheries of the second Edward. Here the Black Prince entertained his royal prisoners, the King of France and the King of Scotland at the same table. In the reign of Henry the Eighth the Palace was nearly destroyed by fire. The only portion of it now remaining is the building used pro tem. by the House of Commons and the Painted Chamber, famous for the series of great historical events its walls have witnessed. Here the Confessor died. Here the early Parliaments were opened by the Normans; here was signed the death-warrant of Charles the First; here the bodies of Chatham and Pitt lay in state. It is now the lobby of the New House of Lords.]

RAID OF RUTHVEN.

[From Anderson's MS. History of Scotland, in the Library of the Faculty of Advocates.—Vol. iii. p. 145.]

But yet to prevent the Duke of Guise his attempts in Scotland, who was thought to abuse the Earle of Lenox his mediation to avert ye King of Scots from ye English, William Lord Ruthven, whom the King had verie latlie raised and created Earle of Gowry, yea raised from troubles. This Lord William (not to degenerate from his father, who bare a deadlie hatred against the King's mother) wt. other conspirators, employed all there wits to remove the Earle of Lennox and Arran from ye King, vnder colour to provyde for Religion, the King's securitie, and the amitie wt. England, and this was there devise. The Earle of Lenox was made Chamberlane of Scotland, is perswaded to exercise with rigor the outworne jurisdiction of Chamberlane; and this to no other intent, then that he might unwillingly procure him selfe hated amongst the multitude; that ye ministers of God's word should kindle the same by disclaiming against him, out of the pulpit as a Papist, a Guisian, and a rigorous exector of his authoritie, and should openly foretell his destruction. When ye Earle of Lenox therefore was gone from Perth (where the King then lay) to Edinburgh to exercise his jurisdiction, and Arran was out of the way, Gowry, Marr, Lindsay, and others, taking the opportunitie, invited the King to Ruthven Castell, and there detained him against his will, not suffering him to walk abroad for fear of some danger. All his servantes they removed from him, Arran they carried to prison, and constrained the King to call home the Earle of Angouse from banishment, (and this at ye intercession of ye Queene of England, who was not vnacquaint wt. theire plot,) to enforce and send back ye Earle of Lenox into France, there to passe the rest of his lyfe as he had done before; who being a man of a moist mylde nature, did for ye quyet render up Dumbarton Castell, which he might easilie have defended, and refused not to returne into France; and this he did at ye King's perswasion, who was drawn thereunto by thier constraint. And not content with all this they compelled the King against his will to approve of this intercepting of him by his letters to ye Queene of England, and to decree and call an assemblie of ye Estates sumoned by them, to be just. Yet (as some alledgeit) could they not induce Maister George Buchanan to approve of this thier fact, ether by writing or persuasion by message.

DUKE OF LENOX.

[From the same MS.—Vol. iii. p. 151.]

THIS Esme Duke of Lenox, to which honor he wes not long before advanced (1579), was, upon displeasure conceived against him, banished ye realme. In whose exile was performed ane old prophesie which I have heard, yt a nag of fyve English shillings should beare all the Dukes of England and Scotland. For when this Duke was out of the Scottish kingdome, there wes neither Duke in yt country or in England either. At the point of death, he oppenly professed (as he had done before) the Protestants' religion, confuting thereby the malice of those which had falselie defamed him to have beine a Papist.

STRANGE DISCOVERY.

Lord Dalmeny, son of the E. of Rosebery, married, about eighty years ago, a widow at Bath for her beauty. They went abroad, she sickened, and on her death-bed requested that she might be interred in some particular church-yard, either in Sussex or Suffolk, I forget which. The body was embalmed, but at the custom-house in the port where it was landed, the officers suspected smuggling, and insisted on opening it. They recognised the features of the wife of their own clergyman—who having been married to him against her own inclination, had eloped. Both husbands followed the body to the grave. The grandfather of Dr. Smith, of Norwich, knew the lord.

EDINBURGH AND LONDON MAIL IN 1758.—In the beginning of April, a memorial relating to the course of the post between London and Edinburgh, was presented to the annual committee of the Royal Burghs, by the merchants and traders in Edinburgh and other places in Scotland. This memorial sets forth—That the course of the post from London to Edinburgh is performed, at a medium through the year, in about 87 hours, of which five are lost by the mail's turning out of the straight road twelve miles, in order to pass through York, and by the delay at that place: but that the course from Edinburgh to London is not performed in less than about 131 hours, occasioned by unnecessary delays at different stages, particularly one of about 24 hours at Newcastle. To render the intercourse by post between the two capitals more speedy, it is proposed that the mails pass through Wetherby instead of York, and that the York bags be left and taken up at Ferrybridge or Wetherby; that the mail from Edinburgh, which is now dispatched at twelve o'clock at night, on the Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, be for the future dispatched at ten at night, on the Mondays, Thursdays and Saturdays, so as to arrive at Newcastle about seven o'clock on the Tuesdays, Fridays and Saturdays, the usual nights of dispatch thence for London; and that there be no delay, or but a short one, at the intermediate stages. The memorial concludes thus:—"The benefit of this plan to the commerce of the United Kingdom will be universal. The cities of London and Edinburgh will thereby receive returns of letters from one another in seven days and a half and eight days and a half, which at present do not come sooner than in ten days and a half, and twelve days and a half; and the course of letters to and from every place of the United Kingdom and foreign parts, passing through this channel of correspondence, will be equally shortened. The clear revenue of the post-office in North Britain, which has advanced considerably of late years, will undoubtedly be farther increased, as correspondence will be enlivened and enlarged, by this improvement; the charge of many expresses will be saved to the government; its purposes will be better answered, by the quicker conveyance of intelligence and orders, whether civil or military, to and from the capital; the kingdom will, in a manner, be contracted within a narrower circle, and receive more immediately the influence of every act of administration; and the wise endeavours of the legislature will be greatly aided for rendering the union of the two kingdoms more complete. The memorialists therefore pray the honourable Committee, to make the necessary application to the Right Hon. his Majesty's Postmaster-General, for remedying this great defect in the course of the post." The Committee sent instructions to their agent at London to make the application desired, and transmitted a copy of the memorial, to be laid before the Postmaster-General. We are told that this plan is highly approved of by the Scots nobility and members of Parliament, and by the merchants of London; and it is expected soon to be put in execution.—[Such were the ideas of improved expedition entertained by our great-grandfathers. They never dreamed of the railway speed of present times, by which the mail is conveyed from Edinburgh to London in fourteen hours.]

A HAUNTED HOUSE.—June, 1730.—My Lady Eglintoun, her brother, Mr David Kennedy, and three of my Lady's daughters, with their weemen, were over in Arran at the goat-milk this month; and a very odd passage fell out, which I have well attested from two or three who had the accounts from my Lady, and her brother, anent a disturbance they mett with. They were lodged in a house on the shore-side, the best house in that part of the Isle. A kind of surgeon lived ther, some years since, and it was alleged, a man who was sick and dyed in that house had not very fair play. It's said that several times, noises wer heard about the house; lights seen in it when nobody lived in it, and the neighbours wer beat with unseen hands. However, these passages wer not much belived by persons who went over to the Isle, because the people, inhabitants of the Island, as all the Highlanders generally are, wer reconed credulous and fretty. [Full of 'freits,' superstitions.] Their had been severall lodgers in the house who met with no disturbance; and care was taken to bear down the storys, least lodgers should scair at the house. My Lady, and her brother, and the rest, wer one night disturbed with a noise in the night-time a little after they came to lodge ther, which revived some former storys: but on enquiry it was found to be from two drunk perons who had some brandy in some of the cellars below them. They wer seized by Mr Hamilton of Bardowy, the Duke of Hamiltoun's Bailey, and brought to the Countess of Eglington. The Bailey offered to punish them at her pleasure, but she passed them, and the whole of the former storys wer knocked down as groundles; and my Lady and her brother were satisfied all was but story and Credulity. In some days ther wer frequent noises heard in the rooms; and when people wer sent, nobody could be found. Some of the young ladys' weemen were frequently frighted; and some of them had stroaks, as they said, laid on them by invisible hands. My Lady, and her brother, being fully satisfied as to the first noise, woud belive nothing after that, and endeavoured to jest them out of their freights, caryed the matter the length that she frighted them herself by a sudden throwing a Cod [pillow] among them when in Company. But the disturbances from another art [direction] continued, and at lenth they wer all convinced that ther was some what preternatural about the house. One night, when in the room altogether, they hear a very extraordinary noise. Mr David, who is no way credulous, said to my informer, he could compare the noise to nothing but five or six aquibbs bizzing and giving a crack altogether in the different corners of the room, and the young ladys and their weemen say they saw the head of a man sweeming over their heads in the room, which was pretty high, and his face looking down on them. They were all in the utmost consternation that persons could be in, and did not in the least doubt ther wer invisible pouners about them, and as soon [as] a boat could be got, left the house in a few hours, and came over to Eglington. This is a certain fact that may be depended on.—WODROW'S ANALECTA.

INTRODUCTION OF BUGS.—October 3, 1727. The vermin called bugs are at present extremely troublesome at Glasgow. They say that they are come over with timber and other goods from Holland. They are in many houses there, and they are so prolifick there, there is no getting rid of them, though many ways have been tried to get rid of them. It's not twenty years since they wer knouen, and such as had them kepted them secret. These six or seven years they are more openly complained off, and now the half of the town are plagued with them. This is chiefly attributed to the frequent alterations of servants, who bring them from house to house.—IBID.

THE "SWECHÉ."

A RESPECTED correspondent in Forres writes as follows:—

"I observe the subject of the ancient drum, or 'sweche,' discussed in the JOURNAL, and enclose an extract from the Treasurer's Account of the burgh of Elgin at the time indicated by the date, which will set the matter at rest.

"1689.—The Comptar, viz. Andro Edie, discharges him of the following sowmes:

'Item—of 40s. gifen to James Robertson, coupur, for making of the town's Sweche.

'Item—to Alex. Milln, for ye heiding of ye Sweche, at ye town's command, 24s.'

"Here is the cooper, Robertson, paid for the wood work, and the skinner, Alex. Milln, for the parchment of the town's drum."

THE BATTLE OF BIGGAR.

THE battle of Biggar rests almost entirely on the authority of Blind Harry, and few passages in his book are considered more fabulous than that which details this very singular and notable engagement. Almost all our historians have treated it as a fiction—passing it over without notice, or alluding only to its details to draw from them an argument unfavourable to the veracity of the Minstrel's work. We do not intend to attempt a vindication of Harry. He may have taken, in several instances, a poet's license with the narrative; but certainly he has been regarded with greater dubiety than he deserves. His statements are often rejected without sufficient cause, or set aside for others which, when fairly examined, do not seem to rest on any better authority. The historians who treat of the period when the battle of Biggar is said to have been fought, adduce no satisfactory reason, nor indeed any reason, for overlooking it. It has been said that, in the month of July, 1297, when the battle of Biggar took place, Edward I. was in France. It would be difficult to substantiate this assertion; at least we have not found any confirmation of it. But although it were established that Edward was in France in the summer of the year referred to, it is possible that he may have been in Scotland also. According to the Minstrel, Edward's stay in Scotland was limited—not exceeding two or three weeks. There may, at the same time, be a discrepancy of dates. Gray, or Con, from whose works Harry tells us he copied his principal facts, may have been in error as to the precise time of the battle of Biggar; or the Minstrel himself, or his transcribers, may have committed a mistake; but this is not enough to invalidate the truth of the whole narrative. The main facts of the battle, notwithstanding, may be perfectly accurate. The narrative in general wears such an air of sincerity, that we can scarcely doubt that the author himself truly believed it to be true. The causes, the details, and the localities of the encounter are given with such earnest minuteness that, unless contradicted by unquestionable evidence, it ought not to be altogether rejected.

Blind Harry's work, entitled "Ye Actis and Actis of ye illustre and vailzand champion, Schyr William Wallace, Knycht off Elrisle," was at one period a great favourite with the peasantry of Scotland. It treats of a theme which has always been a deeply engrossing one to Scotsmen. It narrates the achievements of one of the bravest, most persevering, and disinterested patriots that ever drew a blade in the cause of his country—it presents so many heart-stirring descriptions of the undaunted courage, and the heroic exploits of the hardy and stalwart men who had banded themselves together to repel the invaders of their country, and to preserve intact their national independence—it expresses so much dislike and contempt of the false, cruel, and luxurious Southrons, and manifests so much genuine partiality towards the author's own countrymen, that we cannot wonder that it attained great popularity, and produced very important and lasting effects on the public mind. Its antiquated style—more especially its almost obsolete orthography—has now nearly banished it. A copy is rarely to be met with in the little libraries of the common people, and few comparatively are acquainted with its details. No doubt the metrical life of Wallace, by Hamilton of Gilbertfield, which purports to be a sort of free translation of Blind Harry's work, is very common, and there are few Scotsmen who have not read it in their early years. But Hamilton's "Life" gives but a very poor idea of the Minstrel's poem, for its omissions, alterations, and additions are so numerous, that it may more justly be styled a different version than a rendering of Blind Harry into a modern English dress.

With these preliminary observations, we propose to give a prose account of the battle of Biggar, following very closely the narrative of the Minstrel. This, we believe, has hitherto scarcely ever been attempted, and we trust our essay will be acceptable. Scotsmen seldom tire of reading the gallant exploits of him whom Thomson justly styles

"Great patriot hero! ill-requited chief!"

In the year 1296, Wallace being on a visit to his uncle, Nicol de Auchinleck, baron of Auchinleck, in Ayrshire, who at that time resided at Gilbank, in the parish of Lesmahagow, was wont occasionally to resort to the town of Lanark for amusement. During one of his visits he saw Marion Braidfoot, the heiress of Lamington, who had taken up her residence in Lanark after the death of her father and brother, and, falling deeply in love with her, made her his wife soon afterwards. This marriage was particularly obnoxious to the English, as Heselrig, sheriff of Lanark, intended to wed her to his son. On the other hand, it tended to inflame the hatred of Wallace towards the English, and especially to Heselrig, who, besides his design on the heiress of Lamington, had cruelly put her brother to death some time before. Wallace took up his abode with his newly married wife at Lanark, attended by only nine retainers. Soon afterwards he received a visit from his faithful and attached companion in arms, Sir John Graham, with a party of fifteen followers in his train. On the morning after Sir John's arrival, both parties attended mass in the Church of Lanark, which stood a little east from the town, and on their return, a party of the English, who then occupied the town and castle of Lanark, intentionally provoked them to a quarrel. After some altercation swords were drawn, and a sharp conflict ensuing on the streets, a strong party of English, who were lying ready equipped in the Castle, were immediately dispatched to the aid of their friends. The Scots fought stoutly, and slew not a few of their foes, but finding themselves overpowered by numbers, they at length fled to Wallace's lodgings, the gate of which was opened by a female, and by a back entrance were enabled to escape to the woods and fastnesses of Cartlane Craigs, although keenly pursued by the English. Incensed at the escape of the Scots, the English returned to the house in which Wallace lived, and finding his wife, cruelly put her to death. The news of this sad event was conveyed to Wallace by an old female retainer of the house of Lamington, and naturally overwhelmed him with the deepest sorrow and distress. On recovering, he vowed from that time to devote himself entirely to the service of his country, and either to drive out the English or perish in the attempt. It was instantly concerted that an attack should be made that night on the garrison of Lanark, and Auchinleck being apprised of this resolution, joined them with a small detachment of men. The Scots, having been divided into several little parties, came suddenly and unexpectedly to Lanark, and by fire and sword, put the whole garrison, consisting of about 250 men, to death. Among the slain were Heselrig the sheriff, his son, Sir Robert Thorn, and other persons of distinction. This notable exploit soon resounded over the country, and brought together a large number of men who were desirous of striking a blow for the freedom of their country. Wallace was unanimously chosen their leader. The English garrisons, who had been left to keep the country in subjection, were of course much alarmed by these warlike demonstrations, and Amyr de Vallance, then dwelling at Bothwell, dispatched a courier with intelligence of them to Edward. The king, having set his heart on the entire subjugation of Scotland, and having been at infinite pains to effect this object by artful schemes of diplomacy, as well as by several military inroads, was excessively grieved and enraged at this intelligence, and instantly resolved to march again into Scotland to chastise the insolence and audacity of the Scots, and put them under more rigorous bondage than ever. The queen vainly endeavoured to persuade him against this expedition, representing the outrage and injustice he was attempting to perpetrate on Scotland, by depriving it of its ancient sovereign power, and reducing its people to slavery. Deaf to all remonstrances, the king dispatched his heralds over the country to summon his vassals to meet him in warlike array, and to follow him to Scotland. One of Edward's pursuivants, by birth a Scotsman, and well-known in Scotland afterwards by the name of Jop, on learning the intentions of the English king left the court and hastened to Scotland to give information of them to Wallace, whom he found in Ayrshire. Wallace lost no time in setting up his standard at Lanark, and sending notice to his friends, especially in Ayrshire and Clydesdale, to join him without delay. Adam Wallace, the young laird of Richartown, Sir Robert Boyd, the ancestor of the Earls of Kilmarnock and Errol, Sir John Graham, Sir John Tinto, Sir Thomas Somerville of Linton and Carnwath, Sir Walter Newbigging of Newbigging, near Biggar, Nichol Auchinleck, and other men of note hastened with their followers to obey the summons. On mustering their united forces they were found to amount to 3000 horsemen, well equipped, and a considerable number of foot, but these were in a great measure destitute of arms. The Scots, learning that Edward was approaching with a powerful and well appointed army, and being aware that they could not cope with him in the open field, betook themselves to a strong position on the hill of Tinto, about four miles from the town of Biggar.

The English army marched up the Tweed from Berwick, and after winding among the hills of Peebleshire descended on the plains of the Upper Ward of Lanarkshire, by the ancient pass of Crosscyrne. The Scots, from their elevated encampment, no doubt beheld this "awful ost," as the Minstrel calls it, defile over the mountain's brow. It amounted to £8,000 warriors, clad in complete armour, led on by the most warlike and politic monarch of the age, and supplied with everything that could contribute to their comfort or inspire them with confidence and courage. Still the little patriotic band on the side of Tinto manifested no symptoms of fear, nor thought for a moment of dispersing themselves and providing for their safety. The English pitched their camp near Biggar, on a piece of ground rising gently from the valley traversed by Biggar Water, and having a deep and inaccessible morass on the south and east. Here

"Yai planytyt yar feild with tents and pailrons,
Quhar cleryouns blew full mony mychty sons;
Plenyet yat place with gud wittail and wyne,
In carts brocht yair purwiance dewine."

From this place Edward dispatched two heralds to Wallace, commanding him to submit to his authority, and promising if he should do so to take him into his service and favour, and to confer upon him the most ample rewards; but in case of disobedience, he threatened to hang him the first time he should fall into his hands. Wallace, after consulting his friends, wrote back to the king that he rejected his offers with disdain, and that, so far from being intimidated by his threats, he was determined to contend against him until he was driven from the kingdom; that the Scots would sacrifice him without mercy, should he ever become their prisoner—and that they would be prepared to offer him battle at no distant period.

A young knight, the king's nephew, either out of curiosity, or for the purpose of ascertaining the numbers and reconnoitring the position of the Scots, had accompanied the heralds in disguise; but Jop recognising this youth, having often seen him before, while living at the English Court, gave intimation of his rank and condition to Wallace. In these chivalrous times it was considered highly dishonourable for a true knight to act as a spy, or for any one to assume the character of a herald who did not belong to that order, and the person who did so was held to have forfeited all claim to be treated with mercy. The Scots, smarting under the wrongs inflicted on them by the English, indignant at the haughty and imperious message sent by the king, and especially enraged at the duplicity of the young warrior and his companions, instantly resolved to punish them in a most severe and summary manner. The knight was conducted to an eminence above the camp, and had his head struck from his body—the tongue of one of the heralds was cut out, and the eyes of the other extracted with a pair of pincers. The two heralds, in this dreadful plight, were ordered to return to the English camp with the head of the knight, and to inform the king that he might regard what the Scots had done as a proof that his threats and his powerful army had not been able to strike them with terror or bring them to submission. When Edward learned what had taken place he was for some time struck dumb with sorrow and indignation, and at length, when his feelings were somewhat tranquillized, he vowed not to leave Scotland till he had taken the most ample vengeance on Wallace and the Scots for the outrage they had perpetrated. Shortly after this event, Wallace took Sir John Tinto aside, and told him that it was his intention to set out to reconnoitre the English camp in disguise, and enjoined him to keep his absence and the cause of it a profound secret. Towards evening, Wallace privately withdrew, and when on his way between Culter and Biggar he met a poor man driving a horse laden with pitchers of earthenware. Wallace entered into conversation with him, and finding him to be an itinerant merchant, instantly entertained the thought that he might gain admission into the interior of the English camp itself, by pretending to be a hawker of earthenware. He accordingly purchased the man's horse and his stock in trade, and still thinking his disguise not sufficiently complete, proposed an exchange of garments—a proposition which greatly increased the man's astonishment, but to which he readily assented. Equipped in the hawker's habiliments, consisting of a threadbare hood, a grey doublet, and hose daubed, or as Henry says, "claggit" with clay—closing one of his eyes as if it had been deprived of vision, and driving the mare, he set forward, to the great amusement of the old hawker, towards the town of Biggar. It is preserved by tradition, that on his way he passed along the narrow bridge built by the Romans, which crosses Biggar Burn, and that from this circumstance it got the name of the "Cadgor's Brig," which it still retains. In this guise, about twilight, he entered the English camp, and while seemingly intent only on the sale of his commodities, he was at the same time carefully observing the arrangement of the encampment:

"Spyand full fast quhar awail suld be,
And couth weyll luk and wynk with ye ta e."

The soldiers, no doubt struck with his singular appearance, soon began to treat him with considerable freedom. Some of them broke his pots, while others indulged in jokes upon his blind eye. It is a tradition, that one man declared that if the hawker had not been blind of an eye and lame of a leg, he was certain that he was Wallace himself. This declaration was afterwards put into rhyme, and is still well-known at Biggar. It is as follows:—

"Had ye not been cripple o' a leg, and blind o' an ee, Ye are as like William Wallace as ever I did see."

Wallace, finding his situation becoming perilous, made haste to retire without exciting farther suspicion.

On returning to the Scottish camp, Wallace found it in extreme uproar. His absence had been discovered, and no reason could be obtained why he had gone away. As he had been last seen in the company of Sir John Tinto, and as that knight would give no satisfactory account of what had passed between them, it was suspected that some treacherous plot was on foot. To such a length did the disaffection to Sir John Tinto go, that he was put in fetters; and some cried out let him be burned or hanged. In the midst of these commotions Wallace entered the camp. He ordered Tinto to be unbound, and commended him highly for the faithful manner in which he had kept the secret entrusted to him. After this, some went off to supper, but the greater part remained to hear Wallace narrate his adventures. Notwithstanding their successful issue, Sir John the Graham, true to the principles of chivalry then in vogue, expressed his strong disapprobation of the conduct of Wallace, and considered that it was not chieftain-like to resort to such expedients, or to run such dangerous risks. Wallace replied, that before Scotland was free it would be necessary for them all to expose themselves to much greater dangers. It was then concerted that the troops should take a short repose, and before dawn descend to the plains, in order to make an unexpected assault on the English camp. Accordingly, at an early hour, they were drawn up in hostile array, and divided into three squadrons. The first, or vanguard, was commanded by Wallace, and under him were Boyd and Auchinleck; the second by Sir John Graham, and under him were young Wallace of Richartown and Somerville of Carnwath; the third by Sir Walter Newbigging, and under him were his son David and Sir John Tinto. The foot, being badly armed, were drawn up in the rear, and received orders not to engage rashly, but reserve themselves till a fitting opportunity, or till they were properly supplied with arms. Wallace then summoned the chieftains around him, and strictly enjoined them to prevent their followers from being allured from the combat by the pillage which might be presented in the English camp. He reminded them, that those who betook themselves to plunder before the victory was gained, generally lost both their life and their booty. He expressed the utmost confidence that they would on this occasion strike a blow worthy of freemen, and exert themselves with all their might to inflict punishment on a false tyrant who had come to wreath fresh chains on the necks of their countrymen. All of them readily consented to attend to his orders.

At this juncture, they were alarmed by the approach of a body of men whom they at first suspected to be a detachment of the enemy. They turned out, however, to be a party of 300 hardy and stalwart borderers, under the command of Thomas Halliday and his two sons, Wallace and Rutherford. With them also came Jardine of Applegirth and Roger Kirkpatrick, Lord of Thorwald. Greatly encouraged by this welcome accession to their numbers, the Scots marched with the utmost expedition towards Biggar. When they drew near that town the day had begun to dawn; but fortunately the most advanced of the English picquets had by that time been withdrawn. Mounted on good chargers, they pushed forward with such celerity, that they rushed into the English camp almost before the alarm could be given. A dreadful scene of noise, slaughter, and confusion immediately ensued. Wallace, on his visit to the camp, had carefully noted the position of the king's tent, and with his squadron rode furiously in that direction; but the English soldiers, seeing the great danger to which their sovereign was exposed, hastened to his assistance, and in a few minutes the Earl of Kent had surrounded the royal person with 5000 men. The onslaught in this quarter was fierce and deadly, and great numbers of those who defended the king were slain. Graham and Newbigging, with their divisions, followed by the foot, who had now obtained an abundant supply of weapons, also pressed hastily forward, overturning the tents in their way, and slaughtering every opponent they could reach. The battle still raged round the king's person with great obstinacy; and the Scots, having joined their forces, began to drive the English back towards the valley, covered with deep marshes on the south, and in the confusion the royal tent was overturned. The Earl of Kent, proud of displaying his martial skill and prowess in the presence of his sovereign, rallied his troops once and again, and with a ponderous battle-axe committed great havoc among the Scots. Wallace, finding the course of victory arrested by the powerful arm of this intrepid and indomitable warrior, sought him out amid the throng, and engaged him in single combat. When these two distinguished champions had fairly encountered, the surrounding warriors on both sides almost suspended the work of death, to watch the issue of a conflict so tremendous and heart-stirring. Both fought with great fury, but with admirable courage and dexterity, till at length Wallace, with an irresistible stroke, smote him lifeless to the ground. At this sight the English were discouraged, and mounting the king on horseback, forced him, much against his inclination, to quit the field. In this encounter 4000 of the English were cut down, and the remainder in terror and confusion fled from Biggar, taking the direction of Culter by the Roman Causeway, which crossed the moss on the west. The Scots pursued them to Culter Hope, about four miles distant. Here the English rallied in great force, and Wallace, knowing that he was no match for them in the open field, withdrew his followers to Biggar, after they had slain 7000 men in the pursuit, as no quarter was given. Here, finding provisions and valuable commodities in abundance, and being exceedingly hungry and fatigued, they sat down to a sumptuous repast; and after regaling themselves with bumpers of wine, lay down to take some repose. Their rest, however, was of short duration, as Wallace was afraid that the English, apprized of the smallness of their numbers, would return for the purpose of recovering their camp, and therefore deemed it prudent to draw off his forces to a place of strength and security called David's Shaw, and to convey the booty obtained in the camp to Ross's Bog. The English were now drawn up in Culter Hope, on a place called John's Green, and were lamenting the disaster that had befallen them, and the loss of their comrades and commanders, among the latter of whom were the king's son, his two uncles, and the Earl of Kent, when two cooks, who had concealed themselves in the camp, and skulked off after they saw the Scots indulging in repose, came and informed them that the Scots were lying in the camp overcome with sleep and intoxication, and might easily be overpowered. The king was unwilling to credit this story, as he considered it unlikely that Wallace would be so remiss and unguarded in such circumstances. He therefore declared it to be his determination to retreat, as there was little hope of recovering their provisions at Biggar, and no adequate supplies could be obtained amid the mountains by which they were surrounded. The Duke of Lancaster urged, that the circumstances in which they were placed rendered it imperative that an effort should be made to regain the camp; and though the king himself would not return, he requested to be furnished with a strong detachment, with which he hoped to recover the supplies, of which they would soon stand so much in need. The king was prevailed on to allow him to take 10,000 men, and promised to wait on him till next day, expecting to be able to supply the wants of his troops with such bestial as he might find among the hills. The Governor of Calais and the Lord of Westmoreland resolved to accompany the Duke, and each of them obtained the command of 1000 men: Sir Amyer de Vallance also joined them with a considerable reinforcement. These united parties marched back to Biggar, but found the camp plundered and deserted, and strewed with dead bodies that had been stripped bare. For some time they were at a loss to conceive what place the Scots had retired to, but some scouts soon brought intelligence that they were posted at David's Shaw, which is supposed to have been situated on the sloping sides of the hill of Bizzyberry, little more than a mile from Biggar. They accordingly marched in that direction, but were descried by the Scottish videttes, who gave the alarm. Leaving their horses in the Shaw, the Scots passed on foot into Jop's Bog, as a place of greater security from the attacks of the English division, which consisted principally of cavalry. The English seeing them pass into the bog, and being deceived by its fair and solid appearance, rode towards them with great impetuosity. The consequence was, that the front line of horse was soon embogued in the morass, and overborne by those that pressed on behind. In this state of confusion the soldiers were assailed by the Scots, and, being unable to extricate themselves, were slaughtered almost to a man. The Scots, emboldened by this success, crossed the bog and fell upon the English, who were bewildered and intimidated by the fate of their comrades, and the boldness and success of their opponents. The conflict, however, was sharp and long continued, and great valour was displayed on both sides. The mode of fighting at that time generally rendered a battle a series of single combats. Some notable encounters of this kind took place during the engagement. The Governor of Calais, clad in complete armour, and expert in all warlike exercises, assailed Sir John Graham, who, with his trusty blade, warded off his attacks, and at length struck him such a blow as pierced his harness, and laid him lifeless on the spot. Wallace, espying Amyer de Vallance, one of Edward's most active and resolute captains, and noted for his cruel oppression of the Scots, was anxious to engage with him; but the Earl of Westmoreland, coming between them, received a stroke from Wallace on his steel basinet which instantly deprived him of life. Robert Boyd encountered the Governor of Berwick, and after an obstinate combat also succeeded in slaying him by a "straik."

"Awkward ye crag, which cutting Through all hys weid in sondyr straik ye bane."

The English, now panic struck, left the field to the victorious Scots, and fled back to John's Green.

Such was the battle of Biggar, and if Harry is at all to be credited, it was productive of most important consequences. Edward considered it prudent to return to England without gaining the object of his expedition. Many persons of distinction came and ranked themselves under the banner of Wallace, and in a short time after, that undaunted and inflexible patriot was chosen Warder of Scotland.

THE SORTES SANCTORUM.

This species of divination was pretty much the same as the Sortes Virgilianæ, so frequently resorted to, the accuracy of which Charles I. and Lord Falkland are said to have tested.

Of the Sortes Sanctorum there are many instances. It is said, St Anthony, to put an end to his irresolution about retirement, went to a church, where, immediately hearing the deacon pronounce these words: "Go sell all thou hast, and give it to the poor, then come and follow me;" he applied them to himself, as a direct injunction from God, and withdrew to that solitude for which he is so celebrated among the Catholics.

The following passage from Gregory of Tours is too remarkable to be omitted:—He relates that Clovis, the first Christian king of France, marching against Alaric, king of the Visigoths, and being near the city of Tours, where the body of St Martin was deposited, he sent some of his nobles with presents to be offered at the saint's tomb, to see if they could not bring him a promising augury, while he himself uttered this prayer: "Lord, if thou wouldst have me punish this impious people, the savage enemy of thy holy name, give me some signal token by which I may be assured that such is thy will." Accordingly, his messengers had no sooner set foot within the cathedral than they heard the priest chaunt forth this verse of the eighteenth Psalm: "Thou hast girded me with strength for war, thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me." Transported at these words, after laying the presents at the tomb of the saint, they hastened to the king with this favourable prognostic; Clovis joyfully accepted it, and engaging Alaric, gained a complete victory.

Here also may be subjoined a passage in the history of St Louis IX. In the first emotions of his clemency, he had granted a pardon to a criminal under sentence of death; but some minutes after, happening to alight upon this verse of the Psalms: "Blessed is he that doth righteousness at all times; he recalled his pardon, saying, "The king who has the power to punish a crime, and does not do it, is, in the sight of God, no less guilty than if he had committed it himself."

The Sortes Sanctorum were fulminated against by various councils. The council of Vannes, "forbade all ecclesiastics, under pain of excommunication, to perform that kind of divination, or to pry into futurity, by looking into any book or writing whatsoever." The council of Ayde, in 506, expressed itself to the same effect: as did those of Orleans, in 511: and Auxerre, in 595. It appears, however, to have continued very common, at least in England, so late as the twelfth century. The council of Aenham, which met there in 1110, condemned jointly Sorcerers, Witches, Diviners, such as occasioned death by magical operations, and who practised fortune-telling by the holy book-lots.

Peter de Blois, who wrote at the close of the twelfth century, places among the Sorcerers those who, under the veil of religion, promised, by certain superstitious practices, such as the lots of the Apostles and Prophets, to discover hidden and future events: yet this same Peter de Blois, one of the most learned and pious men of his age, in a letter to Reginald, whose election to the see of Bath had for a long time been violently opposed, tells him, that he hopes he has overcome all difficulties: and further, that he believes he is, or soon will be, established in his diocese. "This belief," says he, "I ground on a dream I lately had two nights successively, of being at your consecration; and also, that being desirous of knowing its certain meaning, by lots of human curiosity, and the Psalter, the first which occurred to me were: "Moses and Aaron among his priests."

Thus, though the ancient fathers, and, since them, others have in general agreed, that the Sortes Sanctorum cannot be cleared of superstition, though they assert that it was tempting God to expect that he would inform us of futurity, and reveal to us the secrets of his will, whenever the sacred book is opened for such a purpose, though it contain nothing which looks like a promise of that kind from God; though so far from being warranted by any ecclesiastical law, it has been condemned by several, and, at last, in more enlightened times, has been altogether abolished, yet they do not deny, that there have been occasions, when discreet and pious persons have opened the sacred book, not to discover futurity, but to meet with some passage to support them in times of distress and persecution.

THE MURDER OF CAIRN O' MOUNT.(1)

Do you mind yon old and hoary man,
With the haggard cheek and eye,
Whose big broad breast was often heav'd
With the deep and smother'd sigh?

Do you mind how he aye would quail and start,
As through some sudden fear,
And timidly over his shoulder look,
Though there was no one near?

And ever he mutter'd some secret words
The sighs and starts between;
And we said, 'What ails the aged man?—
God grant his hands be clean!'

It was a gloomy autumn day;
The sullen breezes sweeping,
A mournful mound of wither'd leaves
O'er the summer flowers were heaping.

And a Preacher came to our lonely glen,
A man of fame and power,
Who could stir men's hearts to their inmost depths,
Or sweeten the anguish'd hour.

And he bade us all with humble hearts
To the holy fane repair,
For he had a message direct from God
To tell the people there.

And soon from many a sylvan nook,
And many a moorland shelling,
The young and old together met
In the house of prayer are kneeling;

And that strange old man met with the rest;
With them on his knees he fell,
But whether he mutter'd his secret words,
Or pray'd, I might not tell.

The Preacher chose a startling theme
From the world's early day,
When the first infuriate murderer rose
And lifted his hand to slay;

And he told in deep, and thrilling tones,
How Abel's blood was found
To raise its cry, like an injured thing,
For vengeance from the ground!

And he said—"The avalanche may hide
The vale in eternal snow,
And the ocean roll till the day of doom
O'er the secret deeps below,

"But a deed of blood can never be hid;
For, though in darkness done,
The torch of heaven will light it up
Till it gleam like the mid-day sun!"

And he said, "Last night, in a dream from God,
I saw a recent tomb,
Where a murder'd form was laid to sleep,
Till awak'd by the trump of doom.

"And I feel impell'd by the Spirit of Truth
This judgment to declare,—
That the murderer hears my voice this day
And mingles with you in prayer!

"On earth's dark secrets heaven can pour
The light in a streaming flood;
Eternal Justice thou can'st not foil—
Stand forth, thou man of blood!"

There was silence deep in the house of prayer,
Till a thrill through each chill heart ran,
As that strange old man stood up and wept,
Crying "I am the guilty man!—

"O, heaven! have mercy upon my soul!
And bless'd be this hour for aye!
For it lifts a secret load from my heart
That hath crush'd it for many a day.

"For since these hands were stain'd in blood
A spectre, day and night,
Hath threaten'd to stab me with glittering blade,
But I've pray'd it in vain to smite!

"Yet over my shoulder its red right hand
Still lifted the brand on high,
But never would plunge it in my heart
That I might bleed and die!

"And O! the agony, worse than death,
To bear a blameless name,
Yet ever to dread that the truth would be known,
And cover me deep with shame!"

And he told how a trivial strife arose,
That a word had power to quell,
When he smote his fellow-labourer dead,
And buried him where he fell!

"And now, ye may bind me, and hold me in ward;
I have nothing to hope or to fear
From the mercy or wrath of my fellow man—
For the finger of God is here!"

No solemn tribunal in judgment sat;
No gibbet its victim display'd;
Yet long ere the last leaves of autumn were strew'd
In his grave was the murderer laid.

But as that deed of blood was done
Unseen by mortal eye,
So none but the slumberless eye of heaven
Beheld the murderer die!

And the lated traveller on the hill
Hath an old man aye by his side,
Whose ceaseless whisper at parting and hail
Is—"Murder ye cannot hide!"(2)

(1) "The Cairn o' Mount." A hill so called, in the parish of Strachan, Kincardineshire.

(2) Could it be that the chief actor in the tradition from which the above poem is taken is the same with the Professor whose incarcerations are noticed in page 144 of the "Journal"? The names, professions and dates would warrant us in inferring as much. We find the story related in one of the Maitland Club publications—"Analecta: or Materials for a History of Remarkable Providences, mostly relating to Scotch Ministers and Christians. By the Rev. Robert Wodrow, minister of the Gospel at Eastwood." "November 9, A.D. 1729. Mr William Brown tells me the following account he had, when last in Perth, from Mr James Mercer, minister at Aberdalgie, as what was generally believed as to Dr Rule, principal [of the College] at Edinburgh [from A.D. 1690 to A.D. 1703]; and the thing was so notour that it could not miss to be observed." The Doctor going to some church meeting in the north, could not obtain lodgings at a small change-house at the Cairn o' Mount, as the sheriff and some other gentlemen had engaged all the beds, even those of the landlord and family. Unwilling to encounter the hill at night, he was glad, at last, to put up in a deserted house, about a quarter of a mile from the inn, which the landlord endeavoured to make as comfortable for him as circumstances would admit of, but did not seek to conceal that the house was "haunted with an apparition." After commending himself to God, the Doctor went to bed, putting out the candles, but leaving the fire burning. "He had not been long in bed till the room door is opened, and an apparition, in shape of a country tradesman, came in, and opened the curtains, without speaking a word. Mr Rule was resolved to do nothing till it should speak or attack him, but lay still with full composure, committing himself to the divine protection and conduct. The apparition went to the table, lighted the two candles, brought them to the bedside, and made some steps toward the door, looking still to the bed, as if he would have had Mr Rule rising and following. Mr Rule still lay still till he should see his way further cleared. Then the apparition, who the whole time spoke none, took an effectual way to raise the Doctor. He caryed back the candles to the table, and went to the fire, and, with the tongs, took down the kindled coals, and laid them on the deal chamber floor. The Doctor, then, thought it time to rise, and put on his cloaks; in the time of which the spectre laid up the coals again in the chimney, and, going to the table, lifted the candles, and went to the door, opened it, still looking to the Principal, as he would have him following the candles; which he now, thinking there was somewhat extraordinary in the case, after looking to God for direction, inclined to do. The apparition went down some steps with the candles, and caryed them in to a long trance, at the end of which there was a stair, which caryed down to a low room. This the spectre went down, and stooped and set down the lights on the lowest step of the stair, and straight disappeared. Mr Rule, after a little waiting to see if any further should cast up, lifted the candles, went up, the way he came, to his room, and went to his bed again, where he was no more disturbed." The Doctor, thinking there must be some murder in the case, sent next morning for the sheriff, and caused him to have the ground opened near the spot where the spectre disappeared, when "the plain remains of a human body were found, and bones, to the conviction of all." The Doctor next entreated the sheriff to call the country people together, "and he would give them a sermon, and see if any hint could be had of the murder." "The sheriff condescended—the people convened; the Doctor preached upon some subject suitable to the occasion, and told what had happened, and earnestly dealt with the consciences of his hearers, if they knew any thing of that murder, to acknowledge it, now that God in his providence, had brought it to light. In the time of his sermon, an old man, near eighty years, awakened, and fell a weeping, and, before all the company, acknowledged that, at the building of that house, he was the murderer. He and one of his fellow masons fell into a debate, and came to high words, on a summer morning, when the rest of the workmen were not come up to their work; and he killed the man with one stroke of a hammer, and buried him under the first step of the stair; and the matter was never known!"

THE OLD TOLBOOTH, OR "HEART OF MID-LOTHIAN."

For this excellent vignette of the "Heart of Mid-Lothian," we are indebted to the publisher of "The Memorials of Edinburgh in the Olden Time,"* a work in 2 vols. 4to., now nearly completed. It is illustrated with numerous engravings and woodcuts; and the letterpress, by D. Wilson, F.S.A. Scot., exhibits a degree of research altogether surprising. The author has been indefatigable in the performance of his task, and the result is a work of great interest and novelty—both to the antiquary and the general reader. No one can be thoroughly acquainted with the antiquities of the Scottish capital who has not perused the pages of the Memorials.

The vignette presents a view of the north side of the Tolbooth. "It stood," says the writer, "at the north-west corner of St Giles's Church, so close to that ancient building as only to leave a narrow footpath beyond its projecting buttresses; while the tall and gloomy-looking pile extended so far into the main street, that a roadway of fourteen feet in breadth was all that intervened between it and the lofty range of buildings on the opposite side. We cannot better describe this interesting building than in the lively narrative of Scott, written about the time of its demolition—'The prison reared its ancient front in the very middle of the High Street, forming the termination to a huge pile of buildings called the Luckenbooths, which, for some inconceivable reason, our ancestors had jammed into the midst of the principal street of the town, leaving for passage a narrow way on the north; and on the south—into which the prison opened—a crooked lane, winding betwixt the high and sombre walls of the Tolbooth and the adjacent houses on the one side, and the buttresses and projections of the old cathedral upon the other. To give some gaiety to this sombre passage, well known by the name of the Krames, a number of little booths or shops, after the fashion of coblers' stalls, were plastered, as it were, against the Gothic projections and abutments, so that it seemed as if the traders had occupied every "buttress and coigne of vantage," with nests bearing the same proportion to the building as the martlet's did in Macbeth's Castle.' The most prominent features in the south front of the Tolbooth were two projecting turret staircases. A neatly carved Gothic doorway, surmounted by a niche, gave entrance to the building at the foot of the eastern tower; and this, on its demolition in 1817, was removed by Sir Walter Scott to Abbotsford, and there converted to the humble office of giving access to his kitchen court."

* Hugh Paton, Adam Square, Edinburgh.

Maitland quotes a mandate of Queen Mary, in 1561, ordaining the "Provost, Bailies, and Councillors," in consequence of the ruinous state of the building, to "put workmen to the taking down o' the said Tolbuith, with all possible diligence;" and states that, in compliance with this order, the Tolbooth was taken down. The author of the Memorials is of a different opinion. "This," he says, "is an error. The new building was erected entirely apart from it, adjoining the south-west corner of St Giles's Church."

It is possible, however, that Maitland may be in so far correct. Mr Wilson shows that the second Parliament of James II. was held, Nov. 1438—"in pretorio burgi de Edinburgh"—which "Latin term for Tolbooth is repeated in the minutes of another assembly of the estates held there in 1449." "In 1451," he continues, "the old Scottish name appears for the first time in 'the parliament of ane richt hie and excellent prince, and our soverane lorde, James the Secunde, be the grace of Gode, King of Scotts, haldyn at Edinburgh the begunyn in the Tolbuith of the samyn.' A much older, and probably larger erection must therefore have existed on the site of the western portion of the Tolbooth, the ruinous state of which at length led to the royal command for its demolition in 1561—not a century after the date we are disposed to assign to the oldest portion of the building that remained till 1817."

We can scarcely conceive that so positive an order as that of Queen Mary should have been wholly disregarded. The ruinous portion of the Old Tolbooth may have been removed and the remainder repaired. Maitland states, from the Council Register, that, in 1562, the "Lords of Session" acquainted the Common Council, that if they did not in a short time provide them a convenient house to sit in, they would remove the Court to the city of St Andrew's, which induced the Council to give immediate orders to finish the said building with the utmost dispatch."

It would appear that the New Tolbooth, "a little to the south of the old one," was not built till nearly a century afterwards. "One of the carved stones from the modern portion of the building," says the Memorials, "is now preserved, among other relics of similar character, in the nursery of Messrs Eagle and Henderson, Leith Walk. It bears on it the city arms, sculptured in high relief, and surmounted by an ornamental device, with the date 1641. The style of the new building, though plain, and of rude workmanship, entirely corresponded with this date, being that which prevailed towards the close of Charles the First's reign."

But whether Maitland or the Memorialist is the more correct, there can be little doubt that the whole of the premises latterly known as the Tolbooth buildings were not originally used or intended for the purposes of a prison. There was a marked distinction between the architecture of the east and west ends. The western and larger portion of the building was "constructed of coarse rubble work, while the earlier edifice, at the east end, was built of polished stone." "Maitland mentions," says Mr Wilson, "and attempts to refute, a tradition that this had been the mansion of the Provost of St Giles's Church, but there seems little reason to doubt that it had been originally erected as some such appendage to the Church. The style of ornament was entirely that of a collegiate building attached to an ecclesiastical edifice; and its situation and architectural adornments suggest the idea of its having been the residence of the Provost or Dean, while the prebends and other members of the college were accommodated in the buildings in the south side of the church, removed in the year 1632, to make way for the Parliament House. If this idea is correct, the edifice was, in all probability, built shortly after the year 1466, when a charter was granted by King James III., erecting St Giles's into a collegiate church; and it may further have included a chapter-house for the college, whose convenient dimensions would lead to its adoption as a place of meeting for the Scottish Parliaments. The date thus assigned to the most ancient portion of the "Heart of Mid-Lothian," receives considerable confirmation from the style of the building.

"The ornamental north gable of the most ancient portion of the building appears to have been the place of exposure for the heads and dismembered limbs of the numerous victims of the sanguinary laws of Scotland in early times. In the year 1581, the head of the Earl of Morton, 'was sett upon a prick, on the highest stone of the gavel of the Tolbuith, toward the publick street,' and the same point—after doing the like ignominious service to many of inferior note—received, in 1650, the head of the gallant Marquis of Montrose, which remained exposed there throughout the whole period of the Commonwealth, and was taken down at length, shortly after the Restoration, with every demonstration of national honour and triumph, and committed, along with the other portions of his body, to the tomb of his ancestors, in the south transept of St Giles's Church. The north gable was not, however, long suffered to remain unoccupied. On the 27th of May 1661,—little more than four months after the tardy honours paid to the Marquis of Montrose—the Marquis of Argyle was beheaded at the Cross, and 'his heid affixt upone the heid of the Tolbuith, quhair the Marquis of Montrois wes affixt of befoir.' The ground floor of this ancient part of the Tolbooth was known by the name of the Purses, by which it is often alluded to in early writings. In the ancient titles of a house on the north side of the High Street, it is described as 'that Lodging or Timber Land, lying in the burgh of Edinburgh, forgainst the place of the Tolbooth, commonly called the poor folks' Purses.' In the trial of William Maclauchlane, a servant of the Countess of Wemyss, who was apprehended almost immediately after the Porteous mob, one of the witnesses states, that 'having come up Beth's

¹ The Court of Session sat in the Tolbooth, in what was called the High Council House.

Wynd, he tried to pass by the Purses on the north side of the prison; but there perceiving the backs of a row of armed men, some with staves, others with guns and Lochaber axes, standing across the street, who, he was told, were drawn up as a guard there, he retired again.' The crime sought to be proved against Maclauchlane was his having been seen taking a part with this guard, armed with a Lochaber axe. Another witness describes having seen some of the magistrates going up from the head of Mary King's Close towards the Purses on the north side of the Tolbooth, where they were stopped by the mob, and compelled to make a precipitate retreat. This important pass thus carefully guarded on the memorable occasion of the Porteous riot, derived its name from having been the place where the ancient fraternity of Blue Gowns, the King's faithful bedemen, received the royal bounty presented to them on each King's birth day in a leathern purse, after having attended service in St Giles's Church.

"At the west end of the Tolbooth, a modern addition existed, rising only to the height of two stories. This was occupied as shops, while the flat roof formed a platform whereon all public executions took place, after the abandonment of the Grassmarket in the year 1785. The west gable of the old building bore the appearance of rude and hasty construction; it was without windows, notwithstanding that it afforded the openest and most suitable aspect for light, and seemed as if it had been so left for the purpose of future extension. The apartments on the ground floor of the main building were vaulted with stone, and the greater part of them latterly fitted up for shops, until the demolition of the citadel of the old guard in 1785, soon after which those on the north side were converted into a guard-house for the accommodation of that veteran corps.

"Previous to the extension or rebuilding of the west portion of the Tolbooth, it had furnished accommodation for the wealthiest traders of the city, and there also some of the most imposing displays took place on Charles I. visiting his northern capital in 1633. 'Upon the west wall of the Tolbooth,' says an old writer, 'where the Goldsmiths' shops do stand, there stood ane vast pageant, arched above, on ane large mab the pourtraits of a hundred and nine kings of Scotland. In the cavity of the arch, Mercury was represented bringing up Fergus the first king of Scotland in ane convenient habit, who delivered to his Majesty a very grave speech, containing many precious advices to his royal successor; a representation, not altogether in caricature, of the drama often enacted on the same spot, at a later period, when Jock Heigh—the Edinburgh Jack Ketch for above forty years—played the part of Mercury, bringing up one in ane convenient habit, to hear a very grave speech, preparatory to treatment not unlike that which the unfortunate monarch received, in addition to the precious advices bestowed on him in 1633. The goldsmiths' shops were latterly removed into the Parliament Close; but George Heriot's booth existed at the west end of St Giles's Church till the year 1809, when Beth's Wynd and the adjoining buildings were demolished. A narrow passage led between the church and an ancient three-storied tenement adjoining the New Tolbooth, or Laigh Council House, as it was latterly called, and the centre one of the three booths into which it was divided, measuring about seven feet square, was pointed out by tradition as the work-shop of the founder of Heriot's Hospital, where both King James and his Queen paid frequent visits to the royal goldsmith. On the demolition of this ancient fabric, the tradition was completely confirmed by the discovery of George Heriot's name boldly carved on the stone lintel of the door. The forge and bellows, as well as a stone crucible and lid, supposed to have belonged to its celebrated possessor, were discovered in clearing away the ruins of the old building, and are now carefully preserved in the Hospital Museum.

"The associations connected with the ancient building we have described, are almost entirely those relating to the occupants whom it held in durance in its latter capacity as a prison. The eastern portion, indeed, had in all probability been the scene of stormy debates in the earlier Scottish Parliaments, and of deeds even ruder than the words of the turbulent barons. There also, the College of Justice, founded by James V. in 1532, held its first sederunt; the earliest statutes of the Court requiring that 'all the lordis sall entre in the Tolbuth and counsal-hous at viij howris in the mornnyng, dayly, and sall sit quhill xi howris be strikin.' All these, however, had ceased to be thought of for centuries previous to the demolition of the tall and gloomy prison; though even in its degradation it was connected with historical characters of no mean note, having been the final place of captivity of the Marquises of Montrose and Argyll, and others of the later victims of factious rivalry, who fell a sacrifice to the triumph of their opponents. The main floor of the more ancient building, in its latter days, formed the common hall for all prisoners, except those in irons, or incarcerated in the condemned cells. It had an old oak pulpit of curious construction for the use of any one who took upon him the duties of prison Chaplain, and which tradition—as usual with most old Scottish pulpits—affirmed to have been occupied by John Knox. Here also there was inscribed on a board, the rhymes preserved by Scott in the 'Heart of Mid-Lothian,' which have been traced to an English poet of the seventeenth century:—

A prison is a house of care,
A place where none can thrive,
A touchstone true to try a friend,
A grave for men alive.
Sometimes a place of right,
Sometimes a place of wrong,
Sometimes a place for jades and thieves
And honest men amoug.

"The room immediately above the common hall may be presumed to have been 'the upper chamber of the Tolbooth,' in which James V. held his first council, after escaping, in 1528, from his durance at Falkland Palace in the hands of the Douglas faction; its latter use was as a dungeon for the worst felons, whose better security was insured by an iron bar placed along the floor. Here also the condemned criminal generally spent the last wretched hours of life, often chained to the same iron bar, and surrounded with the reckless and depraved, whose presence forbade a serious thought. It was indeed among the worst features of this miserable abode of crime, that its dimensions entirely precluded all classification. It had no open area attached to it, to which the prisoner might escape for fresh air, or even a glimpse of the light of day, and no solitary cell whither he might withdraw to indulge in the luxury of solitude and quiet reflection. Dante's memorable inscription for the gates of hell might have found no inappropriate place over its gloomy portal:—

All hope abandon, ye who enter here!

"We must refer the reader to Chambers's Traditions, for much that is curious and amusing among the legends of the Tolbooth, gathered from the tales of its old inmates, or the recollections of aged citizens. One of its most distinguishing traits, which it might be supposed to retain as an heir-loom of its former more dignified duties, was a total suspension of its retentive capabilities whenever any prisoner of rank was committed to the custody of its walls. A golden key, doubtless, was sometimes effectual in unlocking its ponderous bars; but when this was provided against, other means were discovered for eliciting the convenient facility of 'knowing those who ought to be respected on account of their rank.' It is no less worthy of note, that occasions occurred in which the Tolbooth proved the only effectual road to freedom for some of the most notorious offenders, when seeking to elude the emissaries of justice. An old lady, to whose retentive memory we owe some interesting recollections of former times—when, as she was wont to say, she used to gather gowans on the banks of the Nor' Loch, and take a day's ramble in Bearford's Parks—related the following as a tradition she had heard in early youth:—When Mitchell, the fanatic preacher, who shot the Bishop of Orkney in 1668, at the head of Blackfriars' Wynd, in an attempt to assassinate Archbishop Sharp, so strangely eluded the strict search made for him; he effected his escape by taking refuge in the Tolbooth, to which ingress, in latter times at least, was never very difficult. The city gates were shut at the time, and none allowed to go out without a passport signed by one of the magistrates, but it will readily be believed that the Tolbooth might be overlooked in the most vigilant pursuit after one who was to be consigned to it the instant he was taken. It may be, however, that this interesting tradition is only a confused version of a later occurrence in the same reign, when Robert Ferguson, a notorious character, known by the name of 'the Plotter,' was searched for in Edinburgh under somewhat similar circumstances, as one of the conspirators implicated in the Rye-House Plot. It was almost certainly known that he was in the town, and the gates were accordingly closed, but he also availed himself of the same ingenious hiding-place, and quietly withdrew after the whole town had been searched for him in vain. Another similar escape is mentioned in The Minor Antiquities, where the Highlands were scoured by the agents of government in search for a gentleman concerned in the rebellion of 1745, while he was quietly taking his ease in 'the King's Auld Tolbooth.'

We have made use of the vignette of the Tolbooth, and no small portion of the letterpress account of it, in the Memorials, partly in compliment to that deserving work, and partly as an appropriate introduction to a series of Notes from the Register of the Gaol, the first of which will appear in our next, and which can scarcely fail to prove interesting to all who have heard of the "Heart of Mid-Lothian" and its traditions.

A LETTER FROM THE MATE OF AN EAST INDIA SHIP, TO HIS WIFE IN CRAWFURDSYKE, NEAR GREENOCK.

[Published in the Scots newspapers about the middle of December 1758.]

MY DEAR,—This is to acquaint you, that I am yet living; and I do think there is not on earth a more remarkable instance of the mercy and goodness of God, than has been shown in my preservation. I arrived in India the 15th of August 1753, and agreed to go mate along with Captain Hugh Kennedy, an old comrade of mine in Virginia. I will be particular in this my first voyage, and I hope you will cause what follows to be put in the newspapers, that all concerned may have a true and impartial account of the fate of their friends and relations.

Our ship was about 900 tuns burden, manned with 100 Lascars, or black sailors, and navigated by a captain, four mates, and a gunner, Europeans. We took on board 500 merchants, and other passengers, going to pay their yearly devotions at Mahomet's tomb at Mecca, and sailed from Surat in India the 10th of April 1754, with a cargo on board valued at about £200,000 sterling, for Moco and Jodda in the Red Sea, with a good wind, and on the 18th at noon, we found ourselves in lat. 15 N. and long. 9 to the westward of Surat. At one afternoon, (may God preserve me from the like sight for ever), we observed a smoke coming up through the deck in the galley or fore-castle. We immediately got the fore hatches off, to see where the fire was; but the flame having vent, burst out with such rage, that it burnt both the second mate's shirt and trousers, and mine; and having got hold of her main-stay sail, in five minutes communicated itself to the rigging and all the sails in the ship. Our boats were all on board but the longboat, and our rigging being on fire, we could make no use of the tackles to hoist them out. The Lascars all run aft from the flames, and assistance had we none. I went down to the powder-room, which was by aft, with the gunner, to heave the powder overboard; and whilst we were throwing it out, I observed the longboat cut adrift by the sailors, which was the only prospect we had of life: on which account I went up to the deck, and told the captain, that, as the fire was so violent, we had now but two choices, to burn or drown. He, with his usual calmness, told me, he had seen me swim farther in Virginia than to the longboat; and as it was death to stay on board, I might yet reach her, and save him and the rest of the Europeans. I took a cutlase in my mouth, and directly jumped overboard. At that time the fire had got the length of the quarterdeck, with such violence, that nobody durst go nigh it. I had so far to swim, I was obliged to quit the cutlase, and swim for my life.

At last I reached the longboat; and going to use my authority, though I was beloved by the sailors, they soon let me know it was at an end; and told me, Did I not see 3 or 400 people swimming towards the longboat? that already she was full; that they left their own fathers and brothers to perish, and could I think they would return to take in five Infidels, on whose account Mahomet had burnt the ship? and though they should, would not every one strive to get in his own relations, by which they must all perish? I told them we had neither water nor provisions of any kind on board, nor a compass to steer by; that we were 200 leagues from the nearest land, part of the coast of Malabar. But my remonstrance signified nothing; they were resolved to pursue for it with oars, being ninety-six souls on board, of which eight were black Roman Catholics. The ship blew up about eight at night, with a noise like thunder, and every soul on board perished. Hugh Kennedy, the captain, was brother to [David Kennedy of Kirkmichael, in the shire of] Air. John Short, the second mate, was sometime a commander at Minorca. John Richardson, the third mate, was a Yorkshire man. William Campbell, the fourth mate, was [son to John Campbell of Welwood in the shire of Air, nephew to Dr Alexander Campbell, physician, and brother to Mr John Campbell, surgeon, both in the town of] Air. The gunner was named Hamilton, a Scots gentleman's son.

We rowed forty-eight hours towards the coast of Malabar, and then gave over. I desired them to take their turbands, being Moors, and stitch them together with some rope-yarn out of the longboat's cable, for sails, and lash the oars together for masts; which they did with all expedition; and being a side wind, and fair weather, we went always two or three knots. But from the want of sleep (conducting the boat by the sun in the day, and the stars by night) I envied the death of my shipmates who were burned or drowned. We were never hungry, but our thirst was extreme. The seventh day our throats and tongues swelled so that we spoke by signs. On that day fourteen died; and almost the whole company became silly, and began to die laughing. I petitioned God earnestly to continue my senses to my end; which he was pleased to do, being the only person the eighth day that had them. On that day twenty more died; and on the ninth I spied land; which sight overcame my senses, and I fell into a swoon with thankfulness and joy. When I recovered, I took the helm, and steered in for the land, and ran into a bay between two rocks, about eleven o'clock in the morning, ten leagues to the southward of Goa, a Portuguese settlement upon the coast of Malabar. The natives were Gentoos or Pagans, who used us very civilly. They took all the black people out of the boat first, that were alive, and when I looked round, ten lay dead in the boat. Fifty got alive to shore, of which I was one; twenty died in two days more; and only thirty of us got to Bombay, having 550 miles to travel, naked, in the heat of the sun. I was taken care of in Bombay by the English government, who allowed me 50 rupees (which is £6, 5s) per month for my sustenance, being just enough to live on there.

I recovered in six months, and went mate of another ship to Africa and Ethiopia, and returned to Bombay without any accident. I went again in the same ship to the streights of Molucca; where the Mallayans cut off the most part of our crew in the night: however, the captain and I were saved, and, with the remainder of the black sailors, we got the ship home to Bombay.

I went the next voyage with the same captain to Bengal, and arrived there just as the Moors came to besiege it. We fought the ship till we could fight no longer, the captain being killed, myself and the rest of the mates wounded in many places. We had on board twenty-six European ladies, that fled to our ship for protection, when the town was taken by the Moors. You have heard, I suppose, of the cruel massacre of those that remained in the town. I cut my cable, and run down the river, having three Moorish forts to pass. The ladies were in the hold in safety; but the most of my Lascars, or black sailors, were killed, and I received a shot, which took me in the head, and shattered my skull: but blood and bones I tied up all together, having a Bengal doctor on board, one Gray, a Scotsman; and having passed all the forts to the mouth of the river, my wounds threw me into a fever; and then I made this will and power, which I here inclose you. When I recovered, I returned to Bombay, and continued in the command of the ship; and have made several successful voyages since: but finding my health declining, I propose to return home in the summer 1759; though I need never want a command in India, through the interest of the Bengal ladies, whose lives I saved.

JOHN IVER.

LETTERS FROM A PILGRIM IN SCOTLAND.

No. I.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL.

SIR—I am not a disciple of Mahomet, still I make pilgrimages. I visit every now and then scenes in Scotland rendered sacred by the genius or deeds of her sons and daughters. The Carron, near Denny, was the "Mecca" of this month. I need not remind you, Mr Editor, that the stirring ballad of "Gil Morice" is there localised, and that the glorious Wallace, according to the Minstrel, held the celebrated interview with Bruce there. I clamb the "Erle's hill," drank of the "Erle's burn," and, carrying the tradition forward to the tragedy of "Douglas" by Home, which tragedy is founded on the ballad, I looked with intense interest on the Carron, as it dashed against the cliff from whence Lady Randolph leapt, called to this day Lady Randolph's Leap."

I enclose a legend, picked up while at Randolph Hill, the seat of Robert Weir, Esq., of Glasgow. Being a veritable legend, not a legend "lengthened out into a tale," against which your preface to the Journal is an anathema, I trust it will be deemed suitable. If so, I shall have the pleasure of forwarding a curious tradition of the Witch of Torwood, which, with the present legend, is innocent of all intercourse with the Printer's Devil, i. e. of "gude black prent."

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
A. B. G.

LOCH COULTER.

The hills near Denny open into scenes of beauty; bleak and naked of themselves, they afford delightful prospects from their summits. The eye may now rest on Stirling, and the Links of the Forth, sung by M'Neil; and now on the great valley or Carse of Falkirk. However, I have only to do with the legend of the quiet little lake immediately behind Denny. William F—— was walking up the Glen of D——. He was the "herd" at the farm of H——, near Denny. The coulter of the plough had been broken, and he had it now on his shoulder going to the smithy. The glen was, by report, the residence of the fairies. William, therefore, did not relish his errand; but he was only a herd, and must do what the "maister" ordered. So, as I have said, William F—— was walking up the Glen of D——. He whistled "The last time I cam owre the muir," and trudged on. Presently, as the wind came and went, he heard—music, sweet music. He passed the Sett, over which a venerable ha' tree stood sentinel—still the music came and went. The Carron gurgled over its pebbles, and by the echo and the gurgling William accounted for the music. No—again, and yet again, the strain came and went. He now came to the Rockin' Stane. The music was softer and sweeter. He stood, and turning his eye towards the stone, over which the moon now shed a glittering and visible glory, he distinctly saw a train of fairies enter by a chink into the hill. He waited anxiously a little—then on hands and knees ventured to the chink. This was the hall of the fairies. The queen, dressed in green, and with a little sceptre in her hand, was receiving the obeisance of all the fairies. This was dressed in green, that in white, and all danced to the sound of sweet music. Suddenly a very small fairie approached the queen, and touched her sceptre, saying, "a mortal is near!" William F—— started; for no sooner did the small fairie deliver this oracle than the whole train of the fairies, led by the queen, issued in pursuit. On then: William does not know what to do. He is in a hollow now—still the fairies are in pursuit; nay, at his very heels. On—on; he is in sight of the smithy: he will be seized immediately! Now, or never! He threw the coulter of the plough from his shoulder. He looked behind, and where the coulter fell the water had sprung up, and was roaring after him. On—on; the fairies are tripping from wave to wave, and the small fairie is crying "pursue!" He has reached the smithy. There were the smith, the dominie, the tailor and the tailor's rib. William F—— rushes in, and falls speechless by the anvil. "A ghast!" cries the rib. "A wirrikow!" cries the dominie. "What's wrang, Willie?—deil's in the callan, chitter-chittering!" cries the smith. "Leuk up, Willie, an' dinna gaip as if ye expeckit the smith to jump down the mouth o' ye—leuk up." William did "leuk up," and they "a' gat the story." The smith ran to the door, and a "Lord preserve us a'!" called dominie, tailor and rib out. The smithy was now a little island; for all round and round it was—water; the water of our legend—Loch Coulter. The smith got the dominie and the tailor safe on land, and the tailor's rib too, after an accidental (?) dip; but so soon as they were all safe, the strain of music was resumed, and the water wheeled in dimples over the smithy.

Reader!—this is November, "cauld and eerie." Spring—summer, however, are coming. Visit Loch Coulter, take "a branch o' that bonnie yellow broom"—lift up slowly one of the broad leaves of the water lily, and see if what I now state is verity—that the ruins of the smithy are to be seen in the loch even now. Benedicite! says Oldbuck. A. B. G.

THE FLIGHT OF JAMES II.

On the evening of the 6th of December 1688, the King, without previously communicating his intentions to the Queen, sent for the Count de Lauzun, the well-known favourite of Louis XIV., and desired him to make instant preparations for her departure: he then retired, harassed and miserable, to bed. Every thing having been duly prepared, at the appointed hour the Count de Lauzun, accompanied by Monsieur de St Victor, proceeded to the King's apartment, and informed him of the steps they had taken. James instantly rose from his bed, and proceeded to awake the Queen, who being unexpectedly made aware of the plan which was laid for her sudden departure, threw herself at her husband's feet, and, in a passion of grief, implored him to allow her to remain, and share the dangers which surrounded him. James, however, was inflexible, and gave orders that the two nurses of the Prince should be awakened. When the infant was brought into the room, the feelings of the father overcame his usual coldness, and tenderly embracing his child, he gave the most particular injunctions to the Count de Lauzun to watch carefully over his charge. It was now between three and four o'clock in the morning, in the most inclement season of the year, when the Queen, carrying her infant in her arms, stole in disguise down the back stair at Whitehall, to the private water entrance leading to the Thames. The fugitives seem to have been in great dread that the cries of the royal infant would attract the attention of the guards; fortunately, however, it slept, equally unconscious of the inclemency of the elements and of the change which was taking place in its own fortunes. At the foot of the stairs an open boat was in readiness, in which, in almost total darkness, with the discomforts of a high wind, a heavy rain, and the Thames being unusually tempestuous and swollen, the unfortunate Queen and her attendants crossed the river to Lambeth. A coach had been hired, but, by some accident, it was delayed. "During the time that she was kept waiting," says Dalrymple, "she took shelter under the walls of an old church at Lambeth, turning her eyes, streaming with tears, sometimes upon the Prince, unconscious of the miseries which attend upon royalty, and who upon that account raised the greater compassion in her breast, and sometimes at the innumerable lights of the city, amidst the glimmerings of which she in vain explored the palace in which her husband was left, and started at every sound she heard from thence." While in this disagreeable situation, the fugitives had a narrow escape from discovery. "The Queen," says Father Orleans, "waiting in the rain under the church wall for a coach, the curiosity of a man, who happened to come out of a neighbouring inn with a light, gave considerable cause of alarm. He was making towards the spot where she was standing, when Riva, one of her attendants, suddenly rushed forward and jostled him, so that they both fell into the mire. It was a happy diversion, as the stranger, believing it to be the result of accident, they both apologised, and so the matter ended." From Lambeth the Queen proceeded by land to Gravesend, where a vessel was waiting for her, in which, after a safe and expeditious voyage, she arrived at Calais about four o'clock on the following afternoon. The moment had now arrived when the unfortunate James found it imperative to consult his own safety. Accordingly, on the night previous to his flight, he communicated his determination to the Duke of Northumberland, the lord in waiting, desiring him, on his allegiance, to keep it a profound secret, till the necessity for concealment should no longer exist. On the following morning, the 11th of December, about three o'clock, the King withdrew from Whitehall by the private water entrance to the palace, and entered a boat, which was in waiting for him. The next morning the King's ante-chamber at Whitehall was thronged as usual by the officers of state, the gentlemen of his household, and others who were in the habit of attending his levee, and their surprise was excessive when, on the door of the bed-chamber being thrown open, instead of the King, the Duke of Northumberland made his appearance, and informed them of his Majesty's flight. Having performed this last act of kindness for his Sovereign, the Duke, who was a natural son of Charles II., immediately placed himself at the head of his regiment of Guards, and declared for the Prince of Orange.

James, in the meantime, had proceeded as far as Feversham, where he was boarded by a boat, containing thirty-six armed men, who, ignorant of his rank, and mistaking him for a fugitive Roman Catholic priest, detained and ill-treated him in the most shameful manner. During the progress of these events, the Prince of Orange had advanced as far as Windsor, and as it was unquestionably his interest that James should quit the kingdom, he was naturally annoyed and disconcerted at the King's progress having been arrested. The Prince immediately despatched a messenger to his persecuted father-in-law, desiring him on no account to proceed nearer to London than Rochester. The dispatch, however, arrived too late, for James was already far advanced on his way to London, and at night his return to the metropolis was hailed by the ringing of bells, the blazing of bonfires, and every manifestation of popular delight. Reresby, a contemporary writer, mentions the "loud huzzas" which were heard as the King passed through the city, and Father Orleans also observes, "This was a day of triumph: no man ever remembered to have seen the like; ringing of bells, bonfires, and all the solemnities that are usually exhibited to testify joy, were practised on this occasion." But when James for the last time re-entered the ancient palace of Whitehall, he found its gorgeous chambers almost deserted. Gratifying as must have been the evidences of reviving loyalty which were even now ringing in his ear, they proved of no substantial advantage to the fallen monarch. The herd of sycophants and time-servers had already gone to worship the rising sun. He was approached but by few persons of distinction, and had the mortification of seeing Dutch sentries doing duty beneath his windows. James was in bed at Whitehall, and was probably but little inclined to sleep, when, about midnight, his privacy was broken in upon by Lords Halifax, Shrewsbury, and Delamere, who informed him that he must quit London the next morning. For the purpose of being near the sea-coast, he requested that he might be allowed to make Rochester his residence, and, as it suited the views of his adversaries, his request was readily granted. He was conveyed down the river, attended by a Dutch guard, on a very tempestuous night, not without danger from the elements as well as from man. He remained at Rochester till the 23d of December, when, on another dark and stormy night, he proceeded, with his natural son, the Duke of Berwick, and two other faithful followers, in a small boat, down the river Medway, and about midnight reached a sailing-vessel, which was expecting him near the fort at Sheerness. After encountering much adverse and boisterous weather, the fugitives, on Christmas-day 1688, arrived safely at Ambleteuse in Picardy.—From Jesse's Memorials of London.

[The Tower of London, with its historical reminiscences, occupies a large space in Mr Jesse's volumes. He relates a fact of which we were not before aware. "There still exists," he says, "a curious and ancient ceremony connected with the opening and closing of the Tower gates. In the morning, the yeoman-porter, attended by a sergeant's guard, proceeds to the governor's house, where the keys of the fortress are delivered to him. From thence he proceeds to open the three gates; and, as the keys pass and repass, the soldiers on duty lower their arms. The yeoman-porter then returns to the innermost gate, and calls on the warders in waiting to take in Queen Victoria's keys; on which the gate is opened, and the keys are lodged in the warder's hall till night-time. At the closing of the gates, the same formalities are used as in the morning. As soon as the gates are shut, the yeoman-porter, followed by a serjeant's guard, proceeds to the main guard, who are all under arms, with the officer on duty at their head. The usual challenge from the main guard is, 'Who comes here?' To which the yeoman-porter answers, 'The keys.' The challenger returns, 'Pass, keys.' As they pass, the main guard lower their arms; on which the yeoman-porter exclaims, 'God save Queen Victoria,' and the guards answer, with loud voices, 'Amen.' The yeoman-porter then proceeds with his guard to the governor's house, where the keys are lodged for the night."—Critic.

ANTIQUARIAN RESEARCHES.

[From the "Ayrshire Monthly News-Letter," published by M. Dick, bookseller, Irvine—a paper conducted very much in the spirit of the ancient news-letter.]

We love the chronicles of days gone by. A black-letter-book has an incalculable charm to our eyes. We doat upon an old illuminated missal. Its dim, decayed gilding is fraught with rich memories of the hoary ancient times—of solemn processions and vesper chimes—midnight chaunts and matin prayers—the incense floating on the burdened air—and the deep-toned echo elicited from the venerable vaults which for generations have been the abodes of the bat and the owl. A kindred feeling possessed us lately when we lighted upon a dingy manuscript bearing upon circumstances and events, personal, domestic, moral and physical, that occurred in our own good burgh, more than a century ago. From this we extract a few passages interesting, in spite of their rude orthography, as showing the funeral expenses, the composition and character of the library, and the superstitious associations of a respectable man in the middle ranks of life:—

"1721.—Marion Wilson, my mother, ended her battles upon 27th Jan., 1721. Expense at her funeral:—5 points of brandy, £5; aquavetae, £1, 4s; a point of wine, £1, 4s; for white bread, £1, 4s; for pipes and tobacco, £2, 13s; for 2 gallons beer, £2, 4s; for 4 gallons ale, £3, 4s; for 2 do., £1, 12; for her coffin, £4; for mortcloth, £1, 10s; for candle, 5s.

"1731.—Account of what books I have, 17th June, 1731:—1. A muckl haus bible; 2. A small bible; 3. A new testament; 4. 3 salm books; 5. Two confessions of faith; 6. A large book, explaining two chapters of Timothy—E. Govms; 7. Another explaining six evangelical histories in St John; 8. Another explaining some doubts concerning baptism; 9. Several sermons of Mr Gray's; 10. Directions anent redeeming of time; 11. The marrow of modren divinity; 12. The balm of the covenant; 13. Another explaining the first book of Samuel; 14. The problems of Arastel; 15. Colpepper's midwife; 16. Robin Crusoe; 17. A large book concerning the rebellion in Ireland, and the wast; 18. A poime on the death and sufferings of Christ; 19. A book consarning the ordning of bars and orls in gardens; 20. The seven wise masters; 21. The government and order of the church; 22. The Westminster catechism; 23. Satan's invisible world discovered; 24. A discourse of faith in Jesus; 25. A discourse on the detress of Satan; 26. A discourse concerning several duteis; 27. Explanation on the first book of Samuel; 28. The cloud of witnesses; 29. The four fold state of men; 30. Kalib stow; 31. The ministry of faith opned up by Mr Andro Gray; 32. Advice to communicants; 33. The 12 emprors of Rowm.

"1733.—The year 1733, there was a great dearth from the middle of April to the 12th day of June, and some land not laboured—all the month of May was exceeding hot and Jun. On 27th June there arose about 8 o'clock a very great thunder and fire running with it, and it continued on till 1 o'clock that day very terrible close, and for one crack was not well over until another began. About 12 o'clock there came a very great shour of hailstones, and they were so big that they killed several fowls, besides cocks, hens, chickens, cows, dows, small birds, hares; and there were some of them as big as hen's eggs. It began about Symington and along by Capertown and Kilmaurs. The corn and beer and other grain was so smitend and cuted of the roots, that the like was not seen in Scotland in any generation. The very bow kail and red kail were smitend by the roots, and the bark was pealed of the bushes; and near by Air a lad and a lass was killed by the thunder and fire; the bonnet on his head was all burnt and torn to pieces, and the rim of it sticking about his head. In his pocket there was some few happinis and a knife, and by the violent heat the bawbise was sowdred to the knife, which was very admirable.

"1739.—On 13th Jan. 1739, there was an eclipsis of the moon at 10 o'clock at night, and there arose a great storm of wind, and about the middle of the night it was so violent that it was like to sweep all off the earth; and any body that was gono to bed was hastily rose up, for it blew down many houses, and many stacks it rent off, and blew down store gables, by which some folks lost their lives; and there was a great loss at sea. There was a ship of 200 tons driven on the south side of the Trun, with 19 men on board of her, for Verginia, and they won all safe to shore but one man; and there was three or four brandy boats lost, and the brandy came in on the shore, and the ship lay in at the ebb sea with much goods in her; and their came carpenters from Greenock, and wrought six weeks, and many others, and raised her out of the said sand, which cost a great deal of money, and she was taken about to Clyde the 1st June next. The value of ship and cargo was two hundred thousand marks.

"1739.—The year 1739, at Yowl, there came a great frost, and it was a great drouth with a violent cold. The frost was so strong, that it stopped all the burn mills from going, and many of the water mills, that many people could not get meal to serve them, and the pest continued on till after Candlemas very severe. No ploughs got going till 20th Feb., in some hot, dry ground; but through the clay ground they got no going till the 26th day, and very bad then, and many of the wild fowls died with cold; and the same season following there was a great drouth, and many people and beasts were straitened for want of water, and the grass was very bad, and the markets sore straitened for want of meal.

"1740.—On 28th Nov. 1740, there was a thunder bolt broke on the steeple of Irving, and it stroke one man dead which was in the Tolbooth, and wounded several others very sore; and a woman that was in seeing the prisoners, her clothes were burnt off her, and one of her eyes burnt out, and one of her shoes burnt off her feet, and her one side was burnt that they saw her bare ribs in her side, yet her life was saved; and it rent out of the middle of the steeple a hole that a man could have gotten in, out of the hewn stone, and rent several holes through the slates of the Tolbooth, and several folks in the town were dong down to the earth, and got no more harm; and at the same time the vittles was very scarce in the markets, the old meal was 14 and 15d per peck, and the bear was twelve pound per boll.

"1742.—The year 1742 was a plenty crop—the meal was sixpence the peck, and very little sale; and the bushel boll of bear was five pound and a mark; and the peas £4, 10s per boll.

"1748.—The Brig at Irving was taken down and built six feet lower—the whole brig by Mr Brown in the year 1748; and the money that was wast on it was £350 stg."

COLOURING OF ANCIENT ROMAN PAINTING.—In 1809, M. Chaptal made several experiments to ascertain the nature of seven specimens of colour, found in a colour-shop at Pompeii. No. 1, the only one which has not received any preparation from the hand of man, is a greenish and saponaceous argil, in the state in which nature presents it in various parts of the globe, and resembling that known by the name of Terra di Verona. No. 2, is an ochre of a beautiful yellow, all the impurities of which have been removed by washing. As this substance turns red by calcination with a gentle fire, the yellow colour, which it has preserved without alteration, affords a new proof that the ashes which covered Pompeii retained but a slight degree of heat. No. 3, is a brown red, like that employed at present for coarse work, and is produced by the calcination of the preceding. No. 4, is a pumice-stone. No. 7, is of a beautiful roseate hue: it is soft to the touch; is reduced between the fingers to an impalpable powder; and leaves upon the skin a pleasing carnation colour. From M. Chaptal's experiments, he looks upon it as a real lake, in which the colouring principle is united with alumine. In its properties, its hue, and the nature of its colouring principle, it has nearly a complete analogy with madder lake. The preservation of this lake for nineteen centuries, without perceptible alteration, is a phenomenon which cannot fail to excite the astonishment of chemists.

FIRST PACKET-BOAT BETWEEN LEITH AND LERWICK.—A packet-boat is now [1768] established between Leith and Lerwick in Zetland, the first to be dispatched from Leith on the 1st of May, and from Lerwick on the 1st of June, and to continue regularly every two months—to be dispatched from Leith on the first days of July, September, November, January, March and May, and from Lerwick on the first days of August, October, December, February, April and June, wind and weather serving. The portage is sixpence for a single letter, and proportionally at that rate, exclusive of any other charge.—The first packet sailed from Leith May 1.

DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT ARMS.—A curious and interesting discovery of ancient arms was made a few days ago by some labourers employed in cutting drains upon the farm of Thrumton, near Wittingham, in the county of Northumberland, the property of Lord Ravensworth. These weapons, five in number, consisting of three spear heads and two sword blades, were found about two feet and a half below the surface, within a very small space, sticking with the points downwards in the moss. All are composed of the same material, bright shining brass, which seems to have been preserved instead of corroded by the action of the damp soil in which these relics have been deposited for so many centuries. They are all different in their construction, and all in equal preservation, with the mouldings and edges as sharp or sharper than a modern cavalry sword. Upon comparison with other remnants of a similar description, there appears to be no doubt that these weapons are of Roman fabric. They are now in the possession of the Hon. H. T. Liddell of Easington House, who, immediately upon the discovery, gave directions for further investigation to be made in the spot where these were found, but without success. It was conjectured that they might have been deposited in the earth over the place of sepulture of a Roman soldier. It is difficult to account for their peculiar position, and conjecture is at fault in the absence of any additional remains in the vicinity.

RARE RELIC.—There is a very rare and valuable relic in the library of the Dublin University—the Gospels of St Patrick in the old vernacular. In the glass cases towards the eastern end of the library this curious deposit attracts special attention. It was the gift of the late Professor McCullagh to the University, and purchased by him for 300 guineas, thus anticipating the British Museum, for which they were 'in transitu'.

"SÆ HAPPY AS WE HAE BEEN."—In the first volume of the Memoirs of the Abbe Morellet, a member of the French Academy, (Paris, 1821,) there occurs a curious anecdote relative to Dr Franklin, with whom Morellet was intimate. He was particularly fond of Scottish airs, and once travelling in America he found himself in the Allegany Mountains, and took up his abode in the house of a Scoteliman, who, having lost his fortune, was living there with his wife, who had been very pretty, and a daughter of sixteen years of age. One fine evening, "assis au devant de leur porte, la femme avais chante l'air Ecossais 'Such merry as we have been,' d'une maniere si douce et si touchante, qu'il avoit fonder en larmes, et que le Souvenir de cette impression etait encore tout vivant en l'eu apres de trente annees." The mistake of 'such' for 'sae,' and 'have' for 'hae,' is amusing enough; but the anecdote is interesting, and affords an illustration—if, indeed, any were requisite—of the singular fascination of a simple Scottish melody.

CURIOUS ADVERTISEMENT.—Dec. 15th 1720. All sort of Canarie birds of several coloures White, Brown, Yellow, Gray and Martle, are to be sold by two Germans at reasonable rate in the House of John Kincaid, Shambroek Maker, at the Foot of the West-Bow, on the South side of the Grass-Market.—CAL. MER. No. 100.

THE EARLY DRAMA OF ATHENS.—Solon, after having heard Thespis acting (as all the early composers did, both tragic and comic) in his own comedy, asked him afterwards if he was not ashamed to pronounce such falsehoods before so large an audience. And when Thespis answered that there was no harm in saying and doing such things merely for amusement, Solon indignantly exclaimed, striking the ground with his stick, "If once we come to praise and esteem such amusement as this, we shall quickly find the effects of it in our daily transactions." For the authenticity of this anecdote it would be rash to vouch, but we may at least treat it as the protest of some early philosopher against the deceptions of the drama; and it is interesting as marking the incipient struggles of that literature in which Athens afterwards attained such unrivalled excellence.

GLENROY—ITS TOWN, ROADS, AND PEOPLE.

GLENROY, in Lochaber, is accessible from the east, by way of Dalwhinnie or Kingussie, on the Highland road. From Kingussie the distance is about forty miles, which the traveller can either post or walk. The scenery throughout will amply repay the toil and trouble of a visit. For the first twelve miles the road follows the Spey, here a considerable river, although its source, at the feet of Corryarrick, is not many miles distant. Cluny Castle, the seat of Ewen Macpherson of Cluny-Macpherson; and Laggan village—the latter so intimately connected with the name and fame of Mrs Grant of Laggan—are on the way. From the last-mentioned point the road passes, by Strathmashie and Strathpaacock, to Loch Laggan, and along the north shore of that romantic lake, through an old forest of dwarf birches and hazels. This will probably be, in future, the favourite route, opening, as it does, the scene where her Majesty lately fixed her court. Glenroy is, however, much more easy of access from the west coast. Leaving the Inverness steamer at Maryburgh (or Fort-William) the traveller will have a drive of ten miles along the base of Bennevis, and through Torlundy Moss, to the Bridge of Roy Inn. The only objects of historical interest on this road are the old Castle of Inverlochy, now the property of Lord Abinger, and the field of the two battles of Inverlochy. If the traveller is at all given to moralising among tombs, he may step into the unenclosed graveyard of Maryburgh, which lies on the wayside; where he may observe this characteristic inscription over the grave of a Cameron—"He was the best deer-stalker of his day." The inn at the Bridge of Roy is placed conveniently at the mouth of the glen, near the junction of the Roy and the Spean, the united waters of which shortly afterwards lose themselves in the Lochy.

Glenroy, at its entrance, is not prepossessingly beautiful. Even in the height of summer there is something cold and monotonous about it. The want of wood of any size takes away from it the charm of some of the Perthshire glens; and when autumn has browned the hills, its aspect becomes doubly dreary. The mouth is wide; the long slopes of the hills are covered from top to bottom with bracken; and when we visited the glen, late in September last, cold clouds were resting upon the summits. The fern was brown and withered; the pasture had a dingy hue; no cattle were feeding on the hills; no hut was to be seen; and but for the green leaves of bushes, by the side of the stream winding down the bottom of the glen, the scene would have been altogether unpleasant and deathlike. The spirit of the landscape seemed to have left the hills and settled in the road; the many evolutions, descents and ascents of which were quite incomprehensible, seeing that the hill-side seemed perfectly straight. As we advanced the scenery improved. A mile or two onwards there is a thick oakwood, though the timber appears as if the climate or the soil was unfavourable to its growth. In a sweet little dell in the bosom of this wood, a branch of the Roy is crossed by a small stone bridge, much more picturesque than safe. The scene at this point is certainly delightful; the burn twisting and twining with a sobbing sound betwixt immense boulders; the bridge spanning from rock to rock; and high wooded banks, enclosing the valley, revealing only the blue dome above. Emerging from the glen, an entire change of scene awaited us. Now were to be seen cultivated fields, the yellow ears of barley waving over the footpath; and all at once we found ourselves in the midst of a Highland town, consisting of some twelve or fourteen bothies. As the guide-books speak only of the "parallel roads;" and as the glens we had hitherto visited were carefully preserved from houses of any kind, save the box of a gamekeeper or the hut of a shepherd, we were agreeably surprised. A few paces farther on, and from the top of a small eminence, one, two, or three other hamlets, or "towns," as the people designate them, were observed, occupying different corners of the glen. The first is called Babautin-vil; the second, Bahantin-mor; the third, Bahinnie, and the fourth, Creanachan. Each of these villages contains some twenty families, renting together a portion of the hills from the Mackintosh, (proprietor of the glen), on which they rear their flocks and herds as a joint-stock speculation. Each family, again, has its separate croft, on which its agricultural skill is spent for its own special enrichment. Nothing can differ more than the aspect of these villages from that of the rural hamlets in some of the agricultural counties in England. There are no trim lines of whitewashed walls to glance in the sunshine; no hundred-year-old oaks to throw their branches over the walls; no honeysuckle beside the doors, to cast perfume on the wind; no garden-plot to show its lines of martial-looking stocks, its beds of bachelor's buttons, and knots of marigolds. No "village church" peeped betwixt graveyard elms; no inn shows its "Markis o' Granby" swinging above the door; no school-house presents its unmistakable outlines. All the sweet elements of beauty are wanting, and yet there is something pleasingly picturesque, certainly peculiar, about these Highland "towns." There is a want of order, but an air of happy contentment and sociality is present. The houses are pitched exactly as the owner wills. There is no plan to follow out; no specification to be attended to; no roadway to be preserved; no garden to be enclosed. Donald placed his castle here; Ronald built his house there; and so that Donald and Ronald were pleased nobody else had a voice in the matter. Some two or three of the houses stand on something like a line; but the next ungallantly turns its back upon its neighbours. Another has squatted right in the middle of the road; while the remainder are sown all about, some this way, some that way, as fancy has dictated. The "towns" themselves are in the middle of grass fields, and the order of architecture prevailing is of the simplest description. But for the anti-sanitary position of the manure heaps; the rheumatic-making windows, destitute of glass; and the thick internal atmosphere of smoke; there is something for a stranger to envy in these primitive towns. Although late in the year, the hay crop was only in preparation; and the merry daughters of the village were raking up hay before the doors; and spreading it out to the feeble sunshine close to the windows. Where there is no beadle there is little to fear from the magistrate; and swarms of children tumbled about in all manner of games in the very middle of the "thoroughfares." Here was a place where the philosopher might shut himself out from the bustle of the world, and still be one in the houses of men. Where comes no postman, no coach, no carrier, and no newspaper; where there is neither lawyer, physician, apothecary, missionary, magistrate, taxgatherer, publican, piper nor poet, there is likely to be peace, and perfect immunity from all the concerns of the big, noisy world. How fit then, Bahinnie or Bahantin—places in which, after six months residence, the exile would seize the ancient mariner by the button, glad to hear even his tale. Surrounding the villages are the croft-lands. At the time of our visit the potatoes were meeting in the drills, the fields of barley and oats were waving yellow and ripe; old and young, who were not in the hay-fields or on the hill with the sheep, were reaping, and binding, and building stooks; and as the year was unusually early and productive, an air of cheerfulness dwelt upon the scene.

A short way beyond upper Bahantin, Glenroy curves to the left, and the valley becomes narrow, steep, and wooded on the lower banks. The hills of Bennvanicaig, Creanachan, Bentullich, and Benahuirin form a panorama, over which towers Craig Dhu—"Craig Dhu," the war cry of the Macphersons. From the point of the Breagach, the finest view of "the parallel roads" is obtained. They are three lines running parallel to each other, along the sides of the four hills first named; the two uppermost closer together than the third. Seen from below they are distinctly marked, and assume the appearance of terraces; but as the visitor ascends they become less distinct, and scarcely distinguishable from the green hillside. They vary in breadth, slope like the sea-beach, and are formed of gravel. On the east side of the glen they do not extend for any great length unbroken; but on the left, with occasional breaks where rocks intervene, they extend round the end of the hill into Glengloy, preserving a perfect level. The same appearance may be observed extending along the hills east and west of the entrance to Glenroy, for several miles. Three different opinions or conjectures are hazarded respecting the origin of these celebrated lines. The old Celtic tradition attributes them to the days when the Caledonian monarchs held court on the banks of Loch Laggan, and followed the deer in the neighbouring glens. Then, it is said, the roads were made to facilitate the passage of the royal hunters. Professor Agassiz attributed their formation to the operation of glaziers. The third conjecture has found an able supporter in Mr Robert Chambers, who considers them to be the marks of ancient sea-beaches. That gentleman has, within these few days, completed a careful admeasurement of the lines, and finds, we believe, that they correspond with other marks of a similar character, in various parts of the kingdom. The glacier-theory is certainly ingenious, but the sea-beach theory seems the more probable. For the curious in such matters, we may mention that Prince Albert, after carefully inspecting the parallel roads, when lately in this country, picked up and carried off a beautiful round white pebble, as a remembrancer of the glen and its phenomena.

Glenroy was at one time inhabited, almost exclusively, by a branch of the clan Macdonald. Until lately that was the prevailing name, but now the Macintoshes are equally numerous. A Glenroy man is said to have killed the last wolf in Lochaber. Glenroy has always been noted for producing strong men; and a family, of the name of Macdonald, living in Creanachan, are now noted all over the district for their strength. One of this family carried off two first prizes at the games, held at Ardverrick in August last, in the presence of her Majesty, in honour of the birthday of the Prince Consort. After the battle of Inverlochy, when the men of the Isles so signally defeated the royal troops under the Earls of Mar and Caithness, Mar is said to have escaped on foot, and to have reached Glenroy worn and weary. While lurking about the heights, dreading to enter the huts of the Macdonalds, though famishing with hunger, he encountered an old woman, who luckily had in her pocket a small store of barley meal. Necessity is the mother of invention, and taking off his shoe, the Earl washed it in water, stirred up the meal with water in the shoe, and while he feasted upon this humble mess, he cheerfully remarked to his benefactress, in a Gaelic rhyme still preserved, that "of all cooks hunger is the best." Having got as far up the glen as Breagach, Mar was there compelled to seek shelter from a cottar, who bore, according to tradition, the name of O'Biron. The poor cottar held hospitality to be the best of all virtues; an empty larder, when a stranger sought food, the worst of all misfortunes. He gave the shelter required; killed his only cow to entertain his guest; and at night hid him in the hide of the slaughtered animal. By the help of O'Biron the distressed soldier escaped from the dangerous neighbourhood, and safely reached his own country. The story at last "spunked" out, to the horror of the rebellious Macdonalds, who were proceeding to take summary vengeance on their false neighbour, when he fled with his family under cover of night. The shelter which the cottar had given to the peer, the peer, it is said, requited to the cottar, who all his life after had reason to rejoice that fate had permitted him to be a friend in need.

VISIT TO THE GRAVE OF THE POET BEATTIE.—ST NICHOLAS CHURCH- YARD, ABERDEEN.

It seems to be one of the beneficent provisions of an all-wise Providence, that early impressions, as they are the most sweet and delectable which the mind of man experiences, so they should at the same time be the most lasting and imperishable. That our boyhood and youth—the happiest periods of our existence, because we have not then embarked amid the cares and turmoils of a distracting world, and because we then possess within ourselves so many sources of enjoyment which have not yet been cloyed—should, as it were, secrete and treasure up a happiness whereby to sweeten our old age, when cares may have accumulated upon us, and when most of our other sources of enjoyment have become dry. Accordingly, it has been remarked of old men, that they can remember better upon the circumstances of their boyhood than upon the events of yesterday; and seldom, indeed, do those retrospections partake of a gloomy, but almost always of a cheerful cast. Memory, in this respect, has been compared to the bag of the bee, which only retains the sweets of what has been partaken, and suffers all that is bitter to pass away. Thus the freshness of youthful feeling in an ardent mind, its buoyant hopes and pleasing fancy dreams, Time may blunt, and dim, and tarnish, but cannot utterly destroy; its generous aspirations and vehement desires experience may mar and mangle, but cannot annihilate. For every pang of disappointed endeavour there is a hope treasured up of possible fruition. For every affection which, in our bitterness, we say has been thrown away, there is a new love planted, purified by our recent affliction. And when possession or participation comes, and we find them fall far short of our too sanguine expectations, even then we are enabled to magnify our enjoyment to a banquet by the bright colouring of our hopes; and this sweetens what would, indeed, be a drug to us if partaken of under the baneful aspect of our disappointment.

It were interesting to observe into how many of our sentiments and emotions the pleasurable associations arising from early impressions are found to enter; but as this would lead us from our present purpose, we will only stay to remark that they are elements in our patriotism, for who does not include with peculiar emphasis in the sentiment of love of country his affection for the place of his birth, the scenes of his early days; ay, and even

"The school-boy spot,

We ne'er forget, tho' there we are forgot!"

That they form some of the principal ingredients in the cup of friendship; for, although a friend may become endeared to us solely by his kindness of heart or congeniality of mind, yet it will form no mean share in the enjoyment of friendship that we can talk to our friend of our mutual boyhood, when we "ran about the braes," or "paddled in the burn" together. It will be like rising from the grave with a liberal-minded contemporary, and reviewing all the improvements that have taken place since we were gathered to our fathers; or like gazing through an inverted telescope at a well-known and much-loved scene: the landscape thus observed may appear to others small and insignificant, but to us it will be one concentrated spot of entire sunshine! And, finally, that it is a modification of this same feeling which, by its own peculiar alchymic process, extracts all the gorgeous circumstances of romance and chivalry out of the often ill-assorted and jarring events of the past.

Such were our reflections when preparing to visit our native city, Aberdeen, after a long absence. Arrived at last, it was with considerable interest that we examined the extensions and improvements that had taken place since we left it. Here new, broad streets had replaced the old narrow lanes and closes—there splendid buildings had been erected; and where we could remember green fields, pleasing hedge-rows, and even avenues of trees, suburban streets were now opened, either completely built up, or fast hastening towards completion. These novelties, however, were soon exhausted: but there was one spot through which, in our boyish days, we had many a truant ramble, and a re-visitation of which offered a rich treat of old reminiscences and associations—this was the churchyard of St Nicholas. Many a summer Sunday afternoon, when perhaps we should have been more devoutly employed, have we wandered about in this churchyard, coning the legends engraven on the tombstones, alternately touched or amused by their pathos or quaintness. Sometimes, too, we would steal with muffled step along the aisles of one of the neighbouring churches, gazing with boyish wonder on the rudely chisled figures of armed knights and stately ladies that lay in the ample window-sills; and our wonder and admiration often rose to an ecstasy when we came to look upon the more finely finished specimens of modern sculpture that were scantily scattered around. Then there was that old monumental brass, with its mystic-like characters*—the ancient tapestry†

* "Lykewayes, that learnit man, Doctor Duncan Lid-that completely clothed one side of the church—the canopied and cushioned seat for the magistrates, and where the judges of the Circuit Court sometimes sat in (to us) awful dignity. Rising from this, our infant fancy would conjure up the time—until it appeared to gleam in very reality before our eyes—when, where now stand the two places of worship, the great Church of St Nicholas* once stood; and we would people the dreamy twilight with visions of its ancient grandeur. We would see the light streaming through its great windows, or sparkling from its “aucht chandlers of fyne silver,” and its “fiftie twa brazen chandlers,” upon its “great latroun, of massive brass, within the quire, in forme of the pelican with her birds, qhuarin the evangell was red;” or upon its thirty-one altars, with their “furnitures, or hingers befor the altars, of fyne crommassie veluot, crommassie satyn, reid dumass, quhyt, black and violat welvets and satynes, dropit with gold and golden letters;” while its priests, clad in their “fyne mass cloathis of cloath of gold, crommassie grein, black and purpour velvet, stornit with gold,” kept some solemn festival, and displayed their “aucht siluer chalices, with their patennes, tua siluer eucharists, ane siluer steip, ane crosie, siluer stock, six siluer alter spunes, tua censures fyne siluer,” and timed their chaunts to the peals of the “pair of fyne organes, weill furnisheit with their sang buird and all their tungs,” and the fitful song of nature’s organ—the wind—sighing through the “aucht gryt aiken treis, growin within the said kirkyard,”† mingled up into a pageant of grandeur such

“As youthful poets dream
On summer eves by haunted stream.”

These fancies, mingling with the tales and legends of our boyish readings, had altogether filled such a corner of our memory that we longed to refresh our recollections of early musings by visiting the scene where they were first suggested.

Indulging this desire, we soon found ourselves among our old acquaintances the grave-stones.

dle lyes buried in the Old Church; his tombe stone, covered with brasse, with an inscriptione suteable to his worth engraved thereupon.”—A Description of bothe Towns of Aberdene, by James Gordon of Rothemay—1661. “Dr Duncan Liddle (born 1661, died 1613), Professor of Mathematics and of Medicine in the Universities of Rostock and Helmstadt, was the chief support of the Medical School of the last-named seminary, and first physician to the Court of Brunswick.”—Book of Bonaccord.”

† “The east gallery contains an elegant canopy, supported by four fluted mahogany columns, of the Corinthian order, with gilt capitals. The town’s arms are cut in ‘alto relievo’ on the front of the canopy, and on the wall behind are two pieces of tapestry, by Mary Jamieson, daughter of George Jamieson, the celebrated painter. The one represents Ahasuerus presenting the golden sceptre to Queen Esther: the other, Jephtha meeting his daughter.”—Bonaccord Repository.”

* “The Old Church began to be builded by the citizens about the yeir 1060, the subrick augmented by litle and litle, and enriched with gifts dedicated therunto.”—A Description of bothe Towns, &c.”

† A summons against the magistrates of Aberdeen, dated 1691, for having “sauld, disponit, delapidat, and uthawayes usit and away put” the goods of the burgh, furnishes the catalogue of Church property from which the above items are taken.

We do not remember any thing particularly original among their inscriptions; they consist chiefly of appropriate passages of scripture, or verses of sacred song. There, however, is the brave exultation of the old mariner—

“Tho’ Boreas’ blasts and Neptune’s waves
Have tossed me to and fro,
In spite of both, by God’s decree,
I harbour here below;”

and then his quaintly-technical expression of Christian hope,

“Where at an anchor I do lie
With many of our fleet,
Till once again we do set sail
Our admiral, Christ, to meet!”

There, too, is that sweet verse, which so beautifully alludes to the short earthly existence of some cherub babe,

“This lovely child, so young and fair,
Cut off by early doom,
Just came to show how fair a flower
In paradise may bloom.”

And there, too, is an inscription—a prose composition of considerable length—which we had retained in our mind almost entire since boyhood, through all the vicissitudes of intervening years. We found it well for us that our memory could assist us in reading the epitaph of Robert Fordyce, for when we came to examine the stone, it was so worn with footsteps, or overgrown with grass (for it is not a “through-stane,” but lies recumbent on the ground) that it was almost illegible. There is neither date nor obituary upon this stone. It merely recounts, in antithetical sentences, that “Robert Fordyce was one who, even in these days of prevailing degeneracy and polite dissimulation, had the fortitude to approve himself an Israelite indeed, in whom there was no guile.” That, “with a warm heart, he possessed a cool understanding;” that, “to sufficient sensibility of temper he joined an entire command of it;” that “his integrity no temptation could corrupt, his composure no calamity could conquer;” that “while other men talked of philosophy, he was satisfied to practice it;” that he was “candid to others, to himself severe;” that, “having fixed his eye on another world, he passed through this with innocence;” that “in his life he was beloved by his friends, blessed by the poor, and honoured by all—in his death by all lamented. By none more (exclaims the author of the epitaph)—by none more than by him who writes them, not as a trial of skill, but as the language of truth; not to gain the applause of his readers, but to soothe the sadness of his soul!”

These had all been musing places in our boyhood, and now formed green spots in our memory; but there was one grave over which our musings were always of a more imaginative cast, and we purposely deferred our visit to it until we had schooled our feelings to the proper tone. This was the grave of the poet Beattie. Ever since we were able to appreciate poetry, “sweet melodious Beattie’s minstrel lays” have been our special favourites. We have loved to wander in fancy along with his young Edwin, “where the maze of some bewilder’d stream to deep untrodden groves his footsteps led.” To contemplate the holy calm of his Hermit, "at the close of the day when the hamlet was still,—and nought but the nightingale sung in the grove." Or to enter the lonely and tangled woodland, where his sweet personification of "Solitude, mild, modest Power, lean'd on her ivied shrine." And, our heart overflowing with his beautiful imaginations, we now revisited the grave of our favourite poet.

It was one of those quiet summer evenings when, even over a churchyard in the midst of a bustling city, there hovers a Sabbath calm. The noisy stir of children, who will play, even over the mansions of the dead, had died away, as one by one they retired to their various homes. The swallows wheeled and curveted around the neighbouring spire, but it seemed on noiseless wings; and the striking of the clock, as with a frugal jealousy of the departure of time it doled it out in quarters of hours, had something of a drowsiness in its sound. But perhaps the quiet and contemplative tone of our poet's strains, which were now rising like welling streams in our mind, had a powerful effect in thus throwing a stillness over every surrounding sight and sound. Whatever the cause, we were soon afloat in one of those reveries which have many a time enabled us to sweeten the often bitter cup of life.

It seemed as if a quiet pastoral country opened up before us, where the occasional tinkle of a wether-bell, or the light laugh of children that played around a solitary hamlet, alone broke in upon the surrounding calm. Soon, however, some other sounds fell upon our ear, but still in strict keeping with the scene, for, apart from the "clamorous fry of squabbling imps," sat one who, caring not for gauds or toys, sought ever to flee from noise and concourse, and seemed supremely blessed to pour out the infant melody of his soul through his "one small pipe of rudest minstrelsy." Anon, by that imperceptible process of scene-shifting—like the changing of cloud scenery—so peculiar to our dreams, "the shepherd swain of whom we mention made," was now tracing "the uplands to survey, when o'er the sky advanced the kindling dawn," or climbing the craggy cliff, "while all in mist the world below was lost;" now roving "beneath the precipice o'erhung with pine," and watching the foaming torrents leaping from crag to crag. Or, "when the setting moon, in crimson dyed, hung o'er the dark and melancholy deep," hieing to some haunted stream, where fays of yore were wont to hold their revels, and letting his fancy roam at large through all the regions of fairyland. In sooth, like Byron's dream,

"There was a mass of many images
Crowded like waves upon us, but he was A part of all."

Beside the blazing winter hearth, he was listening to the ancient beldam's legends or old heroic ditties; or roaming the snowy waste to see the stupendous clouds sailing along the blue horizon; gazing with youthful ardour the fleeting rainbow of summer, or mourning over the devastations of autumn. But perhaps the sweetest feature in all our vision was when the "lone enthusiast" descended upon that deep retired vale, "and those long, long groves eternal murmur made," and beheld, within a flowery nook, the ancient hermit sitting on a mossy stone, while "his harp lay him beside," and the stag sprang at his call from the pasture, and licked his withered hands as he wreathed his antlers with woodbine,

"And hung his lofty neck with many a floweret small!"

Peace to thy gentle spirit! thou sweetest of poets, thou most hopeful of Christians! Many a gentle vision hast thou enabled us to frame—many a tender thought hast thou planted in our mind. Surely those hopes of a blessed immortality, which thou hast so warmly and so beautifully expressed, can never be blasted.

"Shall nature's voice, to man alone unjust,
Bid him, though doom'd to perish, hope to live?
Is it for this fair virtue oft must strive
With disappointment, penury, and pain?
No: Heaven's immortal spring shall yet arrive;
And man's majestic beauty bloom again,
Bright thro' the eternal year of love's triumphant reign."

DESCRIPTION OF, AND CONVERSATION WITH PRINCE CHARLES-EDWARD STEWART.

BY LADY MILLAR.

WE passed part of the evening at the duchess of Bracciano's. As we were there early, before much company was arrived, she was so obliging as to enter into a particular conversation with me. We were seated on a sofa, when one of the gentlemen in waiting entered and announced il Re. As there were many rooms to pass before this personage could appear, she seized the opportunity to desire me upon no account to speak to, or take the least notice of him, as it was not only what she insisted upon in her house, but that it was the Pope's desire that no stranger, particularly English, should hold any conversation with him. I assured her my principles were diametrically opposite to the Stuart family and their party, adding more of the like sort; but I concluded with saying, that, if he spoke to me, I could not, as a gentlewoman, refrain from answering him, considering him only in the light of a gentleman, and should treat him as I would do any other foreigner or native, with that general civility requisite on such occasions. She still insisted upon my not answering, should he speak to me; with which I refused to comply. I think I was right; my reasons were these; I knew before that no gentlemen of the British empire make themselves known to him, but on the contrary avoid it, except such as declare themselves disaffected to the present royal family; at least so it is understood at Rome. I had also heard that he politely avoided embarrassing them by throwing himself in their way; but as I am not a man, it struck me as very ridiculous for me, a woman, not to reply to the Pretender if he spoke to me, as such a caution would bear the appearance of passing myself for being of political consequence; added to these considerations, I had great curiosity to see him, and hear him speak.

But to return; he entered, and bowing very politely to the company, advanced to the individual sofa on which I was placed with the duchess of Bracciano, and seated himself by me, having previously made me a particular bow, which I returned with a low curtesy. He endeavoured to enter into a conversation with me, which he effected by addressing himself equally to the duchess, another lady, and myself. At last he addressed me in particular, and asked me how many days since my arrival at Rome, how long I should stay, and several such questions. This conversation passed in French. What distressed me was how to style him. I had but a moment for reflection. It struck me that Mon Prince (though the common appellation (as in France) to every stranger, whose rank as a prince is most dubious) would not come well from me, as it might admit of a double sense in an uncandid mind. Highness was equally improper; so I hit upon what I thought a middle course, and called him Mon Seigneur. I wished to shorten the conversation, for all on a sudden he said, "Speak English, madam." Before I could reply, the duchess of Monte Libretti came up, and pulled me by the sleeve. I went with her to a card table, at which she was going to play. I declined playing, not being perfect in the games; besides you know I hate cards. At my departure, I took leave of the duchess of Bracciano (agreeable to the custom); and the Chevalier, who played at her table, officiously civil, rose up, and wished me good night. He is naturally above the middle size, but stoops excessively. He appears bloated and red in the face, his countenance heavy and sleepy, which is attributed to his having given into excess of drinking; but when a young man, he must have been esteemed handsome. His complexion is of the fair tint, and the contour of his face a long oval. He is by no means thin, has a noble presence, and a graceful manner. His dress was scarlet, laced with a broad gold lace. He wears the blue ribbon outside of his coat, from which depends a cameo (antique) as large as the palm of my hand; and wears the same garter and motto as those of the noble order of St George in England. Upon the whole, he has a melancholic, mortified appearance. Two gentlemen constantly attend him. They are of Irish extraction, and Roman Catholics you may be sure.

This evening, after quitting the Cardinal's, we were at the Princess Palestrine's conversazione, where he was also. He addressed me as politely as the evening before. The princess desired me to sit by her; she played with him: He asked me if I understood the game of Tarocchi (what they were about to play at)? I answered in the negative; upon which, taking the pack in his hands, he desired to know if I had ever seen such odd cards? I replied, that they were very odd indeed. He then, displaying them, said, "Here is every thing in the world to be found in these cards, the sun, the moon, the stars; and here (says he, showing me a card) is the Pope; here is the devil;" and added, "there is but one of the trio wanting, and you know who that should be." I was so amazed, so astonished, though he spoke this last in a laughing, good-humoured manner, that I did not know which way to look; and as to a reply, I made none, but avoided cultivating conversation as much as possible, lest he should give our conversation a political turn. What passed afterwards was relative to some of the English manners and amusements, such as, whether whist was in fashion at London, the assemblies numerous, &c. I was heartily glad when my visit was finished.

LETTERS FROM A PILGRIM IN SCOTLAND.

No. II.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL.

SIR—I now enclose "The Witch of Torwood," a tradition. The Legend of Loch Coulter and the present tradition are sooth and verity, and I do not therefore expect an Edie Ochiltree to "drop in" upon me and confound my Agricola Dicavit Libens Lubens with an "Aiken Drum's Lang Ladle." Torwood, near Falkirk, is a "Mecca" to me, because of the tree which once yielded protection to Wallace—because the ruins of the castle—a truant haunt of "auld lang syne," are still there. I have several "things," not valueless, regarding Falkirk. These in my next.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
A. B. G.

THE WITCH OF TORWOOD.

A TRADITION.

THOMAS R—, alias "elder Thomas," was a smith and the laird of a "neuk o' land," near the Torwood. This "neuk o' land," as "elder Thomas" delighted to call it, employed ae plough, i. e. he managed the 'neuk' with the assistance of a man and a boy, without neglecting the anvil.

Thomas R— and Mary D—, after many a "tryst," are now Mr and Mrs R—. They have the "blessin' o' a' the village." For Mary was a "kin' lassie," and "elder Thomas" was "respeckit."

Five years have passed, and with the five years much. Thomas R— and Mary D— are still in the 'neuk,' he attending to the rigs and the anvil; she to the "bairns," (son and daughter) and "Crummie." Grannie M'Nab, wha grat wi' very joy whan the minister joined the han's o' Thomas R— and Mary D—, is dead. James F—, the patriarch of the village, is also dead.

Twelve years are past, and with the twelve years much. Thomas R— and Mary D— are still in the 'neuk,' and the "bairns at the skule." All are happy, but strangers are in the village now. Strangers—and whisperers. Two are met. Listen—"an' ye ken' Mrs W—, their twa kye, Creukit Horn an' Rin Awa, gie mair milk than sax o' the lave." "True, Mrs W—," says Mrs R—, "an' their butter fetches a far langer price." Mrs T—, of the public, joins the two. "Weel, Mrs W— an' Mrs R—, this is a fine day." "Nae sae ill, Mrs T—," says Mrs W—, 'wi' a skirle,' "but Mrs R— an' me are jist speakin' o' Mary D—, the Witch." "Witch ye may ca' hor, Mrs W—, for

I'm sure my man, John, took twa' as gude lades o' meal to the market o' Fa'kirk as e'er cam frae the grist, an' yet, wud ye believe it, Mrs W—— and Mrs R——, it didna bring in within twa dizen o' merks o' Mary D——'s. The woodie hae her. She's a witch, Mrs T——. Gars the win' shake the corn an'—an', but whish't—there she links." Mary D—— avoided the group—crossing the burn, and entering the wood—a pail of milk in each hand, and a pet lamb at her heels, round the neck of which "wee Mary" had twisted a few wild bells. Mrs W——, Mrs R——, and Mrs T——, return to their "buts an' bens." We need not follow them. However, every little thing that told of the comforts of the 'neuk,' was set down to witchcraft. "Her hens wi' taps, a' her hens had taps, laid eggs whan nae ither hens laid." Her laverock (Willie, the auld son, gaed a penny for't to a laddie frae Fa'kirk, wha' herried the nest near the Castle)—her laverock sung as gin' the gowan was its breast. Her flowers were aye blawin'. The myrtle an' the spraingit wa'-flower keekin' by the window sole, whare the robin-red-breast gat its crumb. Nae nits were like the nits i' the 'neuk,' an' the bram'le an' the blae-berry were like grapes frae far awa' kintra's. The very burnie cam jinkin' roun' an' roun', past a' the village, an' settled before the 'neuk,' whare the chuckie-stanes skinkled like the siller o' the mune. Her skeps were aye fu' o' hiney, an'—an'—Mary R—— must be a witch. Mrs W——, Mrs R——, and Mrs T—— had said it. The village had said it. The man and the herd, sent away from the 'neuk,' because they drank, spread the tale. Mary R—— must be a witch. The minister had said it—not the rev. John W——. Na! na! he was "gane to his rest"—it was anither preacher. Mrs R—— must be a witch. Well, she is seized, she is in prison. Hear the evidence, and shudder as you hear, for such evidence was the law not a hundred years ago, and in Scotland. John P——, the servant at the 'neuk' speaks. He tells the judge that Mrs R—— used to "waukin'" in the night and go out, returning in a little. That she then took a bridle, and coming to his bed, shook it over his head, muttering to herself, when he was immediately changed into a horse, which Mrs R—— mounted, to attend the witch gatherings on the muir. She would "tak' him the nicht, an' the callan the next." We were tired of our lives, and I at last determined not to sleep. When she came, and was just going to shake the bridle, I jumped up and caught the bridle, repeating the words that she used. Mary D—— immediately stood before me a beautiful black mare. I led her out as she had done me, mounted and had a gallop; but getting alarmed, as she might have carried me to the witch den, I curbed her in and brought her back. In the morning I told my master I had a fine mare to get shod. When she was brought out of the stable, and saw the shoes in her husband's hands, she groaned, and the tears cam' o'er her face; and she rubbed herself against him. The smith said he never saw a beast do the like. He lifted up one of her fore feet, and placing the shoe on it, drove in a nail. The pain vexed her, an' she flang down the bridle. The smith lifted it, and placing it on her neck again, instead of the mare—his wife stood before him, with a horse-shoe on her right hand and a nail in it. She begged him to take it out, which he did. There is nae mark now; but if the smith was livin' (an' he only deid in February last, twa' ouks bygane) he co'd a testified to the facts.

This was convincing. Next the herd callan'. He repeated the story of the servant o' the 'neuk,' but added, that although he was a horse, and knew he was changed into a horse, still he saw all that was going on around him. She led him to a low vault, dreich an' clammy, in the Castle of Torwood, where the witches met. They all gibbered and jeered with one another, and advanced to his mistress, as their mistress. They brought out a large bowl full of blood. His mistress plunged a new-peeled skull into it, and drank "prosperity to the witches." The rest joined, and quaffed from small skulls; their teeth grinning through it as it lapped on their throats. Some of the skulls had long yellow hair attached, glittering with jewels, and some had grey hair. He often heard screams, and thought he recognised kent voices.

This was the climax. Judge and jury condemned her at once. They all thrilled with horror, and it was with difficulty that further evidence was listened to. Mrs W—— and the neighbors testified to the fact, that the 'neuk' produced double of any other neuk. (Industry opposed to idleness. Miss Mason to Mrs M'Larty.) That what they had to sell, produced more in the market than theirs; (buyers will select the best); and all the wives were sure they made as gude butter an' cheese as Mary D—— did, but coudna get the "samen prices."

Mary R——, a very pattern of industry, quiet, and kin' to man an' beast, [the beggar aye gat a gowpen o' meal—a luckie gowpen—an' the blin' an' the cripple, speakin' o' the 'neuk,' wi' the tears fillin' i' their e'en, lifted up their han's, prayin' that the benison o' heaven micht light on Mary D——; the wee Cuttie Wren biggit its nest in the auld ha' tree by the very door, an' the swallow cam aye to the winnock,] was taken to Airth, and there burned as a witch. Many years after this, the man and the boy confessed their lies, and that the "ploy" was made up to revenge themselves for being "turned awa'." But it was too late. The moss an' the fern were wavin' owre her cairn.

EDINBURGH IN 1787.

ASSEMBLY GOSSIP—ROBERT BURNS "FROM AYRESHIRE."

TURNING over lately a mass of old letters addressed to a deceased Aberdeenshire Laird, I came upon one dated from Edinburgh, in February 1787, and written in a somewhat unpromising W.S. hand. It contained, however, one name which put the stamp of value upon its pages—the great name of BURNS. The letter told nothing new about the Poet, but it was penned by a hand which shortly before had felt the hearty pressure of his, and that was something. Wanting this, the following extracts cannot have the same interest, either in kind or degree, as the original document, but I venture them, merely promising that the writer of the epistle seems to have sat down, in an interval of graver occupations, to give a rambling answer to his correspondent's question of "What news?" touching, inter alia, on the election of a Master of the Ceremonies for the Edinburgh Assemblies, and the existing collections of Scottish Poetry. The transition from one subject to the other is sufficiently abrupt, but the unities were never studied by the most "polite letter-writer."

Our legal friend writes:—"I don't hear that Graham has any very serious opponent, but, in fact, I am so much among my books and so little in the gay world, that I know in general nothing of what has been going on till all is over. I think I heard of two or three people as being mentioned by others, who never, I daresay, thought of it for themselves; as, for instance, Haggart and Matthew Henderson. Would Matthew leave his friend and bottle to go bow at an Assembly? The time was, indeed, when he was at all of them.

"There is much occasion for a Master to controul and regulate their follies here, for I never beheld such an unruly, mixed multitude as I saw at the Queen's Assembly; a vast number of fine women pulled about in great disorder, and the whole machine wrought by one old Lady most shamefully. Par exemple, I saw an English lady stand up at the head of a sett with a ticket, No. 1 of that sett. By and bye my namesake, Miss Mary ———, came up, hauling after her a foolish-looking young man who did as he was bid, and with all the ease in the world placed herself above the stranger No. 1. The lady politely said there must be some mistake, for she had that place. 'No,' says Miss Mary, 'I can't help your ticket, but I have the Lady Directress' permission to lead down this sett! The Lady had spunk, and scolded, for which I liked her all the better; only she dealt her sarcasms about Scotch politeness, Edinburgh manners, and so forth, rather too liberally and too loudly. The partners were dumb—and I laughed at them all.

"I find many Collections of Scotch Poems, and I doubt they can only be had in collections, taking the bad with the good. There are Allan Ramsay's, Ferguson's (really good, many of them,)—and, after giving a list of others, the writer proceeds. "Lastly, Robert Burns, from Ayrshire, a real native genius, who held the plough last spring, and never was out of the shire till the people here got hold of him, and perhaps will spoil him. Creech introduced him to me the other day. He is really a wonderful fellow, and some of his pieces, in my opinion, where I understand them, extremely good. I desired Creech to put down your name, as well as my own, in his subscription list."

This opinion, modified as it is, marks pretty correctly the extent of the admiration which the public of that period entertained for the poems of "our national Bard." The great attraction of Burns in society was his conversational talent, and there was then no enthusiasm felt for his writings alone.

Every reader of Burns is familiar with one of the names mentioned in the letter quoted, and not much more is known of the "man of glee" who bore it, although the Poet declares that he loved him much, and has commemorated him in an immortal Elegy. One authority says that, "during the stay of Burns in Edinburgh, the Captain lived in the High Street, dined regularly at Fortune's Tavern, and was a member of the Capillaire Club, which was composed of all who inclined to the witty and joyous." And so thou didst play thy part, O rare Matthew Henderson!

NOTES FROM THE RECORDS

OF THE

OLD TOLBOOTH,

The "Heart of Mid-Lothian."

THE following notes from the records of the Old Tolbooth—the "Heart of Mid-Lothian"—of Edinburgh, were copied a number of years ago. The volumes, some of which are wholly wanting, were then in a state of considerable decay, arising from damp and improper treatment. Several long blanks consequently occur between the entries. The records begin at the Restoration of Charles II., in 1660.

1662, June 10. John Kincaid put in ward by warrant of the Lords of Privy Council, for "pricking of persons suspect of witchcraft, unwarrantably." Liberated on finding caution not to do so again.

— July 10. Robert Binning, for falsehood, hanged with the false papers about his neck.

— Aug. 13. William Reid, for murder. His head struck from his body at the Mercat Cross.

— Dec. 4. James Ridpath, tinker, to be "quhitt from Castlehill to Netherbow, burnt on the cheek with the Town's common Mark, and banished the Kingdom, for the crime of double adultery."

1663, March 13. Alexander Kennedy, hanged for "rising false bonds and writts."

— March 21. "Aucht Qwakers" liberated, certifying if again troubling this place, the next prison shall be the Correction House.

— July 8. Katharine Reid, hanged for theft.

— July 8. Archibald Johnston of Warriston, treason. Hanged, and his head cut off and put on the Netherbow.

[Lord Warriston had accepted office under Cromwell, and therefore laid himself open to the charge of treason. The Presbyterians assert that Charles II. never forgave him for "the freedom with which he had censured his profligacy while in Scotland. Sir Archibald, after his escape, had resided securely in Germany for two years; but having unadvisedly gone to Rouen, in Normandy, the English court claimed him, and he was delivered up by the French king. As a convicted traitor he was marched bare-headed from Leith to Edinburgh, his weak, enfeebled appearance creating universal commiseration."] — July 18. Bessie Brebner, hanged for child murder.

— Aug. 25. The Provost of Kirkcudbright "banished for keeping his house during a tumult."

— Sept. 52. Agnes Tailzour, hanged on the Castlehill for child-murder.

— Oct. 5. William Dodds, beheaded for murder.

— Dec. 2. Barbara Muir, hanged for child-murder.

1664, Feb. 13. Three men, for theft, received seven stripes each at the Cross, and thereafter banished.

— March 13. Captain John Swynton, "bayley" at Corstorphine. Murder of his "wyfe." Beheaded on the 23d of April following.

— March 19. Jannet Brown, widow, accessory to the murder of Swynton's wife, and for adultery. Tried. Charge found Not Proven, but sentenced by the Court to pay 100 merks to the poor.

— April 4. Francis Crichton, brother to Lord Crichton, charged with murder.

— July 3. "Four Englishmen" committed as "piratts," landed at Irvine. "Shipped at Leith for the English service."

— July 18. John Logan, Leith, for the murder of his "servatrix."

— Aug. 5. Magistrates of Jedburgh, by a warrant of Privy Council, for "allowing a ryat."

— Aug. 18. The Lords of the Privy Council allow William Dobie to go out of prison for sixty days, throughout the day, to work for his livelihood, and to return each night at eight o'clock. Six burgesses of Glasgow became cautioners for Dobie.

— Aug. 20. Richard Ferguson, for "venting and disposing of false coyne."

— Sept. 29. Barbara Drummond, "on suspition and presumption of witchcraft and sorcery in the Regalitie of Dumblaine." Sent to Stirling for trial.

— Dec. 2. William Mudie, fiar of Melsetter, for not finding caution to keep the peace, to be transported from Orkney to Edinburgh. By order of the Lords of Secret Council.

1665, Jan. 21. Warrant to the friends of a prisoner, who died, to wait upon him and embalm him. From another entry, this person appears to have been the "Laird of Meldrum."

— Jan. 24. Alexander Bruce, fornicator with Euphan Hardie, — Feb. 11. Marion Dickson, for "alleged witchcraft."

— Feb. 13. Lachlan Malcomtosh, stealing coin. Hanged at the Mercat Cross.

— Mar. 12. (Sunday) Sundry Quakers, John Swinton, his dochter and son, and twa servants, etc., by Lords of Privy Council, for assembling in contempt of authority and scandal of the professed religion. Warrant granted to the Lord Archbishop of Glasgow, the Earl of Teviotdale, and the Lord President of the Session, to meet and consider what measures necessary for their suppression; and the Magistrates of Edinburgh ordained to seize on all Quakers found at any meetings. (On the margin.) Quakers liberated on caution.

— Same day (Sunday). Mr Alexander Swinton's woman was warded at command of the four Bailies for murder of her own child. Hanged on the 26th of April following for this crime, and also for adultery with Swinton.

— April 12. Robert Armstrong and Anthony Potts. Tried at a Justice Court at Jedburgh, and sentenced "to be sold for slaves in some remote part."

— May 30. Margaret Hamilton, murder of her husband and adultery. Beheaded.

— June 3. Helen Henderson and Isobel Whitburgh, for murder.

— July 26. Agnes Anderson, for child murder.

— Oct. 6. John Duncan, fornication with Magdalen Reid, in the parish of Libberton.

— Nov. 28. Mr Alexander Smith, late minister, committed to the Thieves' Hole, and put in irons, by warrant signed "Rothes."

1666, Aug. 16. Agnes Anderson, child murder.

— June 5. Helen Henderson, "murder of her ane husband."

1667, Jan. 29. Marion Robinson, "for several scandals," on warrant by Lord Forrester of Corstorphine.

— March 9. Elizabeth Wilson and Janet Wilson, for the murder of a child brought forth by Elizabeth.

— March 23. Alexander Cumming, Sub-Collector of Customs and Excise at Ayr, "for not delivering up his Books. Warrant signed "Rothes."

— April 1. John Home of Kellie "Traytor."

— June 27. James Anderson, and other two "Rebells." Warrant signed "Rothes."

— Aug. 2. James Crawford, for the "wilful burning of the Mansion House of Over Libberton."

— Aug. 13. Captain James Baillie, by a warrant signed "Mountrous," "for the crimes committed by him." In a note Baillie is stated to "have departed this present life" on 13th of May 1672, having been nearly five years in prison.

— Aug. 22. "Aucht Countrie men" from Hamilton, "which was in the late rebellion."

[This was the insurrectionary movement under Colonel Wallace of Auchans, in 1667, usually styled the "Rising of Pentland."]

— Aug. 28. Agnes Somerville, for "alleged adulterie."

— Dec. 4. "Aucht hoors and a lass" sent to the Correction House.

1668, Jan. 3. At the supplication of Captain Richard Borthwick, of the frigate named the Sant Jacob, George Cooke, his mate, warded for taking certain goods out of the prize ships lately brought in by him.

THE DRAMATIC STORY OF AGIS,

THE REV. MR HOME'S NEW TRAGEDY.

From the Gentleman's Magazine, March 1758.

The characters are,

AGIS, King of Sparta.

AGESISTRATA, his mother.

LYSANDER, an Athenian, his principal general, and friend.

EUANTHE, an Athenian lady, engaged to Lysander, whom she has followed from Athens.

AMPHARES, a factious and ambitious magistrate of Sparta, in love with Euanthe.

RHEBUS, a Thracian, who has served in the Spartan troops from a youth.

EUXUS, the brother of Rhesus, a commander in the troops of Thrace.

SANDANE, Queen to Leonidas, Agis's colleague-king, who had been driven into exile for his vices.

ACT I. It appears in this act, that Sandane having urged her husband, Leonidas, to stretch the regal power beyond the limits prescribed by the laws of Sparta, the people had risen against him, under the direction and command of Agis; who, when they had driven out Leonidas, became sole king; that Leonidas had put himself at the head of an army of Achaians, to recover his throne, and Agis had marched out against him with the military force of Sparta; and that Amphares had found means to obtain an order of the magistracy for Agis to return to the city; who was accordingly come back, having left the command of his army to Lysander. By this treacherous policy Amphares answered two purposes: the faction, of which he was the head, might either cut Agis off; or they might, by seizing his person, make him an hostage for their safety, if Lysander should return victorious from the expedition against Leonidas. This conduct of Amphares appears to proceed from a dread of feeling the resentment of Agis, when his magistracy expires; and from his hatred of Lysander, for whom Euanthe has rejected his addresses. In an interview between Agis and Amphares, Agis expostulates with him upon the corruptness of his administration, charges him with being the author of the troubles of the state, and severely reprehends him for compelling him to quit his army, and return to the city, at so critical a juncture, when a decisive battle was every hour expected. Amphares endeavours to palliate, if not justify his conduct; and promises, that if he has opposed the interest of Agis, he will oppose it no more. Agis, though he does not seem perfectly satisfied with his sincerity, yet consents to forgive what is past, and accept his future services.

It appears soon afterwards, in an interview between Euanthe and Rhesus, that early in the morning of the day with which the dramatic action begins, Lysander had defeated the Achaians under Leonidas, at a small distance from the city; and having received a message from Agis, requiring him immediately to repair to Sparta to defend him against the faction, was returned to the city with a small party of horse, and had ordered the infantry to follow with the utmost expedition.

ACT II. Lysander receives a billet from a friend, warning Agis to stand upon his guard;

and learns from Euanthe, who urges him not again to leave her, that Amphares had addressed her as a lover in his absence. Lysander acquaints Agis with the warning he had received; and they are soon after informed by an officer, that a thousand Thracians had been discovered near the city, who reported themselves to be hired by Amphares for the service of Seleuchus, and to be on their march to Sardis. Agis and Lysander immediately conclude that, whatever was the pretence, these troops were hired to assist the faction in subverting the government. Agis proposes to double the guards; but Lysander urges him to mount his horse, and with all expedition join the troops, who were on their march to succour him. Before any resolution is formed, they learn from Rhesus, that his brother Euxus is among the Thracians, and the second in command; they therefore immediately dispatch Rhesus, to acquaint his brother with the service for which these troops are supposed to be hired by Amphares, and represent that not only justice, but honour, is on the opposite side. When Rhesus is dispatched on this service, Agis, hoping he will be able at least to divide the Thracians, if not bring them over to his interest, determines to remain in the city, lest, by quitting it to join his forces, he should drive the faction to extremes; but he orders Lysander to return to the troops, whose access to the city, without a resolute and prudent commander, may now be difficult. In the meantime the Thracians are posted by Amphares so as most effectually to execute his purpose, and wait only for the signal to seize upon the King, and cut off his party.

ACT III. The Thracians having fallen upon and dispersed the partisans of the King, he takes refuge in a temple. And it appears that Lysander, instead of repairing to the troops, as he had been commanded, disguised himself in the habit of a slave, and continued in the city, partly because his affection to the King made him unwilling to leave him, and partly because he had not fortitude to trust Euanthe alone in the power of his rival.

In this situation Euanthe and Lysander meet. He urges her to take refuge in the temple of Juno, having prepared a trusty slave of the household to convey her thither; and proposes himself to escape to the Spartan troops, over the wall, in the night; the gates of the city having been shut up, and a guard placed at them, by the faction. Euanthe strongly urges him to desist from this, as a desperate and useless attempt, and to escape with her to some port of safety, in the vessel that brought her to Sparta, which, she says, is still at anchor on the coast. During this altercation, they are interrupted by Amphares; who, supposing Lysander to be the slave which his disguise bespoke him, orders him sternly to depart. Lysander, as he could not refuse without a fatal discovery, silently obeys.

Amphares, elated with his success, makes a merit of his enterprise to Euanthe, by ascribing it to his passion for her; and urges her, with many protestations of his love, to accept his hand, and share with him the throne of Sparta. Upon her inquiry how it happens that the throne of Sparta is at his disposal, he tells her, that Agis is surrounded by his troops in the temple of Juno; and that Leonidas, though he had taken the field to recover the throne from Agis at the risk of his life, would yet quietly and patiently yield it up to him, if he chose rather to reign alone than admit another to a share of it. Euanthe, without questioning this extravagant and improbable story, rejects all his offers with disgust and disdain, and absolutely refuses to go with him. Amphares, after having entreated, boasted, threatened, and expostulated, in vain, proceeds to force, and lays hold of her hand. Alarmed at this act of violence, she cries out for help; and Lysander, whose apprehension had kept him within hearing, rushing in to her aid, and running up to Amphares, attempts to stab him with a dagger, which he had provided for his defence, while he should wear the habit of a slave, to whom arms were not allowed. Amphares retires; and perceiving it to be Lysander, orders him to be seized alive. Lysander, the moment he is discovered, snatches a sword from one of the guards, and puts himself on his defence. The guards, awed by his presence, and intimidated by his prowess, give back. Upon which Amphares directs his sword to the breast of Euanthe, and threatens instantly to kill her if he does not throw down his weapon. Euanthe generously and heroically calls out to him to defend himself without any regard to her danger. But Lysander, after some struggles, throws down his sword, and surrenders himself prisoner to Amphares, that by this sacrifice he may redeem the life of his mistress. After some keen reproaches and invectives have passed between the rivals, and some expressions of tenderness and distress between the lovers, Lysander is sent to prison, and Euanthe secured in another place.

Amphares for some reason delays to put Lysander to death; but determines to cut off the king; yet knows not how to accomplish it, as he had taken shelter in a temple, and the profanation of that asylum might be dangerous. After some thought, he determines to send a Spartan with a feigned message in Lysander's name, which may induce him voluntarily to quit his sanctuary; and then, says he, I shall find it easy to induce the ephori* to give orders for putting him to death, as an enemy to the state.

ACT IV. Lysander is discovered in a dungeon, where Rhesus soon after introduces his brother Euxus, who commanded the party that was appointed for his guard. Euxus having heard the story of Lysander and Agis from his brother, is brought into suspense, whether to take part with them, or implicitly to fulfil the trust reposed in him, by his superior officer. He is strongly urged by his brother at least to favour the escape of Lysander, and he promises to determine in a short time what part he will take.

Rhesus then acquaints Lysander that the ephori had sent a herald, commanding the Spartan army not to proceed in its march. Lysander, knowing that all depended upon a resolute attempt of this army in defence of Agis, wishes some messenger could be found, who would carry them a true account of the state of Sparta, and urge them without delay to storm the city. Rhesus immediately offers to attempt it himself; but Lysander advises him rather to put on the arms and habit of his country, and endeavour to pass through the Thracian guard to Agis, who he seems to think wants nothing but weapons to enable him to force a passage through the guards that surrounded the temple in which he was confined, and make his way out of the city to head his troops himself. News being brought that Amphares is coming, Lysander returns to his cell, Rhesus goes out to execute his new enterprise, and Euxus, who though yet undetermined which party to take, had been privy to all that passed between Rhesus and Lysander, remains.

Amphares, after inquiring of Euxus how his prisoner behaved, orders him to take from him a gorget with the picture of a lady studded with gems, which he wore on his breast. This was to be sent as a token to Agis by the traitor that was to inveigle him out of his asylum, upon pretence of a message from Lysander. In the meantime, however, Amphares hears that the troops had torn the mandate which ordered them to stop, and were marching with yet greater expedition to the city. He is also acquainted that the Thracians had seized a spy who had attempted to pass disguised in their habit and arms to Agis. Immediately after this intelligence Euxus returns with the gorget; and upon hearing that the spy is taken, whom he knew to be Rhesus, to whose attempt he had tacitly consented, he determines with himself to set Lysander at liberty, and abet his cause to deliver his brother.

It is, however, agreed that Lysander shall continue in prison till Euxus, who is summoned to attend the ephori, can acquaint him with their resolutions. In the mean time he gives him his own sword, and orders his troops to obey him as their chief. Euxus in a short time returns, and acquaints Lysander, that the ephori had resolved to surprise the Spartan band who had refused to obey their mandate, at midnight, and had ordered him to sustain their forces with his troops; it is then resolved, that when the forces of the faction have left the city on this design, Lysander with the Thracians shall take possession of it, secure the gates, and set the king at liberty.

ACT V. Agis having fallen into the snare which Amphares had laid for him, and quitted the temple with the pretended messenger of Lysander, is by him brought to Amphares and the ephori, who were waiting for him in the street. Amphares tells him, that the ephori have condemned him to die. Agis insists that they had no legal power over his life; and supports his arguments by reminding them that Lysander, whom he supposes at the head of his troops, must shortly arrive, either to protect him, or to avenge any injury he should suffer. To this they reply, that Lysander is their prisoner; and urge the king, as the only means of prolonging, if not of securing his life, to send his mandate to stop his troops; who, though they must have been on a forced march all day, and were so near that a herald dispatched in the former part of the day had been to them, and returned from them, were not yet arrived. This proposal, however, he refuses with the utmost disdain, declaring that he would much rather die than live, "The tame spectator of a falling empire."

* The ephori were magistrates appointed by the ancient Spartans, to be a check upon the power of their king.

The military officers are then ordered to drag him to the place of execution; but they refuse. Amphares then offers to lay hands upon himself; but Agis prevents all farther attempts of violence, by offering voluntarily to meet that destiny which could not be avoided.

Soon after Agis is gone, and the ephori dismissed, a messenger acquaints Amphares, that the executioners refused to lift their hands against the king. Amphares then urges this messenger to perform the office; and telling him he shall name his own reward, he undertakes it. As soon as Amphares is again alone, he is informed by an officer, whom he had sent to bring Lysander before him, whose life is the only obstacle unremoved, that he is fled, and that the people are alarmed, and gather to their tribes. Amphares then dispatches a messenger for Euanthe, and seems rather solicitous to escape with her, than to resist the force that Lysander might bring against him, or wait the issue of the attempt to surprise the troops that were in Agis's interest.

As soon as this messenger is dispatched, he receives farther intelligence, that the body of Thracians, commanded by Euxus, had revolted; and that their leader being questioned by the Thracian commander-in-chief, Rhinalces, had answered with his sword; and that a skirmish had followed, in which many of the revolted were killed. Amphares immediately suspects that the Thracians were commanded by Lysander: and being told by the messenger that their leader, whoever he was, was thought to be mortally wounded, he orders a party of his own forces to join Rhinalces, and promises soon to follow them. Euanthe is then brought in; and the messenger who had been sent to dispatch Agis, reports that it is done. Euanthe, hearing that somebody had been put to death, and not knowing who, supposes it to be Lysander; but in the midst of her distress, Amphares orders an officer to conduct her to the city-gate, and wait there with some horsemen till he joined them. While he is delivering this order, word is brought him, that the Spartan troops are at last arrived, and with Euxus at their head carry all before them. He then is in haste to retire; but being unwilling to leave Euanthe, who absolutely refuses to quit the place, he gives orders to his people to drag her along. During this delay, he finds himself encompassed; and, in a transport of rage, jealousy, and despair, draws his sword, and runs at Euanthe. Just at this crisis, Lysander rushes in, followed by Rhesus, and immediately engaging Amphares, soon puts an end to his life.

The joy of Lysander and Euanthe, who are once more at liberty, and once more together, is checked by the discovery that Agis is dead. His mother Agesistrata, however, is preserved, though a messenger had been sent to dispatch her. It happened that Sandane, taking refuge in the tower where she was confined, had caught up a mantle which Agesistrata had thrown from her, and hiding her face in it, had been mistaken by the assassin for the queen, and killed in her stead.

Lysander orders the son of Agis to be proclaimed king: and the play concludes with a solemn procession, in which the priests of Jupiter and Hercules, with a long train, attend the body of Agis from the dungeon in which he was murdered to the royal sepulchre.

This procession is attended with a dirge sung by the priests, and a chorus of youths and virgins belonging to the temple.

Many passages in this play have, by the audience, been referred to some particular circumstance in the present state of public affairs; particularly the following?—

The laws have been neglected, not annul'd,
And corrupt rulers have corrupted manners.
Authority will soon revive the laws,
And great example yet restore the manners,
In spite of those who have oppress'd their country,—
Still strove for pow'r in a declining kingdom,
Still sought for wealth in an impoverish'd land.

When Euxus tells Lysander

Your stay is full of danger; risk it not.

Lysander replies,

All necessary dangers must be risked.

The meaning of this verse was sufficiently understood, and felt, to produce, not a clap only, but sometimes a shout of applause; though a critic might frigidly object, that the expression to risk danger is inaccurate, to risk and to endanger being synonymous terms.

The piece in general, whatever may be its defects, abounds with warm and generous sentiments of liberty and public spirit; and the applause with which it has been received, is therefore a proof that these principles are still alive among us. There is also one passage, which, in a few words, more strongly recommends religion as a principle of heroic actions, than the most elaborate reasoning or florid declamation. Lysander, when he is alone, and in prison, expecting every moment to die by the hand of the executioner, falls into a very natural and important series of reflections concerning the immortality of his soul: the reasons for and against it seem to be nearly equiponderant, but at last he comes to this resolution,

— Whilst I live and breathe, by heaven I'll act
As if I were immortal.

This sentence includes at once all the force of precept and example; as it represents a man who doubts of his immortality, determining, that to act nobly, he must act as if he were immortal. Such a proof, that to act as an infidel is to act basely, reaches at once the understanding and the heart; and was applauded with a zeal that did equal honour to the author, the actor [Garrick], and the audience.

There are also in this piece some forcible strokes of poetry as well as sentiment.

The present moment, which has so often been the subject of the philosopher and the poet, is very finely and forcibly described in the following metaphor.

Things past belong to memory alone;
Things future are the property of hope;
The narrow line, the isthmus of these seas,
The instant scarce divisible, is all
That mortals have to stand on.

When Lysander is waiting the return of Euxus, in all the anxiety of suspense and expectation, and at length hears him coming, he expresses the importance of the crisis in a figure extremely bold and poetical.

Euxus draw near—Upon the insect wing
Of a small moment ride th' eternal fates.

When Amphares offers to kill Euanthe upon her refusing to go with him, she derides his menace, and insults his folly in this expressive but short reply,

—Draw forth thy sword,
And try if death can terrify despair.

* In a note of the Privy Council Proceedings preserved amongst the Balfour MS., it is stated, "The Laird of Lundy, brother to the Earl of Argyle, being to repair to Court to confer with his brother anent the service of the Clangregour, as he pretends, he hes nominat the Laird of Laweris to haue the charge of that service till his return, and vpon Laweris acceptation of the charge, Lundy is to haue a license for his vponning."

There is a Minute of the Council Meetings, dated 8th July 1613, from which it appears, that the Earl of Argyle appeared and freely offered to the King £22, 10s. out of every hundred pounds of the fines exacted from those who had received any of the Clangregour which should come into his hands. It is also stated, "The landlordinis of the Clangregour who should haue taine the bairnis of the Clangregour off the Laird of Laweris hands," had "failied in that poynt, and thairfore charges are directed agaius thame for payment to Laweris of the sowme of tuentie mark out of euery merk land pertening to thame, and formerly possesit by the Clangregour."

Lastly, (30th November 1613,) it was resolved, that the landlordinis should not be called vpon to pay any contribution, provided they took the Clangregour bairns. This proposal those present agreed to; and the conditions ultimately adjusted were, that the children should be distributed amongst them according "to the proportion of their lands,"—that they should be bound to keep them, and to make them furthermore when called for, until they were eighteen years of age, when they should be exhibited to the Privy Council, and their subsequent fate decided vpon. LIFE OF MR JOHNSON THE BOOK-SELLER.

In December, 1809, died, in St Paul's Church-yard, Mr Joseph Johnson, bookseller. He was the younger of two sons of a farmer at Everton, a village one mile from Liverpool. He was born on the 15th of November, 1738, and had therefore just completed the seventy-first year of his age. His family were dissenters of the baptist persuasion; and he was apprenticed, at a suitable age, to Mr George Keith, a bookseller in Gracechurch street, who had married the daughter of the celebrated Dr Gill, the great ornament of that sect in England. It was about the year 1760, that Mr Johnson first entered into business for himself, in partnership with a Mr Davenport; and nearly at the same period, he contracted an acquaintance with Mr Fuseli, the celebrated painter, whose acuteness and vigour of judgment are well known, and who, even at that period, discovered such qualities in Mr Johnson as led to a familiarity and friendship, which the vicissitudes of almost fifty years had not the power to overthrow. The partnership with Davenport being dissolved, Mr Johnson formed a similar connection with a Mr Payne; and their business was carried on in Paternoster Row, till nearly the whole of their property was consumed by fire in 1770, no part of it being insured. By this time Mr Johnson had acquired the highest bound to relieve the landlord of all "pane and danger" he might incur through his flight; and moreover, to be liable to such "arbitrall censure and punishment," as the Council should think fit to inflict. The child so escaping, if under fourteen, to be scourged and burnt on the cheek for the first escape, and hanged for the second:—if above fourteen, to be hanged at once without further ceremony.

The next day a roll was made up and sworn to by Glenurquhy and the other lairds. The landlords were enjoined to keep and present the children under the penalty of two hundred pounds Scots for the child of a chieftain; one hundred pounds for the child of an under chieftain; and forty pounds for children of meaner rank.

character with those who knew him best, for integrity and a virtuous disposition; and now that he was on the ground, "his friends," as he expressed it to a particular acquaintance, "came about him, and set him up again." On this occasion, he removed to the shop in St Paul's Church-yard, where he dwelt for the remainder of his life. A short time after this epoch in his affairs, he became closely connected with the most liberal and learned branch of the Protestant dissenters in England. He published, in 1772, the Poems of Anna Letitia Aikin, afterwards Mrs Barbauld; and, nearly at the same time, was placed in the same relation of publisher to Dr Priestley, whose numerous writings were brought out by Mr Johnson from that time forward. It scarcely ever happened that Mr Johnson stood in the place of publisher to persons of literary merit and moral worth, without being at the same time regarded by them as a confidential friend; and a proposal having been made to Dr Priestley, in 1773, who was at that time advantageously settled at Leeds, to take up his residence in the house of Lord Shelburne, (afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne,) Mr Johnson wrote to him a warm expostulatory letter on the subject; the remonstrance probably reached the Doctor's hands too late. One of Mr Johnson's early connections, was one Samuel Paterson, the auctioneer and author; and, though Paterson was a man of talents and honourable intention, the friendship of Mr Johnson saved him from the effects of many imprudencies. In 1774, when Mr Theophilus Lindsey came to London, having given up a living of £400 per annum and rich expectancies, because he could not reconcile his conscience to the articles of the church of England, he immediately formed a strict intimacy with Mr Johnson. Mr Lindsey's circumstances became greatly straitened by the sacrifice he had made; and Mr Johnson procured, and caused to be fitted up for him, as a chapel, the Great Room in the house of Mr Paterson, in Essex Street in the Strand, and was extremely active in procuring subscriptions, and forming a regular religious establishment in that place, which he constantly attended, as long as Mr Lindsey continued to officiate there. Mr Johnson was so fortunate, (and this is one of the greatest honours that can fall to a bookseller,) as to have been publisher to many of the most eminent authors of his time; among whom we may name Mr Horne Tooke, Mr William Cowper, Dr Darwin, Dr Priestley, Dr Aikin, Dr Enfield, Mr Fuseli, Mr Bonnycastle, Mr Nicholson, Mr Howard, Mrs Barbauld, Mrs Wollstonecraft, and Miss Edgeworth. In May 1788, he began a periodical publication, called the Analytical Review, which was continued to the end of the year 1793, and was regarded in those times as a principal repository of sentiments most favourable to national liberty, both in politics and religion. On this account, in the period of persecution, which under the auspices of Mr Pitt in this country succeeded the French Revolution, Mr Johnson was marked out as a proper victim for the vengeance of government. The occasion that was taken was from a very injudicious political pamphlet, written by the late Gilbert Wakefield. It was proved that a copy of this pamphlet had been bought in Mr Johnson's shop: and while Mr Cuthell, another bookseller, was sentenced, for the same offence, to a fortnight's imprisonment, Mr Johnson was committed to the King's Bench Prison for nine months, and amerced in a fine of £50: this passed in the year 1793. Mr Johnson was a man remarkably superior to mercenary views. He often proposed and entered into the reprint of books which he considered as conducive to the best interests of his species, without the possibility of being reimbursed but in a very long time, and probably not at all. He often purchased the manuscripts of worthy persons in distress, when he had no intention ever to send them to the press. His benevolent actions are by much too numerous to be related in such an article as this; nor would it, in many instances, be delicate to the feelings of the parties to relate them. His mind was of so admirable a temper, as almost never to be worn out with importunity; and he was not to be turned aside by the ingratitude of those he benefited from doing that which he judged to be right. In his latter years, Mr Johnson was uncommonly reduced by a series of infirmities; he walked with difficulty; his frame was worn to a shadow; and, having mentioned on some occasion, that it was his desire to be borne to his grave by four men, added, that in reality two would do, for they "would have nothing to carry." Yet his faculties and his powers of conversation remained; and he scarcely remitted his attention to business, and not at all his disposition to be serviceable to others. We will conclude this article with an extract of a paragraph which appeared in the Morning Chronicle the day after Mr Johnson's death:—"His understanding was of the best and soundest nature; and, though he was the very reverse of every thing assuming and ostentatious, yet those who knew him best, and were most able to estimate his talents, will readily bear testimony, that they never heard him say a weak or foolish thing, or indeed any thing that would have discredited the lips of the wisest of his contemporaries. Accordingly his table was frequented, through successive years, by a succession of persons of the greatest talents, learning, and genius: and the writer of these lines can cheerfully bear witness, that all were delighted when he took his share in the conversation, and only regretted that the gentleness and modesty of his nature led him to do it so rarely. He was always found an advocate on the side of human nature and human virtue, recommending that line of conduct which springs from disinterestedness and a liberal feeling, and maintaining its practicability.

THE RUINES OF TIME.

["The following verses, ascribed to Spenser," says a correspondent, "are copied from an old book which has no title page." They appear as Spenser's in Anderson's "British Poets," inscribed to the Countess of Pembroke.]

I saw an Image all of massive Gold,
Placed on high upon an Alter fair,
That all which did the same from far behold,
Might worship it and fall on lowest stair.

Not that great Idol might with this compare,
To which the Assyrian Tyrant would have made
The holy Bretheren falsely to have paid.

But the Alter, on the which this Image staid,
Was (O great pity!) built of brittle Clay;
That shortly the foundation decay'd,
With Showers of Heaven and Tempest worn away:
Then down it fell, and low in ashes lay,
Scorned of every one, which by it went;
That I it seeing dearly did lament.

Next unto this a stately tower appear'd,
Built all of richest Stone that might be found,
And nigh unto the Heavens in height uprear'd,
But placed on a Plot of sandy Ground.
Not that great Tower, which is so much renown'd
For Tongues Confusion in Holy Writ,
King Ninus' Work, might be compar'd to it.

But O vain Labours of terrestrial Wit,
That builds so strongly on so frail a Soil,
As with each Storm does fall away, and flit,
And gives the fruit of all your Travail's toil,
To be the Prey of Time, and Fortune's Spoil!
I saw this Towers fall Suddenly to dust,
That nigh with Grief thereof my Heart was burst.

Then did I see a pleasant Paradise,
Full of sweet Flowers and daintiest Delights,
Such as on Earth Man could no more devise,
With Pleasures choice to feed his cheerful Sprights.
Not that, which Merlin by his Magick Sights
Made for the gentle Squire to entertain
His fair Belphebe, could this Garden stain.

But O short Pleasure, bought with lasting Pain,
Why will hereafter any Flesh delight
In earthly Bliss, and joy in Pleasures vain;
Since that I saw this Garden wasted quite,
That where it was, scarce seemed any sight?
That I, which once that Beauty did behold,
Could not from Tears my melting Eyes withhold.

Soon after this a Giant came in place,
Of wondrous Powre, and of exceeding Stature,
That none durst view the Horror of his Face,
Yet was he mild of Speech, and meek of Nature.
Not he, which in despite of his Creatour,
With railing Terms defy'd the Jewish Hoast,
Might with mighty one in Hugeness boast.

For from the one he could to th' other Coast,
Stretch his strong Thighs, and the Ocean overstride,
And reach his Hand into his Enemies Hoast.
But see the end of Pomp and fleshly Pride!
One of his Feet unware from him did slide,
That down he fell unto the deep abyss,
Where drowned with him is all his earthly Bliss.

Then did I see a Bridge made all of Gold,
Over the Sea, from one to th' other side,
Withouten Prop or Pillour it t' uphold,
But like the coloured Rainbow Arched wide.
Not that great Arch which Trajan edipide,
To be a wonder to all Age ensuing,
Was matchable to this in equal viewing.

But (ah!) what boots to see earthly thing,
In glory or in Greatness to excel,
Six Time doth greatest things to ruin bring?
This goodly Bridge, one Foot not fastened well,
'Gan fail, and all the rest down shortly fell;
Ne of so brave a Building ought remained,
That grief thereof my spirit greatly pained.

I saw two Bears as white as any Milk,
Lying together in a mighty Cave,
Of mild Aspect, and Hair as soft as Silk,
That Salvage Nature seemed not to have,
Nor after greedy Spoil of Blood to crave:
Two fairer Beasts might not else where be found,
Although the compass World were sought around.

But what can long abide above this Ground,
In state of Bliss or stedfast Happiness?
The Cave in which these Bears lay sleeping sound,
Was but of Earth, and with her Weightiness,
Upon them fell, and did unware oppress;
That for great sorrow of their sudden Fate,
Henceforth all World's Felicity I hate.

Much was I troubled in my heavy Spright,
At sight of these sad Spectacles forepast,
That all my Senses were bereaved night,
And I in mind remained sore agast,
Distraught 'twixt Fear and Pity; when at last
I heard a Voice, which loudly to me call'd,
That with the suddain Shril I was appall'd.

Behold (said it), and by ensample see,
That all is Vanity and Grief of Mind,
No other Comfort in this World can be,
But Hope of Heaven and Heart to God inclin'd;
For all the rest must needs be left behind.
With that it bade me, to the other side,
To cast mine Eye, where other sights I spide.

Upon the famous Rivers farther Shore,
There stood a snowy Swan of heavenly Hue,
And gentle Kind, as ever Fowl afore;
A fairer one in all the goodly Crew
Of white Strimonian Brood might no Man view:
There he most sweetly sung the Prophecy
Of his own Death in doleful Elegy.

At last when all his mourning Melody
He ended had, that both the Shores resounded,
Feeling the Fit that him forwarned to die,
With lofty Flight above the Earth he bounded,
And out of sight to highest Heaven mounted:
Where now he is become an heavenly Sign;
There now the Joy is his, here Sorrow mine.

Whilst thus I looke, loe adown the Lee
I saw an Harp all strung with Silver Twine,
And made of Gold and costly Ivory,
Swimming that whilom seem'd to have been
The Harp, on which Dan Orpheus was seen
Wild Beasts and Forrests after him to lead;
But was th' Harp of Phillisides now dead.

At length out of the river it was rear'd,
And borne about the Clouds to be devin'd,
Whilst all the way most heavenly Noise was heard
Of the Strings, stirred with the warbling wind,
That wrought both Joy and Sorrow in my Mind:
So now in Heaven a Sign it doth appear,
The Harp well known beside the Northern Bear.

Soon after this I saw on the other side
A curious Coffer made of Heben Wood,
That in it did most precious Treasure hide
Exceeding all this baser World's good:
Yet through the overflowing of the Flood
It almost drowned was, and done to nought,
That sight thereof much grieved my pensive thought.

At length, when most in peril it was brought,
Two Angels down descending with Swift Flight,
Out of the swelling Stream it lightly caught,
And 'twixt their blessed Arms it carried quight,
Above the reach of any living sight :

So now it is transformed into the Star,
In which all heavenly Treasures locked are.

Looking aside, I saw a stately Bed,
Adorned all with costly Cloth of Gold,
That might for any Prince's Couch be red,
And deckt with dainty Flowers, as if should
Be for some Bride, her joyous Night to hold :
Therein a goodly Virgin sleeping lay ;
A fairer Wight saw never Summer's-day.

I heard a Voice that called far away,
And her awaking, had her quickly dight,
For loe her Bridegroom was in ready Ray
To come to her, and seek her Love's delight :
With that she started up with cheerful sight,
When suddenly both Bed and all was gone,
And I in langour left there all alone.

Still as I gazed, I beheld where stood
A Knight all armed, upon a winged Steed,
The same that bred was of Medusa's Blood,
On which Dan Perseus born of heavenly Seed,
The fair Andromada from Peril freed :
Full mortally this Knight ywounded was,
That Streams of Blood forth flowed on the Grass.

Yet was he dockt (small joy to him, alas !)
With many Garlands for his Victories,
And with rich Spoils, which late he did purchase
Through brave achievements from his Enemies.
Fainting at last through long Infirmities,
He smote his Steed, that straight to heaven bore,
And left me more his Loss for to deplore.

Lastly I saw an Ark of purest Gold,
Upon a brazen Pillour standing high,
Which th' Ashes seemed of great Prince to hold,
Enclosed therein for endless Memory
Of him, whom all the World did glorify :
Seemed the Heavens with th' Earth did disagree,
Whether should of these Ashes Keeper be.

At last me seem'd, wing'd-footed Mercury,
From Heaven descending to appease their Strife,
The Ark did bear with him above the Sky,
And to these Ashes gave a second Life,
To live in Heaven where Happiness is rife :
At which the Earth did grieve exceedingly,
And I for Dole was almost like to die.

L'ENVOY.

Immortal Spirit of Phyllisides,
Which now art made the Heaven's Ornament,
That whilom was the World's chiefest Riches ;
Give leave to him that lov'd thee, to lament
His loss by lack of thee, to Heaven bent ;
And with last Duties of this broken verse,
Broken with Sighs, to deck thy Sable Horse.

And ye, fair Lady, th' Honor of your Days,
And glory of the World, your high Thoughts scorn ;
Vouchsafe this Monument of his last Praise,
With some few silver-dropping Tears t' adorn ;
And as ye be of heavenly Off-spring born,
So unto Heaven let your high Mind aspire
And loath this Dross of sinful World's Desire.

CHARLES I.—Sept. 1710. My Lord Pollok tells me that he had several times heard the old Earle of Dumfries say that he was employed to carry the written papers of 'Eikon Basilike' between King Charles the First and a clergyman, Dr Goodman, or some such name, that I have forgot, who was retired to some country place about Newcastle, or somewhere in the north, and that he believed they were written by that Doctor, and he had some materials from the King."—WODROW'S ANALECTA. This story is probably the truth: that Charles wrote the entire work is very questionable: he furnished the "materials;" 'Gauden,' not Goodman furnished them up, and put them in the shape they have come down to us. Gauden obtained a bishoprick for his trouble, and was discontented because he was not further promoted. He got a good deal more than he deserved. The historical student will find a most learned and amusing volume on the 'Eikon Basilike,' consisting of several treatises, by Dr Worthworth, Master of Trinity College. His argument is able, but he adroitly throws overboard all the evidence adverse to the King. He was not aware of the curious piece of evidence preserved by that twaddling old humbug, Wodrow. The following lines, attributed to Charles, possess much merit :

"Close thine eyes and sleep secure,
Thy soul is safe, thy body sure,
He now guards thee, He thee keeps,
Who never slumbers, never sleeps,
A quiet conscience is a quiet breast,
Has only peace, has only rest.
The music and the mirth of kings
Are out of tune unless she sing."

GRAVE WIT.—Sir Patrick Hume, King's High Commissioner to Parliament in Scotland, died in the 84th year of his age, 1714. Being observed to smile when on his death-bed, he was asked by Lord Binning what he was laughing at; he answered, "I am diverted to think what a disappointment the worms will meet with, when they bore through my thick coffin, expecting to find a good meal, and get nothing but the bones!"

TWO DUCHESSES.—When the Duchess of Buckingham found herself dying, she sent for Anstis, the herald, and settled all the pomp of her funeral ceremony. She was afraid of dying before the preparations were ready: "Why," she asked, "won't they send the canopy for me to see? Let them send it, even though the tassels are not finished." And then she exacted, as Horace Walpole affirms, a vow from her ladies, that if she should become insensible, they would not sit down in her room until she was dead. Funeral honours appear, indeed, to have been her fancy; for when her only son died, she sent messengers to her friends, telling them that if they wished to see him lie in state, she would admit them by the back-stairs. Such was the delicacy of her maternal sorrow. But there was one match in pride and insolence for Katharine Duchess of Buckingham; this was Sarah Duchess of Marlborough. Upon the death of the young Duke of Buckingham, his mother endeavoured to borrow the triumphal car that had carried the remains of Marlborough to the grave: "No," replied the widowed Duchess of Marlborough, "the car that has carried the Duke of Marlborough's body shall never be profaned by any other." "I have sent to the undertaker," was the Duchess of Buckingham's rejoinder, "and he has engaged to make a better for £20." On her death-bed, the latter expressed a wish to be buried by her father, James the Second, at Paris. "She need not," was the remark of Mr Selwyn, "be carried out of England to be buried by her father."—Memoirs of Viscountess Sundon.

GRASS SEEDS.—Clover seeds were first sown in East Lothian, and first in Scotland, in 1708.

NOTES

RELATING TO THE NAME OF BAIRD, PARTICULARLY AS TO THE FAMILIES OF AUCHMEDDEN, NEWBYTH, AND SAUCHTONHALL.

THE Bairds are said traditionally to have come from the south of France; but the first of the name in England came from Normandy with William the Conqueror, in 1066.* The old spelling was Bard, Barde, Barte, Baurt, Beard, Byrd, and Bayard, and it was never written Baird till the latter end of the sixteenth century.

When King William the Lion returned from his imprisonment in England, in 1174, he was accompanied by several Englishmen, and among them, it is believed, there was a gentleman of the name of Baird. There is a tradition, which has been related by several peerage writers, which also connects the name with that Monarch. The tradition is, that when William the Lion was hunting in a forest in one of the south-west counties, and happened to straggle from his attendants, he was alarmed by the approach of a wild bear, and called for help, upon which a gentleman of the name of Baird, who had followed the king from England, rode up and had the good fortune to kill the bear, for which signal service the king made a considerable addition to the lands he had given him before, and assigned him for his coat of arms a boar passant, (a boar being considered the most honourable of armorial bearings,) and for his motto "Dominus fecit;" and what contributes to the belief of this story, says the late William Baird of Auchmedden,† in his account of "the surname of Baird, is, "that one paw of the bear came north with Ordinhivas'‡ ancestor, and is still *Old History of Normandy, in Advocates' Library, and Heliand's Chronicle.

†The late Mr Baird of Auchmedden was a very accomplished gentleman, and the early patron of James Ferguson, the celebrated astronomer. Ferguson, who started first as a portrait painter, says that he was the first who sat to him for a likeness. See Life of Ferguson, written by himself, (Chamber's Lives of Illustrious Englishmen.) This interesting portrait is, we are informed, in the possession of Mr Baird's great-grandson, Francis G. Fraser of Findrack, Aberdeenshire.

preserved; and indeed it well deserves it, being one of enormous size, 14 inches long and 9 inches broad where cut from the ancle."

We have seen this interesting relique, (which has been handed down from father to son in the Auchmedden family, ever considered chief of this name, through so many ages,) in the possession of the late Mr Baird of Auchmedden's great-grandson, William N. Fraser, Esq., second son of the late Francis Fraser of Findrack,* Aberdeenshire.

Mr Burke, in his Peerage and Baronetage, voca Newbyth, relates this tradition, but erroneously describes the animal who attacked the king as a wild boar. He may have fallen into this error from supposing that this country had never been infested by bears, while there is a statute of the English Parliament, passed about this time, for their destruction throughout the country.

In the R. Roll, or Submission, sworn and subscribed in 1293 by the nobility and principal gentry of Scotland to King Edward the First of England, we find the names of Fergus de Barde of Meikle and Little Kypp, John Barde of Evandale, and Robert Barde of Cambusnathan. Cambusnathan afterwards went to Sir Alexander Stuart, afterwards of Darnley, by marrying the heiress, Jean Baird, about 1360.†

We find in a Parliament held at Perth by King Robert the Bruce, in 1308, Baird of Carnwath, and four other gentlemen of the name, being convicted of adherence to Balliol, were forfeited and put to death, and the lands of Carnwath given to Alexander Stuart of Darnley.

Andrew Baird of Laverocklaw (on the north coast of Fife), son of Gilbert Baird of Posso,‡ and Lillias, only child and daughter of Walter Baird of Ordinhivas, acquired the estate of Auchmedden, in Aberdeenshire, from John Earl of Buchan in 1534.

George Baird of Auchmedden married, 10th August 1550, Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Keith of Troup, who was brother to the Earl of

* Henrietta Baird, daughter of William Baird of Auchmedden, and Anne Duff, his spouse, daughter of William Duff of Dipple, Esq., and sister of William, first Earl of Fife, married, 1761, to Francis Fraser, younger of Findrack, a cadet of the family of Durris. (History of the surname of Baird, by William Baird of Auchmedden.)

‡ Baird of Posso was an ancient and well allied family in the shire of Peebles. It came to an heiress, who married a gentleman of the name of Naismith, ancestor of the present Naismith of Posso.

Marischal. Their aunt, Lady Anne Keith, daughter to William Earl of Marischal, was first married to James Earl of Murray, Regent of Scotland, to whom she bore a daughter, and from whom the present Earl of Murray is descended; and next she married Colin, Earl of Argyll. This marriage acquired to George Baird the favour of the Regent, who employed him much in his affairs, and placed great confidence in him. By a deed, signed at Glasgow, 15th May 1560, the Regent, then wardator of the estate of Buchan, discharges the reversion of the lands of Auchmedden, and disposes the same to him heritably and irredeemably, the onerous cause being, "for many acts of friendship done to me, and sums of money given out by him in my service." Eight days before this, Queen Mary escaped from Loch-Leven, which threw the Regent into a great consternation, and it is highly probable that Auchmedden had advanced him a round sum at this time, as he required money, particularly to oppose the Queen.

This George Baird attended the Earl of Huntly at the Battle of Corrichio,* 25th October, 1562, and endeavoured to get him transported to Aberdeen, having caused him to be laid on a "cadger's" horse with "croils," being a fat and unwieldy man, but through weakness the Earl died by the way.

He was present, also, at the insurrection in Aberdeen, in 1589, on the Roman Catholic side, and got a pardon for it from King James the VI., who wished to suppose that the allegation of his being present was a mistake.

"J. REX

"Justice Clerk and your Deputies, we greet you well, for as meikle, that we understand our lovit George Baird of Auchmedden, being an aged and decrepit man, was summoned to this Court of the Sherifffdom of Aberdeen, for assisting the Earl of Huntly and his complices at last insurrection made at Aberdeen, and passing from that to the Brig of Dee, in the month of April last, by part whereof he was convict by an assize, howbeit, wrongously, seeing we are surely informed that he was not within 24 miles, at the time of the sd. insurrection, to the Burgh of Aberdeen.

"Wherefore we command you that incontinent, after the sight hereof, ye do let the said George's act of conviction furth of the Buiks of Adjournal, so that he noways be callit, troublit, molestit, pointid or distressit, by virtue thereof, and the same be as delote as if he had never been challengit, for the said crime in time coming, discharging our Treasurer, Treasurer's deputy of all extracting thereof, and of troublin the said George thereby, &c. Subscribed with our hand, at Aberdeen, the 4th day of August, 1589.

† The king arrived in Aberdeen about the 27th of July, (on his return from Ross and Cromarty, where he had held Justice Courts), and remained there till the 4th of August, upon which day, a little before his Majesty took horse to depart, the Earl of Errol, the Lairds of Auchindown, Balquhain and Cluny, presented themselves, and requested pardon, when they, and sundry of the surname

The families of Newbyth and Saughtonhall are sprung from the Auchmedden family. James Baird, fourth son of Gilbert Baird of Auchmedden, was the founder of these two families. He was bred to the law, and became very eminent in his profession, and was appointed by King Charles the First sole Commissary of the Ecclesiastical Court of Scotland, an office, in those days, of great trust and emolument. He possessed the lands of Byth, in the county of Aberdeen, and had the king's warrant for creating him Lord Deveron, (being the name of a river which runs past that estate), but bedied before the patent was expede. He married Bathia, daughter of Sir James Dempster of Pitliver, a very old family in the county of Fife: she was sister to the famous John Dempster, remarkable for his disputations among the foreign schools.

The Commissary's eldest son, John, was an eminent lawyer, and, upon the restoration of King Charles the Second, was made a knight, and one of the senators of the College of Justice by the title of Lord Newbyth. He sold his lands of Byth, in Aberdeenshire, and purchased those of Foord and Whitekirk, in Haddington, and got them erected into a barony by the name of Newbyth. Lord Newbyth's only son, William, was created a knight baronet by King Charles the Second, in 1680, and, since then, the family has produced many distinguished names; among these may well be mentioned that of the Hero of Seringapatam, General Sir David Baird. It is now worthily represented by Sir David Baird of Newbyth, bart.

MINUTES OF IRVINE PRESBYTERY.

For some years past the press has groaned beneath the number of publications on the subject of the Church of Scotland; of these a very great proportion are, we suspect, chiefly adapted to the fancies of their authors.

We therefore think that some authentic History of the proceedings of the Church should be acceptable to our readers, though, in many instances, it may not, in all respects, coincide with their previously conceived ideas.* One of the most interesting of the recent publications on the subject, is the Sketches of the History of the Church of Scotland by the Rev. W. M'Crie, which, emanating from the son of so distinguished a father, would have given it an interest, even had its own intrinsic merits been less than they are. The author, with a most unusual candour, cautions his readers not to place implicit reliance on his statements. He says, in the preface—

"To the high professions of impartiality with which some historians have ushered their productions into the world, the author is not disposed to attach much value, having seldom found such professions realized; being convinced that no writer of church history, who has any principles to which

of Gordon, were received into his Majesty's mercy and favour.—MOYSE'S MEMOIRS.

* Our attention has been drawn to excerpts from the minutes of the Presbytery of Irvine, in the years 1646 to 1650, which have recently appeared in several numbers of the Ayrshire News-Letter, and which we propose to copy.

he attaches importance, can describe the scenes and characters with which these principles are identified without imparting to the description more or less of the colour of his own mind. The author candidly avows himself a Presbyterian of the old school, and he has been at no pains to conceal his sentiments."

Should Mr M'Crie's views, therefore, not always be borne out by the facts, his readers have less reason to complain.

In treating of the Church of Scotland, Mr M'Crie could not, of course, avoid noticing their proceedings against parties charged with witchcraft, but, very probably, he thought the less said on the subject the better. In speaking of the transactions between 1620 and 1630,* he says, "It is unfair to single out the clergy as eminently chargeable with these prosecutions, (persecutions), in which they only participated with persons of all ranks," &c. Now, we have no means of knowing the extent to which these horrid proceedings were carried at the particular period he refers to, when the church had, comparatively, little power; but they must have been bad indeed if they were to half the extent to which they appear to have been carried by the Presbytery of Irvine in the years 1649 and 1650, at a time when the Kirk was in the zenith of her power, and appears to have assumed almost the entire authority, both in Church and State. On referring to the minutes of the Presbytery of Irvine, it clearly appears that they took the most active part in all the proceedings against these unfortunate wretches;—that they dealt with them, and that in so persuasive a manner as to procure, in almost every instance, confessions of crimes which are most revolting and wholly impossible, and which confessions these poor creatures knew were certain to consign them to a horrible death. They usurped the authority of the civil courts, and they complained of the lukewarmness with which the civil authorities seconded their proceedings; and, at an after period, in the year 1698, the Presbytery of Irvine appoint one of their number to attend, with other ministers, a meeting of Parliament, for prosecution of the recommendations of the General Assembly against Popery and witchcraft; and, in the previous year, 1697, they proclaimed a fast to be observed for various sins, among others, that of witchcraft.

Mr M'Crie also wishes to impress on his readers that the Kirk always acted with great mildness and moderation. He says—†

"So far as it can be shown that, in any case, they resorted to violence to enforce the covenant we do not vindicate them; but, indeed, it cannot be proved that it was forced upon any, or that any injury was incurred by any for simply refusing to conform. In answer to this, to the proceedings against Thomas Cumming—see minutes of the Presbytery, 29th Nov., 1649, 25th Dec., 1649, and 1650."

Mr M'Crie, also, says,‡ "whatever may be said of the principles of the Presbyterians, on the subject of toleration, it is undeniable that their conduct when in power," was marked by the most exemplary forbearance; and, again,— "The sentiments of our Scottish divines on this point may be seen from the following extracts.* As to the Church of Scotland," says Baillie, "that it did ever intermeddle to trouble any in their goods, liberties, or persons, it's very false; what civil penalties the parliament of a kingdom thinks meet to inflict upon those who are refractory and unamenable by the censures of a church, the state, from whom alone the punishments do come, is answerable, and not the church. That excommunication, in Scotland, is inflicted on those who cannot assent to every point of religion determined in their confession there is nothing more untrue; for, we know it well, that never any person in Scotland was excommunicated only for his difference in opinion in a theological tenet; excommunication there is a very dreadful sentence, and, therefore, very rare." Now, on referring to the minutes of the Presbytery it will be found that in every case brought before them, whether it was refusing to subscribe the covenant, not attending church, obeying the Parliament in opposition to the will of the Church, suspicion of being guilty of incontinence and not confessing the charge, disobeying the sentence of the Presbytery, or whatever other offences the parties might be charged with, that they would, in every instance, have been excommunicated if they had not either submitted to the Presbytery, and to the degrading punishment inflicted on them, or left the country. We have heard of late, in certain quarters, much as to the inefficiency and worthlessness of the present clergy of the Church of Scotland, but, we think, we may safely assert that, through the length and breadth of Scotland, there is not a presbytery that need fear to place themselves in contrast with the Presbytery of Irvine, as it was constituted in the years from 1646 to 1650, exhibited in their own minutes; nor do we think that, if such characters as some of these men appear to have been, had, unfortunately, been intruded into the Church in the present day, that they would have been allowed to disgrace it for as many months as these men appear to have done for years; and that, too, at a period when she had had supreme authority for ten years in the Church, if not in the State also.

"We have been fortunate enough, (says the Ayrshire Monthly News-Letter), to obtain perusal of an interesting document, namely—Extracts from the minute books of the Presbytery of Irvine from the years 1646 to 1650, and from 1688 to 1745, the intermediate books being unfortunately lost. By far the most interesting parts of these records are in the period from 1646 to 1650, during the palmy days of the Kirk, when she could place her heel alike upon the neck of the noblest of the land, and upon that of the humblest peasant.

In those pure and happy days, the reverend fathers certainly were not idle—what with trying and censuring admitted and suspected delinquents, trying and admitting clergymen, trying and deposing them, (for there were three clergymen in the Presbytery of Irvine deposed in the course of four years,) raising and heading troops, to oppose the troops raised by the Scottish Parliament, for the service of the king, then a prisoner in England; afterwards censuring and punishing those malignants who obeyed the Parliament, and disobeyed the Kirk; placing on the stool of repentance for this offence many of the nobles, gentry, and inferior classes of the community, among others the Earl of Glencairn, Lord Montgomerie, Lord Boyd, &c., and all this submitted to under the alternative of the then fearful sentence of excommunication; the penalties of which extended not only to their spiritual but also to their temporal interests—dividing parishes—getting additional ministers appointed to different parishes, and a vast variety of other matters too tedious to enumerate. Perhaps, however, the most interesting parts of these records are the proceedings against parties accused of witchcraft, about fifty having, in the course of three months, been brought under the cognizance of the Presbytery. Of these unfortunate wretches no less than twelve were executed at Irvine at one time in the month of March, 1650, (what a splendid Auto da Fe,) and four more within a few weeks afterwards. Unfortunately, (or perhaps rather fortunately), the minute book of the Presbytery is lost just at the time when they were in their full career. We have given below the proceedings in some of these cases, and in our future numbers we shall give farther extracts from these precious minutes. The first notice we find on the subject of witchcraft is in the month of May, in the year 1648, of some persons in the parish of Largs being suspected. On 3d July 1648, Mr William Castellan, one of the ministers of Stewarton, being sent to officiate at Largs, (the church being vacant,) was directed to make inquiries. He appears, however, to have been a very poor witch-finder, for he reported that the grounds “were not so clear as was alleged when they began to ripe them up;” and as there does not appear to have been any witches discovered at Stewarton, we suspect Mr William was rather careless in his investigation, more particularly as we find some of his elders complaining of his slackness in other matters. At length, however, in the month of September, 1649, they fairly hunted down and caught a witch in the parish of Kilwinning, one named Elizabeth Graham. Having once fairly got on the scent, matters went on swimmingly, and they soon had plenty of cases—some “upon presumption,” some “upon delation,” and some “upon mala fama,” so in one shape or another they were sure to be caught, and if caught, almost certain of being convicted. Their confessions appear to have been invariably the same, namely, having renounced their baptism, taken a new name from the devil, and having carnal dealings with him. These confessions were made after they had been dealt with by the Presbytery. What species of arguments were used to get these poor creatures to admit impossible crimes does not appear; but they must have been very stringent, seeing their confessions were certain to consign them, in a few days, to a horrible death. We have also to observe, that in the year 1647, a presentation to the kirk of Ardrossan was granted by Lord Montgomerie, the patron, which appears to have been conducted in precisely the same manner as was afterwards the practice, the people being merely cited to state whether “they had anything to object either against the doctrine or the life and conversation of the presentee.”

24th Sept., 1649.—The moderator of the Presbytery, (Mr Thomas Bell) upon the grounds and presumption of witchcraft that are holden forth against Elizabeth Graham in Kilwinning, having written for a commission to try the said Elizabeth. The commission is returned, whereupon it is appointed that some of the brethren go to the Erle of Eglinton, and speak his Lordship that that commission may be put in execution, and that his Lordship may be pleased actively to concur.”

24th Oct., 1649.—Upon the presumption of witchcraft that was holden forth against Elizabeth Graham in Kilwinning,* the Presbytery did conclude that the Committee of Estates should be written to for ane commission to put the said Elizabeth to an assize, if their Lordships should think the presumption relevant, and the draught of the letter that was drawn up by Mr James Ferguson is approved as fit to be sent.”

19th March, 1650.—The baillie of Cuninghame having signified to the Presbytery, that upon Thursday next an assize was to be holden upon twelve persons who had confessed the sin of witchcraft, and that the execution was to be upon Friday the morn thereafter, and that it was fitting a minister should be appointed to wait upon every one of them that they might be brought to a farther acknowledgment of their guilt. The Presbytery having considered the fairsaid, does, in order thereto, appoint these brethren following to wait upon the execution the said day, viz., Mr Ralph Rodger, Mr James Ferguson, Mr Wm. Russel, Mr R. Urie, Mr Alex. Nisbet, Mr James Romah, Mr Wm. Rodger, Mr And. Hutchison, Mr Wm. Castellan, Mr James Clandening, Mr Rob. Aird, Mr Wm. Crookes, and Mr Gabriel Cuninghame.”

* In a work entitled “Satan's Invisible World Discovered,” by Mr George Sinclair, Professor of Philosophy in the College of Glasgow, there is an account of the proceedings against Elizabeth, or Jessie Graham, one of the parties mentioned in the minutes of presbytery. It is stated to have been given by the minister of the parish. It appears that in a fit of drunkenness Jessie had threatened another woman, who ten days afterwards was taken ill and died. Jessie was apprehended and imprisoned in the steeple on a charge of witchcraft. She lay there for thirteen weeks, the minister constantly visiting her. But she remained obdurate, denying her guilt. He was under great doubts on the subject, when fortunately a celebrated witch-finder, named Bogs, made his appearance, and having examined Bessie, found the mark in the middle of her back. Into this mark Bogs inserted a large brass pin; and as Bessie did not appear to feel it, and no blood flowed, this was considered strong evidence. The minister was a good deal nonplused, however, because the chief man in the parish, (we presume Lord Eglinton,) and other judges, had declared it to be “mere clatters.” Another circumstance appears to have given the minister some anxiety, which was, his fear that the assize would not condemn Bessie, unless he advised them to do so, which he was not very clear about doing. In this dilemma he prayed for direction how he was to proceed, and as he appears to have considered it by a special interposition, he was induced to listen at the door of the prison, accompanied by the bellman, where they overheard Bessie conversing with the

A LAST CENTURY ROW IN "AULD REEKIE."

THE social habits of the denizens of Edinburgh, during last century, have been admirably depicted by the "Author of Waverley," and are well known. The following account of a criminal action, arising out of one of the frequent excesses in which the most respectable indulged, is copied from a periodical of 1758, and affords a capital illustration of the bacchanalian bouts of our worthy grandfathers. The Lord Provost, and sundry members of that famous body, the "City Guard," it will be observed, are the parties brought to the bar. Andrew Crosbie, the Pleydel of Scott, is one of the counsel on the part of the defenders.

About the 22d of July, criminal letters, at the instance of John Wightman of Mauleslie, with concurrence of his Majesty's Advocate, were executed against Robert Montgomery, Esq.; present Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and against a corporal and nine private soldiers of the city-guard. The occasion of this prosecution was as follows. Mr Wightman having invited several friends to dine at his house on Sunday, June 4, the birth-day of the Prince of Wales, they drank pretty freely, and by their behaviour gave offence to some people in the neighbourhood. Two of the gentlemen were in liquor before they came in, and one of these puked over a window. This produced an altercation between him and one or more persons who had taxed him and the rest of the company with a heinous profanation of the Lord's day; and drew several idle people to the place. The Lord Provost, who lives in the neighbourhood, sent for a party of the guard to see what the disturbance was. When the party went into the house, they found Mr Wightman and two other gentlemen in a room; but seeing no disturbance they retired down stairs. The three gentlemen followed them. By this time one of the gentlemen, who had been put to bed, awoke; and running down a back-stair, without wig or shoes, he and the soldiers met, a scuffle ensued between them, and the other gentlemen interposed. Whether the soldiers first attacked the gentleman, or he them, is not easy to be determined, as either party charge the other with it. That gentleman, another, and Mr Wightman were carried to the guard, a fourth got off, and some others who had been at dinner, were gone before the party arrived.—The libel bears, that Mr Wightman having asked the commander of the party for his warrant, was answered by the corporal, holding out his lochaber-axe, This is my warrant; that Mr Wightman having challenged the soldiers for insulting a gentleman in his house, was struck once and again by them with their lochaber-axes, to the effusion of his blood, and then dragged, he and his two companions, as malefactors, down the High Street, to the guard-house, exposed to the view of people of all ranks, in broad day-light, one or more of them wanting shoes, &c.; nor were they allowed chairs, or time to write to the Lord Provost, though this was requested by Mr Wightman; that upon being put into the guard-house, Mr Wightman pointed at the soldier who had wounded him, and desired the serjeant who commanded in the absence of the captain, to take him into custody; that thereupon some of the aforementioned party knocked Mr Wightman down to the ground, where he lay a considerable time deprived of his senses, and in that condition was thrown into the thieves' hole, to which dungeon another of the gentlemen had been committed before; that upon the captain's coming in, Mr Wightman demanded of him, by whose authority he was committed? to show the warrant of commitment, and to give a list of the party by whom he had been abused, but was refused satisfaction in any of these particulars; that in an hour or two after, the captain told the prisoners, that they were at liberty, and might go when and where they pleased; and that before going out of the guard-house, Mr Wightman took a protest, dated between ten and eleven at night, June 4. But the facts were put in a very different light by the counsel for the pannels, in their pleadings on the relevancy.—P. S. The trial came on before the High Court of Justiciary, Aug. 7. The Lord Provost was dressed, not in velvet, but in black cloth, like the other magistrates, and had on his badge of office, the gold chain and medal. His Lordship was attended in the pannel by Provost Drummond, the four Bailies, the Dean of Guild and Treasurer, the Convener, and some other members of the council. For counsel, the prosecutor had the Lord Advocate, Mess. Solicitor Pringle, Alexander Lockhart, and Hugh Dalrymple; and the pannels had Mess. James Burnet, Thomas Miller, Francis Garden, William Johnston, George Cockburn, Adam Fergusson, and Andrew Crosbie. After long pleadings on the relevancy, the Lords continued the cause till the 27th of November, and ordained informations to be given in for both parties the week preceding that date. The names of the two gentlemen who were carried to the guard with Mr Wightman, and of others who were at dinner with him, are in the list of witnesses to be adduced for proving the libel.

In the beginning of December, informations were given in for Mr Wightman, prosecutor, and for Provost Montgomery, and the corporal and soldiers of the city-guard of Edinburgh, pannels. Mr Wightman's was drawn by Mr Hugh Dalrymple, Provost Montgomery's, by Mr Francis Garden, and that of the soldiers, by Mr James Burnet. The pannels' account of the facts differs greatly from that of the prosecutor. They say, that the prosecutor and his company were hallowing, singing obscene songs, cursing, sometimes squabbling, and that some of them called for the guard; that from the window they entertained the female part feel send: although the minister could not understand their conversation the bellman did; at the same time the bellman appears to have got such a fright that he nearly tumbled down the stair of the steeple in his haste to get away from so dangerous a personage. Of course this was conclusive of Bessie's guilt, and her fate was soon settled. Finding she must die, poor Bessie prayed earnestly for forgiveness of her sins, but denied most obstinately the witchcraft, and the minister very sagely discovered that this was a device between Bessie and the devil to deceive him, but he was too knowing too to be thus taken in, and Bessie suffered according to her sentence, impatient to the last.

of the spectators with the most filthy and obscene language, when the streets were crowded with people returning home from public worship; that when the soldiers were going peaceably out of the prosecutor's house, two of the guests fell upon them with all the rage and fury of frantic bacchanals, beating them with hands and feet, throttling them, and endeavouring to wrest out of their hands the lochaber-axes.—“What” (says the elegant writer of the paper) “could the soldiers do in such a case? They had not the lyre of Orpheus: and if they had had it, it would not have availed them any more than it did Orpheus; who, though he could tame wild beasts, and soften even rocks by his music, yet could not appease the rage of that mad bacchanalian rout that tore him to pieces.”—That not a blow was struck by the soldiers; only the corporal ordered his men to carry the two persons who had attacked them to the guard; that the prosecutor swore that no man should be carried out of his house to the guard, or if they must go, he would go along with them; and accordingly, though the corporal desired him to keep his own house, fastened upon them, and went with them to the guard; and that they were put into the room where gentlemen prisoners are commonly put, and that no blow was exchanged between them and the soldiers in the guard.

It was pleaded, inter alia, for the prosecutor, that it was culpable in the Lord Provost to order the soldiers to enter a man's house, without a written warrant, or a peace-officer to direct them. To which it was answered, that if a riot had happened on the street, the guard would have seized the rioters without any order of a magistrate; or if a disturbance had happened in any house near the guard, and the mob had gathered about it, if no magistrate was at hand to give an order, the officer of the guard would have been justified in entering the house to compose the disorder; and if he and his party were assaulted, he might have carried the rioters to the guard till the orders of a magistrate were known. That the Provost's order to call the guard imported no more than what any sober citizen, upon a like occasion, might have innocently done, and often do, to keep the peace. That the guard-soldiers are a kind of armed peace officers, who, under the command of the magistrates, are ready to protect the citizens upon any sudden emergency, when the protection of the law and its civil officers would come too late. That not long ago a gentleman of fashion would have been murdered, as he was in fact most grievously wounded, if the soldiers of the guard, upon the alarm given, without any order, had not come to his relief, and saved his life, by breaking up the door of the room where he was locked in: and, that the necessity of such cases dispenses with the forms of law.

Another point was debated thus.

For Mr Wightman] “The prosecutor has reason to think, that after Mr Montgomery, and the other pannels, were served with a copy of the indictment at his instance, a precognition was taken in the council-chamber of Edinburgh, without any authority of your Lordships, nay in contempt of your authority; and in this, some of the witnesses contained in the prosecutor's list were examined; and after they had told all they knew of the matter, they were asked, whether they were of the prosecutor's witnesses? and upon their answer in the affirmative, they were dismissed.—There can be no proceeding more inconsistent with strict justice, with the nature of impartial evidence, and the forms of procedure in this court, than for a party arraigned before your Lordship's bar, to call for witnesses of his own authority, even those who had been cited in the cause, thereby endeavouring to pervert them to his purpose, and forestal their evidence in his own favour.”

For Provost Montgomery.] “That no reflection, as to this matter, may stick against gentlemen of fair reputation and public character, who have been employed as agents for the Provost, it is proper that the plain fact should be avowed, and justified.

The fact truly was, that when the pannel, a few days before the trial came on, met with Mr James Montgomery, one of his lawyers, and with William Alston and John Davidson, his agents, he showed them a list of the persons who he had been informed could prove the different parts of his defence. These gentlemen were truly surprised that a prosecution of this nature should have been attempted against the Provost, when the circumstances of the drunken riot appeared to be so flagrant; the one half of them would have been more than sufficient to justify any magistrate, or sober neighbour, for calling the guard to suppress the disorder: but they thought it of great consequence to state only in defence what could be clearly proved; and apprehending that the Provost had perhaps received his information in too strong colours, they had not the least hesitation to resolve, that the agents themselves should go, and converse with some of those persons, in order to know the truth. Some of them accordingly went, in open day-light, to enquire into the matter. They were so very delicate in the affair, that they introduced themselves, by telling the people with whom they conversed, that they had no right to ask any question, nor were they obliged to answer, unless they pleased. There were none of the magistrates along with them, nor did they so much as take written notes of what was related to them. Mr Alston went in accidentally to one house, where finding the landlord and his wife had been cited against the Provost, he immediately left the house without asking a question. At another time, a person who had been enquired after, came to the council-chamber, where Mr Davidson happened accidentally to be present; and upon discovering that he was cited for the prosecutor, he was likewise dismissed, without answering a question.

His Majesty's Advocate, for the public, every judge in the kingdom, and every party who apprehends himself wronged, has a right to take a precognition, by calling upon persons who are supposed to know the truth, and taking down their examinations, sometimes upon oath, in writing. This practice answers two most excellent purposes. It points out the evidences, by which the guilty are brought to condign punishment, and frequently prevents groundless prosecutions, by a discovery to the public conductors of such trials, that there is no foundation for the charge, or that a sufficient defence would be proved. And if the prosecutor in this case had taken such a precognition, to serve in place of his own information to his counsel, it cannot be believed that he would have been advised, or even suffered, to persist in the prosecution.

If then such precognitions are lawful and right, in order to aid a prosecutor to frame his indictment, and conduct his proof; shall it be maintained that the accused has no right to enquire, by all lawful ways and means, how he shall prove his innocence? And how can that possibly be done, but by such means as were used in this case, by conversing with and enquiry of those who are supposed to have been spectators of what passed? To affirm that this is illegal, is indeed to arraign the common sense and liberty of mankind. It is saying, in so many words, that although the court allows the pannel an exculpatory proof, yet he must not enquire who are the witnesses who can exculpate him, or what they know of the matter. But, says the prosecutor, you must make no enquiry after you are served with an indictment. This will make no difference in the case: for how shall one, who [as was Prov. Montgomery's case] is not in custody, or upon bail for trial, know that he is to be indicted, or of what crimes he is to be accused? And because the prosecutor thought proper rashly to bring this prosecution, without any previous precognition, in order to show if he could support his complaint; shall the pannel therefore be debarred from the common justice of a modest enquiry, in order to prove his defence?"

But no judgment was given upon these points: for the diet was deserted against the Provost, Dec. 27, and he was simpliciter dismissed from the bar.

With regard to the other pannels, the soldiers, the following interlocutor was pronounced, Jan. 8, 1759. "The Lords—find the libel relevant to infer the pains of law, against the pannels, or any of them, in so far as it charges, that they, or any of them, after having entered the prosecutor's house in consequence of orders libelled to have been given by Robert Montgomery, Esq. late Lord Provost of Edinburgh, commanding a party of the guard to repair to the prosecutor's house, to search for, seize, and apprehend him, and all those who should be found in company with him in said house, and commit them prisoners to the guard, did, without any just cause, abuse and maltreat the prosecutor, or those in company with him, in the way and manner libelled, either in the prosecutor's house, or in the street, or in the guard-room; or that they, or any, or one or other of them, were guilty, actors, art and part, in the several facts found relevant; but allow the pannels to prove all facts and circumstances alleged in their defence for exculpation or alleviation of the facts charged upon them, as above found relevant; and remit the pannels, with the libel, as found relevant, to the knowledge of an assize."

The depositions of the witnesses were then taken; after which the proof was summed up on the part of the prosecutor by Mr Alexander Lockhart, and on the part of the pannels by Mr James Barnet; and the following verdict was returned next day, viz. "The assize—by a majority of voices find, that Alexander Miln, corporal, commanding officer of the party, is guilty, art and part, in abusing and maltreating the prosecutor, and some of these in company with him, by not allowing Mr Wightman to write to the Provost, by refusing the use of chairs when asked, and by the ignominious way and manner of carrying them, in broad day-light, through the streets, from the house of Mr Wightman to the guard, one or other of them without hats, wigs, or shoes: and do find the whole other pannels not guilty. In witness whereof." &c.

Accordingly the soldiers were instantly assoltized; but with regard to Corporal Miln, his counsel craved to be heard on the import of the verdict; to which the counsel for the prosecutor agreed. Both were heard Jan. 22, after which the Corporal was also assoltized.

SGEUR NA BAINTIGHEARNA, OR THE LADY'S ROCK.

In our 5th Number, page 69, we gave an account of the Legend of the Lady's Rock, as furnished by our contributor, D. C. We now subjoin another account of this legend, as it obtained in the neighbourhood of the spot about fifty years ago, which differs in some respects from that already given; and, being the production of a lady,* may be interesting to our fair readers:—

"At the south end of the island of Lismore we sailed near a small rocky isle, over which the sea rolls at high tides; at other times it raises its rough head somewhat above the surface of the water. It is called the Lady's Rock, for the following reason.

"In former times one of the McLeans of Duart, whose castle (now in ruins) stands on a promontory in Mull, in nearly an opposite direction to the Lady's Rock, married a sister of Argyle. The lady was handsome and amiable, but unhappily she was barren. In those days it was a high crime in the eye of a husband, when his wife bore him no children. Duart hated his hapless lady for that cause, and determined on her destruction. To accomplish it with ease, and as he imagined, safe from detection, he ordered ruffians to convey her secretly to the bare rock near Lismore, and there leave her to perish at high tide. The deed was executed to Duart's wish, and the lady left on the rock, watching the rolling tide rising to overwhelm her. When she had given herself up for a lost being, and expected in a very short time to be washed from the rock by the waves, she fortunately perceived a vessel sailing down the Sound of Mull, in the direction of the rock on which she was sitting. Every effort in her power was exerted, and every signal in her possession was displayed to attract the notice of the people in the vessel. At length they perceived her and drew near the rock. She made herself known, and related that it was by the order of her barbarous husband she was left on the rock, and thus reduced to the wretched state in which they found her.

* The Hon. Mrs Murray of Kensington—in her "Companion and Useful Guide to the Beauties in the Western Highlands and Hebrides." London, 1803.

The mariners, ever a generous race, took compassion on her, received her on board their vessel, and conveyed her safely to her brother at Inverary.

"M'Lean Duart made a grand mock funeral for his much loved, much lamented lady, who he announced to have died suddenly. He wrote disconsolate letters to her relations, particularly to Argyle, and after a decent time went to Inverary in deep mourning, where with the greatest show of grief, he lamented to his brother-in-law the irreparable loss he had sustained. Argyle said little, but sent for his sister, whose unexpected appearance in life and health, proved an electric shock to her tender husband. Argyle was a mild and amiable man, and took no other revenge of M'Lean but commanding him to depart instantly, at the same time advising him to be cautious not to meet his brother Donald, who would certainly take away his life for having intended to destroy that of his sister. Sir Donald Campbell did meet him many years afterwards in a street at Edinburgh, and there stabbed him for his crime towards his sister, when M'Lean was eighty years of age."

TOMB OF COCKBURN OF HENDERLAND.

[We copy the following particulars, additional to what appeared in the "Journal," page 126, respecting "Cockburn the Borderer," from the "Peeblesshire Monthly Advertiser," a well-conducted periodical, devoted chiefly to matters of local and literary interest. We are at a loss to understand how the inscription on the tombstone should be "Perys of Cockburn," seeing that the name of the "borderer" was WILLIAM COCKBURN OF HENDERLAND. Perhaps "J. P.," the correspondent of the "Peeblesshire Advertiser," may be able to explain this.]

TOMBSTONE

of

COCKBURN OF HENDERLAND, and his Lady.
1529.

The prefixed is a drawing of the flat monumental stone over the grave of Cockburn of Henderland, a free-booter in the reign of James V., of whose surprise and summary execution by the king, in 1529, a short account is given in "Chambers's Picture of Scotland," (1831) p. 84, and in his "Journal," 7th July, 1832. See also in "Scott's Border Minstrelsy," The Lament of the Border Widow (Note). The tomb, which is about five feet long, stands on a moat, or small conical hill, flat on the top, still called the chapel-knowe, and is in the centre of what was the Chapel of the Castle of Henderland, and probably the "Kirk of Enderland," mentioned in the Records of the Presbytery of Peebles, 17th June 1603, as then "altogedder down and equall wt ye erd" (earth).

Sir Walter Scott says, "In a deserted burial-place which once surrounded the chapel of the castle, the monument of Cockburn and his lady is still shown. It is a large stone broken in three parts; but some armorial bearings may yet be traced." When Sir Walter wrote this note, the broken stone had been removed from its original resting-place into the adjoining burying-ground. The armorial bearings are a blank shield, a cross and sword. Sir Walter quotes the inscription, which is engraven in old Saxon characters, "Here lyes Perys of Cockburne, and hys wyfe mariory." The inscription is still legible with a little care. But in speaking of the "foaming cataract" near the castle, to which the lady is said to have retreated, in order to drown "the tumultuous noise which announced the close of her husband's existence," Sir Walter calls it the "Dow-glen," instead of Dhu-Lynn. This is probably a misprint.

In 1841, Mr Murray of Henderland ordered the old tomb to be repaired, the chapel-knowe to be planted, and these interesting relics to be protected by a stone wall round the foot of the moat, in which steps are formed for the convenience of strangers visiting and its delightful neighbourhood.

"Lone St Mary's silent lake,"

Before the repairs of the tomb were commenced, an individual who was somewhat sceptical as to whether the stone had really been placed over the laird's grave, dug about two feet down, and, to his surprise, turned up a portion of a human skull. It was in the dusk of the evening, and struck with dismay, he threw down his spade and fled. Next morning, however he returned, and part of the skull is now in the possession of a gentleman in Edinburgh. It was submitted to the inspection of a distinguished anatomist, without any information, but simply with a request that he would state "to what animal it belonged, and whether to male or female;" and he reported—"It is a portion of the inner table of the two parietal bones of the skull in advanced life, and apparently of the male sex. You will easily observe the serrated line of union of the two bones." There cannot be the smallest doubt, therefore, that this bone is part of the skull of the redoubted Border Thief, who, with Scott of Tushielaw, and Johnny Armstrong of Gilnocky Tower, incurred the barbarous penalty inflicted upon them by King James, in 1529.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS.

THE original of the following letter of Queen Mary with which we have been favoured, is in the archives of Kirkwall. There is no address on the original, but it appears to have been folded twice, and the four corners perforated simultaneously, apparently for a thread to pass through, and there is the impression of a seal on the part so perforated :

"Torquill M'Cloyd, we grete you wele. We are informit that sum of the Ilis ar desirous to have you allyat to thame be marraige, And becaus ye have that honor. to be of the Stewarth blude, we thot. expediet. to gif you advtisement. that it is or. will and pleshr. that ye allyat yourself to na party in marraige without or. advys, and qll. we declair or. opinioun and mynd to yor. self thairin. VALUE OF MONEY A HUNDRED AND
TWENTY YEARS AGO.

THE following letter, which is transcribed from the original document, is curious, as showing the value attached to a shilling sterling in 1728. The writer of the letter was Patrick Lindsay Crawford, second Viscount Garnock—a title now extinct. Kilbirnie Castle, in Ayrshire, was the family residence. He married a daughter of George Home, Esq. of Kelly, and died in 1785.

The party to whom the letter is addressed was Patrick Hunter of Hunterston, representative of an ancient family, who still enjoy the property, which is situated in the parish of West Kilbride, not many miles from Kilbirnie. He married Marion, eldest daughter of Thomas Crauford of Cartsburn, by whom he had five sons and four daughters. He died in 1739.

"Kilbirnie, June 4, 1728.

Dear Sir,

Please lett me know, in answer to yrs., what I see you o borrowed money, wc. I think is a shilling sterling, and two or thereby half pence. Write to me by ye bearer, my servant, let me know if the book letter be come to hand. My kind Love to all friends at Hunterstown, and believe me to be.

Dear Sir,
Your most afte. Cousin, and most humble Servt.
GARNOCK.

To Hunter of Hunterstown, Esq."

NOTES FROM THE RECORDS
OF THE
OLD TOLBOOTH,
The "Heart of Mid-Lothian."

1668, March 13. William Finlay, for theft from Samuel Cardwell, Leith, and cutting off his left hand with a broadsword, when arresting him in Kinross-shire.

— April 10. Sir William Ballendean, close prisoner, by warrant of Privy Council, and to suffer none to speak to him but in presence of one of the Lords of Privy Council.

[Sir William was brought to trial along with Sir James Turner, during a temporary fit of liberality on the part of the government of Charles II. The charges against him, though acting under the King's commission, were of an aggravated and brutal nature. He was fined in £200 sterling, and banished the kingdom. Sir William Ballenden is mentioned in Fountainhall's "Chronological Notes," as having, in 1687, "trepanned" young Sir Henry Wardlaw of Pitreavie into an improper marriage.]

— June 4. William Anderson, blacksmith, in Mid-Calder, "who was in the late rebellion."

— June 24. Michael Brun, close prisoner—no person to speak to him, except in presence of the Privy Council, or one of the bailies.

— Oct. 9. George Mutter, for murder.

— Oct. 24. James Lachlan, accession to the late rebellion.

— Oct. 26. Three "Egyptian persons" from Leith.

— Nov. 18. James Valentine, from Leith, a man who takes upon him to practice divination and soothsaying, and for money doth ordinarily make a trade of discovering things lost, and how they are to be found, and by whom they were taken away; and being a lowse, flagitious fellow, to be strictly kept in prison.

— Nov. 23. James Vallentine, soothsayer, who was sent from Leith for his "diabolical tricks," arrested during the Lord Lyon's pleasure.

1669, Jan. 6. David Mortoun, "a debosht profligate person, who, tho' he never was or is a minister, presumes to take upon him to marrie, contrarie to the rules of God and the Laws of the Kingdom. To answer to the Privy Council.

— Jan. 6. Bessie Barrio, "a most malicious woman," for burning a barn-yard. Warrant signed "Atholl."

— Feb. 24. Robert Rosse, counterfeiting dollars and marks.

June 27. Agnes Drummond, "for her wicked and debosht life and actions." By order of the Privy Council.

— July 6. Robert Ogilvie, to be laid in irons till to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and the bailies to cause their hangman carry him to the pillorie, near the Cross, to stand thereon from 11 till 12, with a paper on his Brow, having this inscription, "Robert Ogilvie, a man-sworn person," and to be carried back to prison till "further orders." By warrant of the Lords of Council and Session.

1669, July 7. Chief of the Camerons, for £860 Scots, being for the "maintanance" of his lands. Relieved by the Lords of Council, in respect he had a protection for his person and debts, and the "two messengers put in the tolbuith."

— Sept. 13. Dyet and suitable entertainment to the "three Highland Thieves" sent in by Sir James Campbell. They were allowed a groat a-day each.

— Sept. 18. "The laite Laird of Carsland" (not named) warded as "being forfeitured of treason."

[Robert Ker of Kersland, in Ayrshire. In early life he took a decided part with the Covenanters. He had the credit of inflexible integrity, and possessed the confidence of his party to a great extent. In Nov. 1666, he met with the Laird of Caldwell and others, at Shitterflat, in the parish of Beith, where they formed a small party of horse, and marched to join their covenanting countrymen, immediately before the battle of Pentland.* Of this troop Mure of Caldwell was Captain. They went as far as Glassford, but by this time the King's troops had got between them and the army of the Covenanters, under Colonel Wallace, which made them retire. For this affair Kersland and Caldwell, and the other heritors who had been with them, were indicted as guilty of treason, and forfeited. The estate of Kersland was given to General Drummond. Kersland fled to Holland, but returned privately in 1669. He was meanly betrayed by a pretended friend, and apprehended in his lady's bed-chamber in Edinburgh. After a long course of sufferings he went again to Holland, where he died in 1680.]

1670, Aug. 27. James Fergusson, "for a most crewall and bloodie murder."

— Oct. 27. George Graham and James Beattie, for horse stealing.

— Dec. 19. Grigor Dow MacGrigor, presented by Sir James Campbell of Lawars, who had a commission from the Privy Council, directed to all Magistrates to receive prisoners presented by him. [See "Suppression of the Clan Gregor," page 237 of the Journal.]

1671, March 28. John Scott, workman in Leith, for the crime of witchcraft, on warrant by Robert Baird and David Boyd, bailies.

— May 2. Robert Kerr, glover in Stirling, for treasonable speeches.

— May 26. Marion M'Caul, for drinking the Devil's health, to be scourged, bored in the tongue and burnt in the cheek, pursuant to a sentence of the Court of Justiciary.

1672, May 9. Jean Bonar, for child murder.

— June 29. Duncan Macpherson of Cluny. By order of the Privy Council.

[This Duncan Macpherson of Cluny died at an advanced age, in 1722, without surviving male issue. The representation of the family consequently devolved upon his cousin.]

— July 24. John Cameron, for murder.

* The "Rising of Pentland," by a misprint, is stated in our last to have occurred in 1667, in place of 1666.

1672, July 26. Seventeen persons, for Conventicles, by warrant of the Secret Council.

— Sept. 13. Nine persons for Conventicles.

— Sept. 16. Ten "Egyptians, sorning and rioting in the Country," brought from Dundee.

— Sept. 23. M'Corkindale, murder of two men.

— Oct. 28. John Brisbane, younger of Rosland, returning from banishment, and stealing horses from his father's tenants in the night. By warrant signed "Dundonald."

— Oct. 28. John Campbell of Ardchattan.

— Dec. 14. Isobel Martin, for the murder of Richard Tweedie.

1673, Jan. 23. Act of Sederunt, by Lords of Council and Session. "All persons taking the Cessio to wear a dyvots habit, brown and yellow, and a hood of same colour, and when liberated from prison, to come out betwixt the hours of 9 and 12."

— Feb. 20. Andrew and David Speedans, "hieland gentlemen," and James Shaw, for murder. On a verbal order from the Court of Justiciary.

— Feb. 20. Donald Campbell, "My Lord Argyll's peadge," warded by Lord Chancellor.

— June 2. Margaret Millar, for "most insolentlie riving the Proclamation" of the Privy Council against Conventicles, at Kirkaldy Cross.

1674, Jan. 13. Agnes Johnston, for the murder of Margaret Lamb.

— Jan. 28. William Barrie and George Barrie, for the "crewall and horrid murther" of Thomas Dunlop in Foulshaw.

— Feb. 7. James Mitchell, "anent the shot at the Archbishop of St Andrews his coach," in July 1668, by which Andrew, Bishop of Orkney, was wounded in the arm. Warrant signed "Rothes."

[All have heard of the fanatical attempt of Mitchell, who was a preacher, and had been at Pentland, to assassinate Archbishop Sharpe as he was about to enter his coach at the head of Blackfriars' Wynd. The prime escaped, the shot having taken effect in the Bishop of Orkney's arm. Mitchell eluded pursuit, it is said, by taking refuge in the Old Tolbooth.]

— Feb. 25. William Laurieston, for the "ryot and ravishing of Margaret Cornwall, in Burrowstounness."

— March 10. William Measson, murder of James Ralston.

— March 17. Four persons, "for false coynes and clipping."

— May 6. Marion Wallace, for child-murder at Innerkip. By warrant of the Lord Commissioner his Grace, and Lords of His Majesty's Privy Council.

— June 7. John Inglis of Nether Cramond, for keeping Conventicles "ilk sabbath day in the month of April and May last." Fined in the fourth part of his yearly valued rent "for ilk ane." Warrant signed "Rothes."

— June 22. Four persons for Conventicles on the Lomonds.

LETTERS FROM A PILGRIM IN SCOTLAND.

No. III.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL.

SIR,—Had you said "Letters from a Gabel-lunzie" you would have better expressed my vocation, for I only intend to give you legends, traditions, superstitions, and such crumbs, that I have picked up in my wanderings. I was glad to find that "Loch Coulter" and the "Witch of Torwood" were deemed suitable. By the way, the Printer has made a very erroneous reading in the first. He substitutes sett for yett.^{*} The sentence should read—"He passed the Yett, over which a venerable ha' tree stood sentinel," &c. I refer your readers to the legend. You will receive with this "The Fairy Rings," a legend. I intended, in No. III., to have given notices of a few "curious things" in and near Falkirk. These in No. IV., as I must yet make inquiry. I send you nothing but what is received as verity.

Fairy Rings, or Fairy Circles, are often to be seen in muirs. They are generally very round, and covered with a bright green vegetation. I could account for them, of course, but, like Campbell, I do not thank Newton for his analysis of the rainbow. You remember what Lord Buchan says—"I take it to be a great advantage that one can amuse one's self with an old idle story in these stormy times."

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
A. B. G.

THE FAIRY RINGS—A LEGEND.

MARY NEILSON, an orphan, was blind. However, "her leuks were not changit." Her "leuks were not changit." This is the text of my legend. Her "e'e was fu' o' beauty, an' waeft' it was to see the grit tears trinklin' owre her cheek: as the rain when the win' is playin' wi' the blossom o' the bean. Puir Mary! "she gied to the Muir to pu' the wee flowers, that Grannie likit sae weel to hae. But the fairies whyled her awa'. She was fand by the herd o' Shielhill, within their Rings, "soan sleepin." He wauken't her. She sabbit an' said 'I canna see.'" The Rings of my legend are still on the Muir of Falkirk, near the houses called Bentend. "The herd took Mary hame. She grat a' the road, crying 'I canna see.'" Her venerable relative has put past the wheel, for her usual stent is done. She has even read her "chapter," an' the "Crook in the Lot."—However she is not uneasy, for Mary "wad be wi' the lasses o' the toon [farm]." She has "lichtit her cruizie an' set it in the window." She is very uneasy now, "for the gloamin' is wearin' awa'." Supper is ready—is "cauld wi' stanin' sae lang." Her bed is "maid down." Now the herd and Mary are "hame." "I canna see," were the first words Grannie heard. The herd told all. All

Mary said was, "I canna see." Grannie's grief was fearful. She "wad never forgie hersel' for lettin' Mary gang to the Muir." She "kent weel that something was to happen." Had she not "dreamt o' fire again an' again?" Had not Yerron, the collie [dog], been "greetin' [howling] a' Monday night?" Did not Janet Wilson tell her she heard three distinct "chaps on the back o' her bed" last Saturday? And, "aboon a', that weary pyet [Maggie] had never been aff the house for the last twa days." She "wad never forgie hersel' for lettin' Mary gang to the Muir. A' thae warnin's werena sent for naething. Puir Mary! Puir Mary!" Week followed week, and still Mary Neilson was blind. "I canna see:" this was all she said. However, the neighbours had a story. They whispered that as Mary was "puin' the wee flowers" on the Muir, a fairy appeared to her, and said, "Come wi' me." Mary, indeed, "at the en'" allowed that a fairy appeared to her, and said, "Come wi' me," and that she went. The fairy took her to a "beautifu' water. Twa swans, wi' wings a' glitterin' wi' licht, cam' near." One to the fairy. One to Mary. The fairy said "Fly." They flew. Then they entered a "wud," where "the munc was linin' ilka leaf o' the trees wi' silver." The fairy said "Music." Then the "wee gonty flowers in her han' glintit wi' dew, an' a fairy stude in each." Music! Then a sweet, delicate air was struck up. Mary was to be their Queen. No—she would not. The fairy who conducted her to the wood said, "Refuse not." Mary held out. The result was, she was rendered—blind in revenge! The fairies led her to their Rings. There she was found by the herd.

This legend is, or was, implicitly credited by the neighbours. I leave it to philosophers to account for the belief. Certain it is the Fairy Rings are still there. Certain it is Mary Neilson left her Grannie's cottage well. Certain, too, that she was found within the Fairy Rings—and blind. She was seven years of age when the event occurred. Her "leuks were not changit. Her e'e was as fu' o' beauty as ever." This showed it was the fairies.

71, Waterloo Street, A. B. G.
Glasgow, 4th Dec. 1847.

N.B.—I may add that, on each seventh anniversary (Mary Neilson's ago then) of the day she was found within the Fairy Rings, two swans "cam' to a hollow o' water near the spot. They "flychtered here an' there a' the night, an' when they flew awa' they seemed to carry the mune-licht on their wings. Sae leamin' were they." May 7, 1848, is the next anniversary. Perhaps the credulous reader may visit Bentend. If so—ho will of course see (?) the "twa swans!"

DUNLOP CHEESE.

The small village of Dunlop, in Ayrshire, has been long celebrated for the excellent produce of its dairy. During the troubles which occurred, in regard to religion, in the reign of Charles II., a woman of the name of Barbara Gilmour, belonging to the parish of Dunlop, fled to Ireland to avoid the persecution which was then raging with great violence in the west of Scotland, after returning from her exile, she succeeded in making cheese from unskimmed milk. The farm on which the first cheeses were made was the farm of Hill, in Dunlop. Some have supposed that she learned the art in Ireland; but this could not be the case, as it was nearly half a century afterwards before cheese-making was known in the north of Ireland. It would appear that she died prior to 1696. Her burying-place is in the east corner of Dunlop churchyard. A stone, which seems to have been placed over her grave a considerable time after her death, contains the names of several individuals, among which her name is mentioned; but neither the date of her birth nor death is given. Forsyth, in his 'Beauties of Scotland,' thus speaks of Barbara Gilmour:—

* He did so in the belief that a place of meeting was meant—the "Sett," or "Tryst," under the hawthorn tree.—Printer's Devil.

"The manufacture of cheese has been the source of much prosperity to the northern part of Ayrshire.* It was first introduced, or brought into perfection by a farmer's wife, in the parish of Dunlop. It has hitherto been one of the misfortunes of mankind, that in consequence of a false taste, they have bestowed more attention and applause upon great talents or ingenuity, when exerted in the arts of destruction, than when employed in devising the means of giving plenty and felicity to nations. * * * * *

"It is certainly true that Barbara Gilmour, whose industry and ingenuity first produced what is now called Dunlop Cheese, performed a more valuable service to the world than Alexander the Great or Julius Caesar accomplished by their sanguinary labours, and without any mixture of evil, undoubtedly, produced a greater number of industrious, happy, and prosperous families. She had gone to Ireland to avoid the absurd religious persecution, which was conducted with such atrocity in the west of Scotland, under the last prince of the house of Stewart. Having returned, after the revolution, she introduced this manufacture, which, since that period, has been the great business of this neighbourhood. * * Thus, providence sometimes puts it in the power of a person in the humblest station, to become extensively useful to society."

A late writer says that the cheese known by the name of Dunlop cheese is inferior to the Gloucester and Stilton cheese—neither so rich in quality, nor so agreeable to the palate. If what the writer states be true, we are ignorant of the cause. Perhaps it was the cheese called half-an-half, (cheese made from milk, one half of which is skimmed, vast quantities of which are made in Ayrshire) that he has written about. We have as good pasture in Scotland as is to be found any where in England, and the Ayrshire milch cows are a superior breed, and the manner of manufacturing cheese unsurpassed by any people in the world.

CAPTAIN THOMAS NEWTE.

In 1788, there was published a Tour in Scotland, to which the author did not prefix his name.

* Cheese-making has since extended over all the west of Scotland.

The authorship was, nevertheless, assigned, on good authority to Thomas Newte, Esq., for many years a captain of, and afterwards part owner of several ships in the service of the East India Company. On one occasion, he had the good fortune to entertain Captain Cook, his officers and crew, near the Cape of Good Hope, and is mentioned with respect in "Cook's Voyages." "He is said to be (we quote from a cotemporary journal) a man of a generous disposition, and of an active turn of mind; and with these qualities, it is also said that he fortunately unites an ample fortune and public spirit. He has lately set an example to the East India Company, of building ships on an enlarged plan, and constructed in such a manner, as at once to admit a reduction of freight, and to do as much execution as a sixty-gun ship of the line. This example will, no doubt, be followed, and a great addition thereby made to the naval strength of the nation. As Mr Newte is considered to be a leading man among the owners of ships and proprietors of India stock, it is not to be wondered that he is very much attended to by different members of Administration. The gentlemen who accompanied Mr Newte in his Tour in Scotland, were Captain Scott, of the East India Company, and Captain Nutt, who commands one of Captain Newte's ships. The occasion of the Tour, perhaps, was the death of his lady, a daughter of the late excellent Sir Charles Raymond.

"Mr Newte possesses an estate, and is the representative of an ancient family in Devonshire. He takes great pleasure in reading books, especially the best poets. A taste of this kind seems to be hereditary in his family; for his brother, once a Fellow of Christ Church, Oxford, now a Clergyman in Devonshire, has written Poems on various subjects, though they have not been published. Mr Newte possesses every advantage of exterior appearance—a good person, an interesting countenance, and a tone of voice manly, yet melodious and affecting. Though he has not yet passed the 86th year of his age, he has performed, in different stations, seven voyages to India."—Oct. 1788.

GRAVEN AND MOLTEN IMAGES OF THE ANCIENT IDOLATERS.

We believe most readers of the Bible think that a graven image and a molten image were separate and distinct forms of images. Bishop Horsley, in his "Translation of Hosea," gives the following explanations, from which it appears they were one and the same thing:—

"We read frequently, in our English Bibles, of graven images, and of molten images: and the words are become so familiar, as names of idolatrous images, that although they are not well chosen to express the Hebrew names, it seems not advisable to change them for others that might more exactly correspond with the original.

"The graven image was not a thing wrought in metal by the tool of the workman we should now call an engraver; nor was the molten image an image made of metal, or any other substance melted, and shaped in a mould. In fact, the graven image and the molten image are the same thing, under different names. The images of the ancient idolaters were first cut out of wood by the carpenter, as is very evident from the Prophet Isaiah. This figure of wood was overlaid with plates either of gold or silver, or, sometimes perhaps, of an inferior metal; and in this finished state it was called a graven image, (i. e. a carved image,) in reference to the inner solid figure of wood, and a molten, (i. e. an overlaid, or covered) image, in reference to the outer metalline case or covering; and sometimes both epithets are applied to it at once. "I will cut off the graven and molten image." Again, "What profiteth the graven and molten image?" The English word "molten" conveys a notion of melting, or fusion. But this is not the case with the Hebrew word, for which it is given. The Hebrew יָדָה signifies, generally, to overspread, or cover all over, in whatever manner, according to the different subject, the overspreading or covering be effected; whether by pouring forth a substance in fusion, or by spreading a cloth over or before, or by hammering on metalline plates. It is on account of this metalline case, that we find a founder employed to make a graven image. And that we read in Isaiah of a workman that "melteth a graven image;" and in another place we find the question, "who hath molten a graven image?" In these two passages, the words should be "overlayeth," and "overlaid."

THE REIGN AND DEATH OF WILLIAM RUFUS.

SHOULD any one be desirous, however, to know the make of his person, he is to understand that he was well set; his complexion florid, his hair yellow; of open countenance: different coloured eyes, varying with certain glittering specks; of astonishing strength, though not very tall, and his belly rather projecting; of no eloquence, but remarkable for a hesitation of speech, especially when angry. Many sudden and sorrowful accidents happened in his time, which I shall arrange singly, according to the years of his reign; chiefly vouching for their truth on the credit of the Chronicles. In the second year of his reign, on the third before the ides of August, a great earthquake terrified all England with a horrid spectacle; for all the buildings were lifted up, and then again settled as before. A scarcity of every kind of produce followed; the corn ripened so slowly that the harvest was scarcely housed before the feast of St Andrew.

In his fourth year was a tempest of lightning, and a whirlwind: finally, on the ides of October, at Winchester, a stroke of lightning beat against the side of the tower with such force, that, shattering the wall where it joined to the roof, it opened a place wide enough to admit a man; entering there, it struck a very large beam, and scattered fragments of it over the whole church; moreover, it cast down the head of the crucifix, with the red leg, and the image of St Mary. A stench so noisome followed, as to be insupportable to human nostrils. At length the monks, with auspicious business, entering, defeated the contrivances of the devil, by the sprinkling of holy water. But what could this mean? such a thing was unknown to every previous age. A tempest of contending winds from the south-east, on the sixteenth before the kalends of November, destroyed more than six hundred houses in London. Churches were heaped on houses, and wall on partitions. The tempest proceeding yet farther, carried off altogether the roof of the church of St Mary-le-Bow, and killed two men. Rafters and beams were whirled through the air, an object of surprise to such as contemplated them from a distance; of alarm to those who stood nigh, lest they should be crushed by them, for four rafters, six-and-twenty feet long, were driven with such violence into the ground, that scarcely four feet of them were visible. It was curious to see how they had perforated the solidity of the public street, maintaining there the same position which they had occupied in the roof from the hand of the workman, until, on account of their inconvenience to passengers, they were cut off level with the ground, as they could not be otherwise removed. In his fifth year, a similar thunder storm at Salisbury entirely destroyed the roof of the church-tower, and much injured the wall, only five days after Osmund, the bishop of famed memory, had consecrated it. In his sixth year there was such a deluge from rain, and such incessant showers, as none had ever remembered. Afterwards, on the approach of winter, the rivers were so frozen that they bore horsemen and waggons; and soon after, when the frost broke, the bridges were destroyed by the drifting of the ice. In his seventh year, on account of the heavy tribute which the king, while in Normandy, had levied, agriculture failed; of which failure the immediate consequence was a famine. This also gaining ground, a mortality ensued, so general, that the dying wanted attendance, and the dead burial. At that time, too, the Welsh, fiercely raging against the Normans, and depopulating the county of Chester and part of Shropshire, obtained Anglesey by force of arms. In his tenth year, on the kalends of October, a comet appeared for fifteen days, turning its larger train to the east, and the smaller to the south-east. Other stars also appeared, darting, as it were, at each other. This was the year in which Anselm, that light of England, voluntarily escaping from the darkness of error, went to Rome. In his eleventh year, Magnus, king of Norway, with Harold, son of Harold, formerly king of England, subdued the Orkney, Mevanian, and other circumjacent isles, and was now obstinately bent against England from Anglesey. But Hugh, Earl of Chester, and Hugh, Earl of Shrewsbury, opposed him; and ere he could gain the continent, forced him to retire. Here fell Hugh of Shrewsbury, being struck from a distance with a fatal arrow. In his twelfth year, an excessive tide flowed up the Thames, and overwhelmed many villages, with many inhabitants. In his thirteenth year, which was the last of his life, there were many adverse events: but the most dreadful circumstance was, that the devil visibly appeared to men in woods and secret places, and spoke to them as they passed by. Moreover, in the county of Berks, at the village of Finchhampstead, a fountain so plentifully flowed with blood for fifteen whole days, that it discoloured a neighbouring pool. The king heard of it and laughed; neither did he care for his own dreams, nor for what others saw concerning him. They relate many visions and predictions of his death, three of which, sanctioned by the testimony of credible authors, I shall communicate to my readers. Edmer, the historian of our times, noted for his veracity, says that Anselm, the noble exile, with whom all religion was also banished, came to Marcigny that he might communicate his sufferings to Hugo, abbat of Clugny. There, when the conversation turned upon King William, the abbat aforesaid observed, "Last night that king was brought before God; and by a deliberate judgment incurred the sorrowful sentence of damnation." How he came to know this, he neither explained at the time, nor did any of his hearers ask: nevertheless, out of respect to his piety, not a doubt of the truth of his words remained on the minds of any present. Hugh led such a life, and had such a character, that all regarded his discourse and venerated his advice, as though an oracle from heaven had spoken. And soon after, the king being slain as we shall relate, there came a messenger to entreat the archbishop to resume his see. The day before the king died, he dreamed that he was let blood by a surgeon; and that the stream reaching to heaven, clouded the light, and intercepted the day. Calling on St Mary for protection, he suddenly awoke, commanded a light to be brought, and forbade his attendants to leave him. They then watched with him several hours until daylight. Shortly after, just as the day began to dawn, a certain foreign monk told Robert Fitz Hamon, one of the principal nobility, that he had that night dreamed a strange and fearful dream about the king: "That he had come into a certain church, with menacing and insolent gesture, as was his custom, looking contemptuously on the standers by; then violently seizing the crucifix, he gnawed the arms, and almost tore away the legs: that the image endured this for a long time, but at length struck the king with its foot in such a manner that he fell backwards: from his mouth, as he lay prostrate, issued so copious a flame that the volumes of smoke touched the very stars." Robert, thinking that his dream ought not to be neglected, as he was intimate with him, immediately related it to the king. William, repeatedly laughing, exclaimed, "He is a monk, and dreams for money like a monk: give him a hundred shillings." Nevertheless, being greatly moved, he hesitated a long while whether he should go out to hunt, as he had designed: his friends persuading him not to suffer the truth of the dreams to be tried at his personal risk. In consequence, he abstained from the chase before dinner, dispelling the uneasiness of his unregulated mind by serious business. They relate that, having plentifully regaled that day, he soothed his cares with a more than usual quantity of wine. After dinner he went into the forest attended by a few persons: of whom the most intimate with him was Walter, surnamed Tirel, who had been induced to come from France by the liberality of the king. This man alone had remained with him, while the others, employed in the chase, were dispersed as chance directed. The sun was now declining, when the king, drawing his bow and letting fly an arrow, slightly wounded a stag which passed before him; and, keenly gazing, followed it, still running, a long time with his eyes, holding up his hand to keep off the power of the sun's rays. At this instant, Walter, conceiving a noble exploit, which was, while the king's attention was otherwise occupied, to transfix another stag which by chance came near him, unknowingly, and without power to prevent it, Oh, gracious God! pierced his heart with a fatal arrow. On receiving the wound, the king uttered not a word; but breaking off the shaft of the weapon where it projected from his body, fell, upon the wound, by which he accelerated his death. Walter immediately ran up, but as he found him senseless and speechless, he leaped swiftly upon his horse, and escaped by spurring him to his utmost speed. Indeed there was none to pursue him: some connived at his flight; others pitied him; and all were intent on other matters. Some began to fortify their dwellings, others to plunder, and the rest to look out for a new king. A few countrymen conveyed the body, placed on a cart, to the cathedral at Winchester; the blood dripping from it all the way. Here it was committed to the ground within the tower, attended by many of the nobility, though lamented by few. Next year the tower fell; though I forbear to mention the different opinions on this subject, lest I should seem to assent too readily to unsupported trifles, more especially as the building might have fallen, through imperfect construction, even though he had never been buried there. He died in the year of our Lord's incarnation 1100, of his reign the thirteenth, on the fourth before the nones of August, aged above forty years. He formed mighty plans, which he would have brought to effect, could he have spun out the tissue of fate, or broken through, and disengaged himself from the violence of fortune. Such was the energy of his mind, that he was bold enough to promise himself any kingdom whatever.—From Gile's new edition of William of Malinesbury's Chronicle.

THE STORY OF THE GREAT GIANT OF HENLLYS.

ABOUT a century ago, there lived near the banks of the Wye a very wicked man, rich and extremely oppressive; who, from his tyrannical conduct and the name of his residence, was called "Y cawr mawr o'r Henlllys"—the great giant of Henlllys. After practising much oppression and tyranny in his neighbourhood, at length he died; and the country rejoiced exceedingly at the deliverance. But their joy was of short duration. Soon after his death, the country began to be troubled with strange disturbances. Fearful sounds were heard at night, and unaccountable appearances seen about the lonely parts of the roads and lanes—beginning with nightfall, and increasing with the lateness of the hour; so that none but very courageous persons would venture out of doors. For some time the cause of these mysterious molestations greatly perplexed the country; but ere long it was discovered that they were occasioned by the Cawr mawr o'r Henlllys,—who, in his ghostly state, and with his pristine malignity, had come once more to trouble the neighbourhood. And then all peace of mind was gone. The women would not go to market, for fear of night overtaking them on their way home; and even the very horses started and trembled, and could scarcely be made to stir. Such was the state of things, that all the country cried out for having this wicked spirit laid; and in accordance with this desire, three clergymen—some say seven—undertook the work of exorcism. Having assembled in the parish church, in the dead of night, at the hour in which the spirit used to be most daring, and having drawn a circle round them on the floor in the vacant space before the altar, each holding a lighted candle, they commenced their exorcisms. After reading for some time, symptoms of the spirit's approach were perceived. He rushed forward from the other end of the church, in the form of a terrific monster; and with horrible roarings and bellowings; rushed towards them up the aisle, and sprang at them with his jaws extended. But the moment he reached the circle within which they stood, he fell back as from a stone wall, and instantly disappeared. So unexpected and appalling was the attack, that the candle of one of the exorcists went out,—his faith not being sufficiently strong for such a trial. However, they continued their adjurations; and the spirit again came forward in the same furious manner, in the form of a raging lion—and again met with the same repulse at the edge of the circle. Then, again, as a monstrous bull—with the same result. He continued these assaults for a considerable time and under different forms;—all of which are particularly described when the narration is complete. At one time he came up as a wave of the sea, foaming and threatening to overwhelm them, but dashing itself into spray and vanishing at the edge of the circle. At another time it seemed as if the end of the church were falling to ruins on their heads with fearful crashing. During the course of these proceedings so terrific was the scene that one of the candles went out—and even the remaining ones burnt dim. But their faith returned—and their candles burnt brighter. So they continued their exorcisms till at length the spirit appeared in his human form as when living. They then spoke to him, and asked him why he troubled the country? and he answered, "I was bad when a man, I am worse now I am a devil,"—and vanished in fire. From this time forth, as they proceeded with their adjurations, the forms which he assumed became less and less terrific; and his manner less fierce—till at last he came in the form of a fly, when they opened a tobacco box, and compelling him to enter it, they shut him in, and took him to Llynwynn pool—some say Llynhiwyn—and threw him in, there to remain for ninety-nine years—some say longer. At the expiration of that term he is to appear again, and be ten times worse than at first. So generally current is this story in the country, that some time ago when persons were dragging one of these pools for eels, they were significantly cautioned not to disturb the tobacco-box, and so release the old Caur before his time!

THE LAIRD OF HAPLAND.

A BALLAD.

"FORBEAR, my son, to go from thy home,
(The Lady of Hapland said,) O! stay at home, for evil will come
If thou join the lawless raid."
"The Cuninghame brave has sought my aid,
And, mother, I must go;
Of thy young son wouldst thou have it said
He fear'd to meet a foe."
"Let Cuninghame meet his foes alone,
If thou hop'st to live secure;
True friends the fierce Cuninghame has none
Since he slew the gallant Mure.
His hands are red with the blood of the brave
His treachery has spilt;
O, follow him not, but sheath thy glaive,
And share not in his guilt."
"Tis dawn of day, and I must away;
The chapel bell has been rung,
And I will return, at evening grey,
Ere the vesper hymn be sung."
"Thou'lt never return, my son, again,
Thou ne'er shall reach thy hall;
For thou wilt be found among the slain,
And bleeding thou shalt fall."
"Last night, in a dream, I saw thee ride
Around by the castle wall,
And by thy side was a bonnie bride,
With the kinsmen gathered all;
And I turn'd me round to look again,
And mark thy bride so fair,
But all was gone, and along the plain
A funeral train march'd there."
"I will not list to your wondrous dream—
It has got no charm for me;
To love-sick maids it may haply seem
Like a wild seer's augury.
My noble steed, at the open gate,
Chafes at the idle rein;
Farewell, I am lingering here too late—
I'll soon return again."
The sun has set in a blood-red sky,
The shadows of night come on,
And a foaming steed draws prancing nigh;
But rider, ah! there is none.
His vassals seek, 'neath the pale moonbeam,
By darkened glen and mound;
And long ere the morn, by Annick stream,
His bloody corse was found.

[Hapland is a beautiful small estate, in the parish of Dunlop, Ayrshire. It was originally the property of a family of the name of Dunlop, whose descendants are still in the parish—probably a branch of the Dunlops of Dunlop. Nearly two hundred years ago it became the property of a family of the name of Trotter. The small mansion on the estate has been unoccupied by the proprietors for a long time, and is in rather a dilapidated state. Aiket Castle, about a mile below the village of Dunlop, is the oldest building in the parish, and was at one time the family residence of one of the branches of the numerous Cuninghame family. It has long since passed into other hands. In Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, it appears that, on the 4th of November, 1670, William Cuninghame of Aiket was brought to trial for way-laying, with a number of confederates, and slaying "amq! Johnne Mure of Cauldwell;" and there is an old tradition that, about that time, the young Laird of Hapland was induced, notwithstanding the tender entreaties of his mother to the contrary—and who likewise had a remarkable dream about him—to accompany Cuninghame in a raid against one of his hostile neighbours, where he fell, mortally wounded, in an affray on the banks of the Annick, near where the village of Stewarton stands. The horse returned foaming and spent, having fled from the field when his rider fell.]

THE MONASTERY OF MOUNT SINAI.—I was most anxious to see another remarkable MS. of Sinai; this is a gospel said to have been extant in the palace of the emperor Theodosius. Cyrillus had not seen it, notwithstanding his function of librarian; but another brother, as well as Signor Petro, gave me a precise description of it. Thence, as well as from previous communications made to me about it at Cairo, the MS. I conceive may be of the eleventh century. But all my exertions, both conciliatory and imperative, were in vain. The explanation ran that the MSS. were in the archiepiscopal chapel, whose comptroller, who had but recently taken office, was not to be found. Upon my return to Cairo, the bishop there assured me that it had been sent a few years before to Constantinople, to the archbishop, for the purpose of being copied. But even in Constantinople I found no trace of it. This was a genuine instance upon all sides of the 'Græca fides.' Pointedly as I taxed the brotherhood with falsehood, they quietly submitted to the accusation. The prior is a native of Crete; St Paul's notorious character of the Cretes (the Cretes are always liars) he seems to verify in the present day. I now believe that the manuscript for which Lord Prudhoe offered some years ago two hundred and fifty pounds, and which was not accepted only because they could not agree about the division of the proceeds, has really been sold to the English. As it would be a disgrace to the monastery, they fancy they dare not admit it. But if it be in England, I wish Christian literature joy of the acquisition of the new treasure; for, that it may be speedily communicated to the real Christian church, is a wish towards whose fulfilment erudite men are doubtless already labouring.—'Travels in the East.'

HIGHLAND FAIRIES.—It is a long time since the "Daoine Shi," or fairies, disappeared from the society of mortals. The Gael clung to them for many years after all other nations had abandoned them as fictitious delusions. He had invested them with all the accompaniments of his own rude habits, so that the Highland fairy was as truly national as the Highlander himself. He believed them to be the veritable angels who rebelled and were cast from heaven. Unlike the elves of "merrie England," they had no sovereign, and disdained to owe fealty to any power inferior to that of the arch-fiend himself. We hear of a fairy queen on the borders, but she does not appear to have crossed the Grampians. On their expulsion from the celestial regions the "Daoine Shi" were condemned to dwell on the earth, and they fixed their abodes under its sod and under its seas. The inhabitants of the sea-shore believed them to be disguised in the shape of seals, animals which are common on all the northern coasts. In the interior of the country they were supposed to live in conical mounds, which often occur among the inequalities of a hilly district, and are in Celtic language called "Tomhauns." Mrs Grant of Laggan paints with vivid touch a lovely scene in Strath-spey, which is famous for its enchanted hillocks. They rise in a narrow pass, at the mouth of a small lake called Lochan Uvie, close under the tall perpendicular cliff of Craig Our, on whose summit the last goshawk known in Scotland built its unapproachable nest. The mounds are thickly overgrown with birchwood, whose light waving boughs have a fantastic effect in the moonlight, when, according to rumour, unearthly figures are to be seen flitting underneath them. The Celtic fairies seem to have been a morose and malicious race, not unlike the German gnomes or earth spirits. Their supposed origin accounted for this, and their chance of salvation being very remote, they hated with unremitting jealousy the human beings in whose eternal weal the Almighty had deigned to take an interest. Their power over mankind was limited, and depended not a little on human faith and obedience. Transgression of duty, presumption, or neglect of the proscribed ordinances of religion, threw mortals within reach of their malignity. As they were unhappy so they were capricious, and variable. Sometimes they would benefit men, sometimes they would injure; and the uncertainty of their dispositions rendered the Highlanders cautious in adverting to them. They were called men of peace, though notoriously quarrelsome, and "the gude friends," though too frequently they proved themselves enemies. Their inveterate habit of kidnapping children might be excused on the plea that they were yearly obliged to pay tithes or tithes to hell, and therefore preferred to substitute mortal infants in the place of their own offspring. See the curious confession of Isabel Gowdie in Pitcairn's "Criminal Trials." There was marrying and giving in marriage among the Highland elves, in which respect they had lapsed from the spirituality of their angelic nature. Agreeably to the changeful humours which ayawed them, the object of their choice was now one of their own race, now a mortal woman, forcibly abducted from her earthly kindred. The mother, after her delivery, was in a perilous state of exposure to their devices. Till both she and her infant had been formally admitted into the visible church, the first by public thanksgiving, the latter by baptism, they were not considered in safety by their relatives. It was thus imperative on those around the invalid to watch with unremitting assiduity, more especially by night. A moment's forgetfulness might ruin all; but if the attendants were on their guard no ill could happen, as the fairies never came unseen, and a single adjuration in the Holy Name was sufficient to disappoint their malice. The stratagems they had recourse to were endless. Either a charmed sleep weighed down the vainly resisting eyelids of the watchers, or a false alarm from without summoned the household from the sick room, and, on their hasty return, they would find the bed empty, and a green bough left in place of the stolen female. Such a misfortune happened very lately to a peasant of Argyle, who assured a friend of ours that his wife had been carried off by the elves, and a green billet of wood left in her stead! Remedies there were for these troubles, spells to bring back the lost and loved; but at best they were of doubtful efficacy, and, when they failed, drew the bonds of thralldom more tightly than ever round the elfin captive. Infants were more easily recovered, probably because their sinless purity gave them somewhat of an advantage over the fallen spirits who had seized them. It was a popular belief that the elves, having chosen green for their own especial use, were highly offended at any one who presumed to wear that colour—an indignity which was sure to fix their malicious observation on the unlucky transgressor, and the first opportunity was embraced to avenge themselves for the insult. One cannot but remark the difference in temperament between the Highland and English elves. Shakspeare's fairies are gay, airy, harmless creatures, sporting in the moonbeams, and as ethereal and innocuous as the rays which lit their gambols. They had little power, and that little they exercised oftener to assist than to annoy. But the Celtic fairy was a being of more strength, more energy of purpose and depth of feeling. It could hate, and envy, and oppress with all the malignity of the worst of Cain's descendants. Shakspeare imbued his Mab and Titania with the graceful playfulness of his own fancy; the Gael clothed his "Daoine Shi" in all the savage ruggedness of a wilder nature.—'Book of Highland Minstrelsy.'

CURIOUS LAW CASE.—A curious cause was lately brought before the Court of Session. Two gentlemen had wagered one hundred guineas on a horse race. The loser paid a small part of the wager, but died soon after; the winner brought an action against the trustees of the deceased gentleman's heirs for the remainder of the money, who refused to pay it, alleging that no wager for more than 100 merks could be legally recovered. The Court determined, that the winner was only entitled to recover 100 merks, but that the loser, or his heir, was liable for the remainder of the money, which was confiscated for the use of the poor of the parish where he resided, and that an action was competent for the recovery thereof.—July, 1774.

THE SIEGE OF LOCHLEVEN CASTLE.

THE glorious victory of Bannockburn, which effectually laid the foundation of the liberties of Scotland, and the long and prosperous reign of Robert Bruce, of which that victory was the immediate cause, might very reasonably have induced the Scottish people of that eventful era to indulge in the hope that their country's independence was then established upon a basis which it would be impossible for the power of England, potent and gigantic as it was, ever again to disturb. But these hopes, if indulged in, were doomed to suffer a very speedy and humiliating disappointment; for the clouds which had so often and so long lowered over "puir auld Scotland," were again to discharge their tempests upon her devoted head, when the Ajax who had successfully defied them was mouldering in the dust.

The national troubles were renewed on the lamented demise of Bruce. Edward Baliol (son of the famous John Baliol, our vassal king) taking advantage of the death of the Regent Randolph—the infancy of the young king, David—and the distractions prevailing in the councils of the country, asserted his own right to the Scottish crown, and invaded Scotland. The battle of Dupplin, won by the basest treachery, placed him on the throne; and he was crowned at Soone on the 24th September, 1332. Various gallant attempts were made by the Brucean party to expel the usurper; but the decisive fight of Halidon Hill sealed for a time the fate of Scotland; and Baliol was upheld on the throne by the power of the English king, who was acknowledged as his Lord Paramount by the abject monarch, who fully inherited the crying soul of his father. The country was subjugated by the English arms; and all the places of strength which it possessed fell into Baliol's hands, save five, which are thus enumerated by Sir James Balfour:—"Dumbarton, kept by Sir Malcolm Fleming; Lochleun, kept by Sr Allane Vipont; Kildrumey, kept by Christianna Bruce; Vagart, by Sr Thomas Landore; Lochdin, or the Poicle, in East Lothian, kept by Johnne Lomax."* The most of these were important places of strength.

It is our present intention to offer to the reader

a short and cursory sketch of the famous siege of the Castle of Lochleven, as we find it narrated at the greatest length by that quaint old chronicler, Hollinshed—an event, the truth of which, it is but right to say, has been very much controverted by modern historians, and that too upon apparently very plausible grounds. However, we deem it foreign to our purpose to enter into any examination of the arguments used pro and con, believing as we do (a good deal on the faith of the old Scotch saying, that "there's aye water whaur the stirk's droon'd,") that the story of the siege could not have arisen from mere fable, though the poetic Prior of Lochleven does not even refer to it in his Oryginale Cronykyl.

Situated in the beautiful lake from which it derives its name, Lochleven Castle was capable of being rendered a place of great, if not impregnable strength. At the period referred to, it was garrisoned by a strong body of veteran soldiers, in the Brucean interest, under Sir Alan de Vipont, or Vypont, who seems to have divided his command with one James Lambie or L'Amey. Whether the latter was dignified with the honour of knighthood, cannot be precisely known, though Hollinshed calls them "two valiant captains." At all events this much is known, that they were both citizens of St Andrews, having been born and brought up there. The garrison of the castle were very active in harassing the partisans of Baliol in the adjacent country, so that their reduction was at length resolved on. In the words of Hollinshed:—"The Baliol being sore offended, that such castells as were kept by his enemies, were so great an impediment to his enterprises, by succouring and relieving his adversaries to make wars against him, he got together an armie, and the next yeare laid seige to the castell of Lochlevin; but perceiving that this castell might not be won without long seige, he appointed Sir John Striveling to continue the seige with a great power of men, until the castell were yielded. There were left also with him, Mickael Hariot, David Wemis, and Richard Malevill. [these three knights were Scots who had espoused the cause of Baliol, and very probably among the number of expatriated Scots who had followed Baliol in his invasion], with divers others. These captains advising the place and site of the castell, lodged themselves within the churchyard of St Serfe, beside Kingrossie, making bastiles and other defences within the same, for their more safeguard." St Serf, or Servanus, was the tutelary saint of Lochleven: the monastery bearing his name stood on the largest island in the loch. Sir Robert Sibbald, "Doctor of Medicine," in his "History, Ancient and Modern, of the Sheriffdoms of Fife and Kinross," (p. 108), says, "Little more than a mile south-east from the castle, in the samen lake, lieth St Serf's Isle, and not far from it another small isle, much haunted by water-fowls, which lay their eggs, and hatch their young there, called the Buttern's Bour. St Serf's Isle was of old called the Island of Loch-Levin, as appears by the Records of the Priory of St Andrews."

It was in the month of March, 1335, (during the season of Lent), that the operations of the English for the capture of the castle were commenced. They "assailed all the means that might be devised to have won this castell, but all was in vain. At length they devised a subtilt sleight whereby to compass their intent, on this wise: they went to dam up the mouth of the river where it issued out of the loch, with earth, trees, and stones, that the water being so kept in, might rise to such an height, that it would overflow the castell, and so drown all the people within it. And to cause the loch to swell more speedily, they turned the course of divers rivers and brookes in the countrie thereabouts, and brought them into the same loch." This "subtilt sleight" of damming up the mouth of the Leven, where it issued from the loch, is the principal bone of contention between modern historians—some affirming that so much water could not have been collected in the loch during the period of the siege. We will not enter upon this question. Hollinshed continues:—"It chanced at the same time that Sir John Striveling, captain of the seige, with a great part of the armie, went unto Dunfermling for devotion sake, to visit the shrine of St Margaret, sometime Queen of Scotland." The festival of St Margaret took place on the 19th June, 1335. "Whereof Alane Vepont, then captain of the castell, having understanding, about midnight prepared three botes, and taking certain soldiers with him, rowed forth to the head of the dam or water, and there, with his engines as he had devised for the purpose, assailed to bore through and make a hole in the bank or rampier that kept up the water, which when they had brought to pass, they returned quickly again to the castell. The water having once got an issue, within a while wore the hole so large, that entering with more violence, it finally broke down the bank, and rushed forth with such an huge stream, that it bare down all afore it, drowning up the bastils and tents of them that lay at seige there, and carried the same with men and all down into the deep sea, they were so suddenlie taken yer they could make any shift to escape."

Nor was this all the havoc made. Early in the morning, De Vipont left the castle, with the flower of the garrison, to attack the English camp at Kinross, and storm the fort which they had erected in the churchyard of St Serf. In illustration of the struggle which ensued, we beg to make the following extract from the Romance of

"Alan de Vipont," published in a small provincial periodical, now finished—"The Tales of Scotland"—

"The boats were manned; and the hoary abbot of St Servanus having blessed the warlike crews, they rowed off for the land, which yet lay hid in the writhing vapours of the morning, among which the quiet gale was gamboling. The daylight was now full, and the sun was coming. Nearer as the flotilla approached the shore of Kinross, the noise from the camp grew louder. At length the Scots heard the surly waves plashing on the shore.

"De Vipont and the Black Penitent gave a few hurried directions to the eager soldiers: fresh vigour seemed imparted to the muscular arms of the warlike oarsmen. Nearer and nearer they came—silent as the grave—cresting the billows with gleaming steel. The sun shot up over the Lomonds, red as blood; and with a tremendous huzzah, which resounded in lessening peals far and wide, the Scottish flotilla reached the shore, and ran aground.

"The Black Penitent sprung eagerly into the foamy tide; and the soldiers poured as eagerly after him, wading waist high and knee deep in the waves. Blood-red glistened the spears and helmets in the sun. The Scots speedily formed on the strand in one close column, at whose head De Vipont and his friends stationed themselves. The solitary banner, which they had brought from the castle, waved its heavy and emblazoned folds above them. The deep voice of the Penitent rose again in fiery exhortation—he waved his shield, with the Scottish lion, on high—his form of colossal proportions seemed to expand—"St Servanus for Lochleven!" reverberated along the shore, up which the patriots now advanced towards Kinross.

"The English camp was in perfect disorder: the guards had abandoned their posts—the cavalry horse were running loose through the wilderness of tents—and the men-at-arms were grouped here and there, some with weapons and some with none. The alarm of the Scots landing did not reach the infatuated Southrons until the gleam of their assailants' lances flashed across their sight. The Scots rushed on in a torrent—furious as an avalanche—resistless as the thunderbolt!—They penetrated into the camp, cutting down all who opposed them—resistance was in vain—scarcely any thought of resistance. 'St Servanus for Lochleven!' struck terror into every heart. The waving of the banner of Scotland blasted the Southron's sight—the shouts of the Black Penitent spread terror around. 'St Servanus for Lochleven!'—and the camp was in the hands of De Vipont's men!

"On—on in their bloody course rolled the Scottish phalanx—axes and lances gleaming like crimson now. Down went English horseman and helmeted knight. The archer had not time nor space to string his bow ere a Scottish brand was in his breast—the bill was stricken from the grasp of the footman: the Scottish axe was in his brain! 'St Servanus for Lochleven!' Hushed was the rallying word of 'St George for merry England!' Red-cross banners drooped and fell, and were daggled in blood. Some of the tents were set on fire, and the smoke spread over the scene, mingling with the mists which still obscured the morning air. Those who yet slept in that fated camp were doomed to sleep for ever! Death was at their pallets—destruction raged around them!

That terrible—that all-conquering phalanx rolled on in its furious track. On every hand were defeat and disaster. The English scattered like sheep on the approach of the wolf; only a few of their knights made a stand at intervals; but the slogan of 'St Servanus for Lochleven' was triumphant over all. Banner after banner, and pennon after pennon, sank, like tempest-riven trees, before that banner which displayed the silver cross of St Andrew. 'Servanus for Lochleven!' and the field is Scotland's!

"The fire spread among the tents as among the dry grass of an American Prairie. The glare of the forky flames reddened the very air with the glow of a furnace. The newly-raised levies in the camp abandoned their colours at the first blow, and fled; and the Scots there, who had espoused the cause of Baliol, staid not to measure swords with their patriotic countrymen, but saved their lives by a timely though dishonourable retreat. On—on rolled the conquering phalanx in the career of destruction. Truly the white-cross banner was as red that day as 'merry England's' token on an archer's breast."

The English were totally routed, and their fort fell into the hands of De Vipont. Hollinshed says:—"John Striveling hearing the mischief that had happened to his folks, returned to the seige, and made a vow never to depart from thence till he had taken the castell, and slain all them within it. But yet after he had lien there a long time, and saw it was not possible to win that fortress, he was constrained to raise his seige, and to go his ways, after he had lost thereat no small number of his people."

Such is the fullest account which can be given from our historians of the siege of this important stronghold. At another period we may recur to the history of the priory of St Serf.

LORDS LISLE.

In a former number, (page 191,) there is an evident misprint of Lord Leslie for Lord Lisle; indeed the mistake is evident from the foot-note. The following memoranda relative to the Lisle family, by old Robert Mylne, copied from one of the volumes of his MSS. in the library of the Faculty of Advocates, may be interesting:

"Lisle or Lyle, for the origine of the old Family let us look through the Register of Paisley, quher we find Radulfus de Insula, being early and contemporary with the Costentines and Pollocks, regno regis Willielmi. Then follows Wm. de Yle, and some names de Insula. Alanus de Insula, miles, is in anno 1246. Then Petrus, and after him Radulfus de Insula, Dominus de Duchal, in the reign of Alexander the Third. His successour is Robertus Dominus de Lyle, 1452."

In another portion of the same volume occurs this entry:

"Lyle, John Lord (whose armes was quarterlie 1 and 4, gules, a fret, or, 2d and 3d, azure, a bend, or, betuix sex cross-crosslets fitchie, argent,) married Jean, fourth daughter of William 1st Lord Setton. Robert, appeiring heir of Robert Lord Lyle married the second daughter of Archibald Earl of Angus, chancellor, and Elizabeth Boyd, sister of Thomas, Earl of Arran. The Lord Lyle was successor to How Danielston."

It is not easy to reconcile these notices of John and Robert with the account given by Wood, in his edition of Douglas, vol. II., p. 164, for Robert 2d Lord Lisle is there married first to the nameless daughter of John Master of Soton, and, secondly, to Lady Elizabeth Douglas, the only marriage recognised by Mylne.

The direct male line of the Lords Lyle terminated with John, who, on the 29th August, 1541, obtained, on his father's resignation, a crown charter of the lands of Lyle, in Renfrewshire, which were erected into a barony.

John's sister, Jean, married Montgomerie of Lainshaw, and, according to the ancient law of Scotland, the descendants of this marriage were entitled to the barony of Lyle. Accordingly, until the Montgomeries fell also into decay, they insisted on their right to the title, and used it accordingly. Lainshaw, however, the old family estate, passed from their hands, and is now possessed by the son of the modern purchaser, who made a fortune in trade, in the tobacco line it is said. Lord Mansfield's erroneous notions in regard to heirs-male, which he promulgated in the Caillies and Sutherland peerage claims, would now prove an impediment in the way of an heir female claiming; but the utter fallacy of his arguments could be proved beyond the possibility of doubt by a thorough search into the records, and by tracing the transmission of estates prior to the introduction of patents of titles of honour.

In the "Scots Compendium," London, 1756, it is stated that James Lord Lisle, of the Court of Justiciary, married Barbara, daughter of John Kennedy of Craig; that he voted at the election of Scottish peers in 1722, and died unmarried. A very odd assertion, truly, unless the writer intended to mean that he died unmarried by the previous demise of his wife.

THE SAXON AND THE GAEL.

We have never seen any good reason for believing that the Saxon and the Gael are descended of distinct races of people. Mankind are the creatures of education and circumstances; and these have, in all probability, produced every shade of difference now discernible between the inhabitants of all the nations of Europe. When we say education, we do not mean merely what is learned in schools. We hold the person to be but poorly educated who has not learned a great deal more from his oral than his literary education. We mean, by education, all that a person can learn, in or out of school, which is calculated to elevate men mentally and physically in the scale of being.

The word Gael has been preserved as the distinctive name of the first tide of emigrants from the east, by whom Europe was inhabited. The word means white. This name, then, which was given or adopted at a period too remote for our research, implies that, at that time, mankind were of different colours; and that one of these was white. This word was accordingly given or assumed as the name of the white in contradistinction to the coloured races of mankind; and certainly the Saxon, and every other family now to be found in Europe, appear to be the descendants of the Gael or white race.

Although we hold by the above opinion, namely, that all the varieties of white men are of one and the same race, (we regard the question, which has frequently been under public discussion of late, as to the cause of the difference in comparative wealth and poverty of the classes who inhabit the richer and poorer districts of Great Britain and Ireland, as extremely interesting; but we greatly doubt whether the conclusion at which the writers on the subject seem to have arrived—that it is to be ascribed to the inferiority of the Celtic race in mental and physical capacity—is borne out by the military or civil history of the races, even in those kingdoms.

The Saxons, where they are supposed to be of pure lineage, as in Holland, have generally been characterized as of phlegmatic temperaments, and heavy or unwieldy frames; and the Celtic race have uniformly been represented as of fiery temperaments and active frames. Yet, these writers ascribe to the Saxons all that is intellectually great and physically energetic; while to the Celts they ascribe all that is mentally feeble and physically indolent. We do not think these premises and conclusions reconcilable.

Cæsar describes the Gauls, who were Celts, as far advanced, beyond the Germans, (who are assumed to have been Saxons,) in civilization; and civilization is the result of the exercise of what is termed "the industrial virtues." Are not the industrial virtues acquirements? If so, may not the difference between the habits and circumstances of the inhabitants of the richer and poorer districts of Great Britain and Ireland, at this day, as well as the difference between those of the Gauls and Germans of the days of Cæsar, be accounted for separately altogether from any supposed difference in the mental and physical capacity of the German and Celtic races?

Is it not the fact, that the more nearly we find mankind (no matter of what race,) to their primitive and uncultivated state, the more are they characterized by apathy and indolence? Nay, is it not the fact, that, in the bosom of the most active seats of enterprise and industry, whole families are to be found whose deficient education, in the industrial virtues, stamps them with all the characteristics of indolence and apathy? Now, it will not be denied that the inhabitants of the more cold, sterile and inaccessible districts of all countries (by whatsoever race inhabited,) continue much longer in a primitive and uncultivated state than those of the more fertile, genial and accessible districts. The origin of wealth is in the abundance of nature. It is almost spontaneously produced in the more fertile, and can only be produced by extreme industry in the more sterile districts. Now, wealth is essential to, if not the parent of commercial and manufacturing industry. It creates artificial wants, and searches for and rewards the enterprise and industry whereby they may be supplied. A people living in a barren country, and who know no wants excepting those of nature—who are contented with milk and potatoes, brogues and hoddens—do not possess within themselves the means nor the stimulus necessary for the creation of commerce and manufacturing wealth and industry.

The Saxon and Celtic inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland (in addition to the great advantages the former had over the other, in the possession of rich and fertile plains, intersected with navigable rivers, bays and estuaries, whereby the wealth and commerce of the whole world was drawn among them,) have not set out on the career of commercial and manufacturing enterprise on equal terms. The Saxons of Great Britain and Ireland were, hereditarily, less or more, accustomed to servitude and commerce, at a period when the Celtic race possessed the soil of their native land, in common, and when the exercise of their industrial virtues was only necessary for the cultivation of their own lands and the domestic manufacture of their own produce for their own use. Their industrial virtues were, therefore, in those days equal to their wants; and they lived contented and happy. The acquisitiveness and injustice of the stranger changed the scene. He overturned the laws and institutions of their country, and made others, regardless of their wants, customs and habits; and without allowing them to have a say in the case. By these new laws the Celt was denuded of his right of property in the soil, which constituted his whole earthly possession, and reduced to the condition of a serf, to grinding and oppressive landlords, whose unjustly acquired wealth went to the employment and the enrichment of the Saxon, because his hereditary knowledge of commerce and servitude made him the more eligible and ready-handed to supply their artificial wants and luxuries. In short, the whole property of the Celtic inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland was confiscated to a class, for the employment and enrichment, in effect, of those of the people who had been, then, accustomed to servitude and commerce; and now the poor Celtic race, denuded of all they possessed, thinly scattered over a barren and rocky sea-coast, or among the isolated glens and mountains of broken and sterile wastes—depressed by poverty, and even deserted by the accustomed bounties of nature—are blamed for not having, in this state of transition, made the same progress in the arts and sciences of civilized life, as a people hereditarily initiated in servitude and commerce: and who, moreover, at the outset had virtually helped themselves to their lands—the foundation of the whole wealth of the country—to carry on their trade.

That the difference in the habits and circumstances of the inhabitants of the richer and poorer districts of Great Britain and Ireland cannot, with justice, be ascribed to anything inherent in the Celtic character, is proved by the fact; that there is no part of these kingdoms in which persons of undoubted Celtic lineage are not to be found, standing pre-eminently forward among the most distinguished individuals of the Saxon race, in every department of literature and the fine arts, as well as in all the sciences and inventions, or discoveries, which have resulted in their great mercantile and manufacturing prosperity.

Nor is the comparison of the emulation of individuals of the Saxons and Celts with one another less favourable to the latter than the emulation of towns and cities, if we take progress in commerce and manufactures as the criterion. Let us take, for example, the city of Glasgow. Now, we find that Glasgow, so recently as the year 1668, did not possess a single merchant who was a shipowner. Gibson, the father of her mercantile prosperity, made that year the first venture in foreign trade. He cured and exported to St Martin's, in France, 300 lasts of herring, containing six barrels, and received a barrel of brandy and a crown for each. Such was the extent of the foreign trade of Glasgow in 1668. Compare this with the foreign trade of Glasgow at the present time; and will it be found that she has loitered behind her neighbours in mercantile and manufacturing industry and enterprise? The statistics of Glasgow, and of many other towns and cities in Great Britain and Ireland, (whether Celtic or Saxon), show that great progress has been made by the country in mercantile and manufacturing enterprise within these two hundred years; and where is the writer who will venture to assert that that progress, in the towns and cities in which it has taken place, is to be ascribed, not to a change in the habits of the people, but to a change of the race by which they were, or are, inhabited? Are we to come to the conclusion that Glasgow, in 1668, was inhabited by a fiery race of Celts, and that she is now inhabited by a phlegmatic race of Dutchmen? The statistics of towns and cities afford no evidence in confirmation of the charge of indolence and apathy made against the Celtic race of Great Britain and Ireland; and the biography of eminent men does not show that the Celtic race has failed to furnish its due share of all that is intellectually great and physically energetic. But, perhaps, it is in their military qualities that these writers find the great superiority of the Saxon over the Celtic race? Let us take a glance at the question in a military point of view, then, and see how it stands; but, in order to clear it of all that might mislead the general reader, we must beg him to favour us with his attention to a short sketch, in reference to Wallace, and the history and military strength of the king-made nobility of his time.

North Britain, previous to the arrival of the Scots-Irish in the western parts of Argyleshire, was governed on the patriarchal cleachda of all the ancient Celtic nations. This system is defined by the great (though some times not immaculate) Chalmers, in his Caledonia, as affording to every tribe the privilege "of being each independent of the whole." By this cleachda, the power of the kings, chiefs and chieftains, who constituted the patriarchs, was so bound down as to have led Roman and other ancient writers into the supposition that clanships were pure democracies. They were not democracies; but they were probably as nearly so as was consistent with the purity and independence of the rulers of the people. The Scots, who ultimately succeeded to the supremacy, do not appear to have carried with them the patriarchal system (judging from their feuds and questions of succession among themselves) into the country; at least in its purity. We accordingly find that Malcolm Canmore, who appears to have been the first Scoto-Irish king that acquired any thing like an effectual dominion over the Picts, took immediate steps for the establishment of that system. The disruption consequent on this process, [see former articles on the subject], threw the greater portion of the country into the hands of new possessors. Hence, the Scottish nobility of the days of Wallace were, in every essential, a foreign nobility. They were foreigners in their lineage, language, titles, tenures, manners and customs. There were, thus, elements of the most irreconcilable enmity in existence between the people and the nobility of Scotland in the days of Wallace. Being, however, only the growth of the two previous centuries, fortunately for the people, the nobility were not in the possession of great military strength. Their following consisted of men-at-arms, as may be seen from their charters; and the men-at-arms of Scotland were never very formidable, and much less so at the above period. We accordingly find that Cumming, one of the oldest and most powerful among them, when he had to rely upon his own feudal friends and vassals, (for the clans were only willing and voluntary soldiers in defensive warfare,) as in his silly invasion of England, did not dare to encounter the hostility of the citizens even of Carlisle. When the stalwart burghers showed face, he abandoned his resentment against King Edward and fled. We also find, when the great Stewart, with Lennox "and other barons," joined the army at Stirling, that their strength consisted only of sixty men! Douglas, Lorn, &c., who were chiefs, and followed by the people of their respective clans, are not to be confounded with the nobility referred to. Neither should we allow our estimate of the power of the nobility of those days to be exaggerated by the vulgar error of supposing that the schiltrons, or divisions, which they commanded in battle, were formed of their own vassals. These schiltrons were composed of the clans, and officered by their chiefs and chieftains; but as their ruling passion—a jealousy of each other's supremacy—would not admit of one clan being commanded by the chief of another, when severals of them were formed together into a schiltron, or division, some neutral personage behoved to get the command. The king, or his representative in the field, therefore, usually appointed some nobleman, popular in the districts of the respective schiltrons, to command them in battle. We must not, therefore, allow our estimate of the military strength of the nobility of the days of Wallace to be magnified by the importance of the stations they occupied in the field of battle; or by the power to which, by the successful carrying out of the feudal organization, they afterwards attained. The power was only in its birth at that period; and we accordingly find that their assistance to the invader consisted chiefly of intrigues, whereby they divided or betrayed the patriots—as witness the battle of Falkirk.

The derivation of the name, as well as the genealogy of Wallace, is involved in obscurity; but its absence from bonds and charters, like those of other Celtic chiefs, and its identity, as originally spelled Walens, with that of the heroic Walenses of Clydesdale, of which district he was a native, furnishes, at least, ex facie evidence of his Celtic lineage. To be of the same lineage and language with the natives, would also seem elements absolutely necessary to popularity among a people so constituted as the Scots of the days of Wallace. Nay, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, even at so late a period as “the forty-five,” no small share of the enthusiasm in favour of “the Prince” may be ascribed to the zeal and address with which he assumed their national dress and arms, and cultivated their habits and their language. These were the means whereby he rooted himself in their hearts, and effectually awakened their ancient loyalty and fidelity to their old race of kings.

We also see that the tone of determined enmity in which Wallace is made to speak of his foes, has in it something far more bitter than could have arisen from the hostility of two warlike kingdoms. It implies hatred to the race much more distinctly than to the invader. Nor is the intense hostility of the Scottish nobility to Wallace satisfactorily explained when ascribed merely to their supposed pride of rank and birth. For Wallace was himself of knightly rank and family; and, therefore, even according to their own feudal distinctions, qualified to enter the lists against the best and noblest of their race or order. Neither is it to be understood that the nobility of that age—that is the king-made nobility—possessed that prestige which power and antiquity of family confer on their descendants. No doubt some of them were descended of the nobility of England; but these were only the offspring of the then recent conquest of that kingdom by the Normans. But, at any rate, the best and noblest of either the English or the Scottish nobility of that day, were not to be compared to the chiefs and chieftains of Scotland, in purity of blood, or antiquity of family. We must, therefore, look elsewhere than to their pride for the cause of the hatred and affected contempt entertained by the nobility against Wallace. May they not rather have arisen from his Celtic lineage and popularity with the people; who hated and repudiated their rank and tenures—and whom they, in return, both hated and feared?

When circumvented, or defeated on the plains, where the feudal nobility had some show of influence, and where they, some times, joined in order to thwart and betray him, we find that Wallace invariably retired beyond the Forth, among the glens and mountains occupied by the native Celtic race, and that he never failed to return thence with thousands of true hearts and strong arms, able and willing, as at the battle of Stirling, to pave his way to glory and to victory. These were the men with whom he thrice swept the invader from the land; and with whom his triumph had been completed, but for the persevering, and alas, ultimately, successful treachery of the nobility. These facts lead to the conclusion that Wallace and his followers found their mutual patriotism, and confidence in one another, cemented by the ties of language and of lineage—that they were equally the lineal descendants and true representatives of the illustrious tribes who, of old, repelled the Roman and Danish invaders of their country, in the same spirit in which they, their offspring, were then resolute to conquer or to die in the sacred cause of her liberty and independence. We have, therefore, reason to believe that the opponents of the English, in the days of Wallace, were the patriarchal clans of Scotland; the same race whom they long afterwards encountered at Prestonpans and Culloden. We shall now, therefore, proceed with a brief sketch of the more prominent arenas on which the Saxon and Celtic races have met each other in battle, beginning with the late war.

The Continental Saxons have frequently met the half-Celtic French in battle; and certainly did not show their superiority to them in mental and physical energy. During the late war, in particular, the Continental Saxons gained no laurels from the representatives of the ancient Gauls. It is not to their Saxon blood, therefore, that the English owe their military superiority over the French; but to the blood of their British mothers—otherwise why did not the Continental Saxons (who certainly must possess more Saxon blood than the English) beat the French? The descendants and representatives of the Celtic Gauls are, at this day, the greatest of all the Continental nations.

The last occasion on which the Celtic and the Saxon races of Great Britain met one another in warfare, was, as already mentioned, in the “forty-five,” and we certainly do not find that the Saxon manifested any superiority to the Celtic race, either physically or mentally, on that occasion. We must, therefore, proceed backward with our researches before we can find any evidence of the military superiority of the Saxon to the Gael.

It is true that the Saxon subjugated the Briton; but the Briton had become effeminate by several centuries of subjection to the Romans, before he achieved that triumph. Over the Scot and the Dane he failed to achieve any permanent superiority or advantage. On the contrary, his country was overrun repeatedly, and finally conquered by the Dane; and the Dane, the Saxon's conqueror, was as repeatedly defeated in battle, and driven by the Scot into the sea.

Nor was the superiority of the Saxon to the Celt manifested in the war of independence under Wallace and Bruce, although that war occurred after he had been again improved in his breed, and elevated in his military character, by an accession of blood from the half, if not wholly Celtic and warlike Norman. But, to show the difference between the Celt and Saxon, in their military qualities, it is only necessary to refer to the historical facts—that, by the loss of the single battle of Hastings, the Saxon was cowed and subjugated; whereas the Celt, instead of yielding on a single defeat, maintained a disastrous war of thirty years' duration, not only against a powerful foreign invader, but against the still more fatal treachery of the Anglo-Saxon, planted, by his own kings, in the bosom of his country, for the extinction of his rights and liberty.

Nor did these thirty years of ruinous warfare either cool his patriotism, or tame his courage. On the contrary, he faced the whole Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman power, not only of England, but of Ireland also, on the field of Bannockburn, and, with one Celt against three Saxons, overthrew them with a slaughter, to which that of Waterloo, (the Bannockburn of European warfare) is scarcely to be compared: and, with that crowning victory, he secured and consolidated the independence of his country. The military history of the Saxon and Celtic races, relatively to one another, does not, therefore, afford any evidence of the mental or physical superiority of the Saxon race.

We do not, and cannot see any reason for coming to the conclusion, that the Saxons and the Celts are descended of two distinct races. Every shade of difference between them, may—we would say, must—have been produced by education and circumstances. But be that as it may, so complete is the amalgamation of the two now, in Great Britain and Ireland, as to render it impossible to draw a line of demarcation between them. However, it is not either necessary or desirable to do so, and we may venture to predict that no honest patriot will ever attempt it. Indeed, we question if twenty families of British-born subjects can be found, who can trace themselves through six generations of an unmixed Saxon lineage.

SPIRITED REMONSTRANCE BY THE LORDS OF SESSION TO KING JAMES THE SIXTH.

Gibson of Durie was a Lord of Session, and his appointment to act, pro tempore, as King's Advocate in the action brought by the Earl of Mar to recover his ancient estate from the Elphinstones, who had possessed it for more than a century, very properly called for the interference of his brethren. Their remonstrance is spirited, though temperate, and their reasons unanswerable. The remonstrance was successful. The Earl of Mar was descended from a daughter of William Earl of Douglas, and James, who was jealous of any attempt to revive a claim to that earldom, successfully insisted on procuring from Mar a renunciation to all claim on his part. Lord Mar was successful in his cause against Lord Elphinstone, and the result was the impoverishment of the Elphinstone family, which never recovered the blow.

Most Sacred Soueraigne,

In the action moved be the Erll of Mar against the Lord Elphinstoun touching the lands of Kildrymmie, it hath pleased your maiestie, being informed of a reasonable cause, which may dishable your maiesties owne Aduocat to discharge his dewtie in that pleading, to substitute Sir Alexander Gibson of Durie, knight, one of our ordiner number, who, thogh in all humilitie and reverence, did offer him self most readie and will to embrace and obey, without exception, all your maiesties commandements, yet, finding this motion new and strange, proceeding rather from the instant suite of a partie, nor any other warrantable ground, did wish vs to tak the samyn to our consideration, and let your maiestie knowe our judgement and opinion thairanent; and when we fund it did in consequence touch the whole body, whereof we ar members, we could not weell refuse so reasonable a desire, bot rather wer vniformelie moved by the dissuasive reasons following, to represent to your maiesties royall wisdome, which is our best lead-star in doubtis of this kynde, the effects which may ensue, iff this haue any way, as it is now suited.

First, the eminent dignitie whervnto your maiesties princelie power hath promoved vs in this place, shall, by this meanes, be empared, for that hath ever heirtofoir privileged vs, from necessitie of vndergoing of any inferior function, bot specialle such a charge as this, which can not be dischargit bot at the arbitrimint, and be the disposing of the pairtie informer.

Nixt, as it is new and strange, so it is likewyse for the preparative, dangerous, considering how often the like caise may occur, at least the like cause be pretendit. For, iff it sall be arbitrarie to pairties, imploring the ordinarie ayde of iustice, to single out, vnder the like protence, any of our number, at thair pleasure, it will in end proue both a weakning of our body and strengthening of factions; and these had effects, which this course, by appearance, will produce, moues vs to rest assured that your maiestie, out of your royall caro, asweell of vs, as the weell of your subjects, will both foirsee and avert the danger of them, and will rather be gratuslie pleased to appoynt that choise of substitution out of the number of advocats, nor our number, and the rather in respect that number hath, often before this tyme, bene with good success the seminarie of this place, and the garden, whence these of whome your maiestie made choyse for that service, haue alwayes bene pluckt and taken.

This our opinion on the occasion forsaid, as it doth proceid from our loyall and harty affections, so we hope shalbe kyndlie taken by your maiesties fatherlie love, and we our selves be further directed by your maiesties royall wisdome and pleasure, to which, in all humilitie, conforming and submitting ourselves, and praying God for all Happiness and Prosperitie to your maiesties royall person and posteretie.

AULD DUNROD.

Certain premises regarding Dunrod, and a liberal conclusion, which certes none will dispute.

Auld Dunrod* was a gowstie carl,
As evir ye might see;
And gin he was nae a warlock wicht,
There was nane in the haill cuntrie.

2.

A prank, or cantrip. The instrument mentioned, and the consequences which flowed from his necromantic twistings.

Auld Dunrod stack in a pin—
(A bourtree pin)—in the wa,
And whan he wanted his neibour's milk,
He just gaed the pin a thraw.

3.

Farther on the same subject, and very much to the same purpose, with the extent of his warlockship—whether the milk came over the Firth in magic pipes or mortal boats is not stated. There seems no doubt as to the fact.

He milkit the Laird o' Kellie's † kye,
And a' the kye in Dunoon;
And auld Dunrod gat far mair milk
Than wad mak a gabbart soun.

4.

The wonderful effects of the Black Art in the multiplication of kebbocks—a not unsuitable simile to show their number; but says little for their colour, which seems to have been too black; peradventure they may have been painted.

The chaise he made war numerous,
And wonerous to descrye;
For thay kyth't as gin thay had bein grule,‡
Or pelts set up to dry.

5.

The neighbours flocked to Dunrod for advice. The henpecked are far more numerous than ignorant people are willing to believe, and therefore his clients or his patients were a great number.

And thair was nae cumerwald man about
Wha cam to him for skill,
That gif he didna do him gude,
He didna do him ill.

6.

The powers ecclesiastic, then too potent, got notice of Dunrod's doings, and began to deal with him accordingly. And the consequences of their overture.

But the session gat word o' Dunrod's tricks;
And thay teuk him in haun;

* Alexander Lindsay, Laird of Dunrod, sold the same, or the Ten Pund Land, to Sir Archibald Stewart of Blackhall, in 1619. Dunrod is in the Parish of Innerkip.

† An ancient family named Bannatyne were Lairds of Kellie, within the parish of Innerkip, till 1792.

‡ Grule, (u sounds like the French u)—a sort of peat. The moss was puddled among water and baked in the heat of the sun.

And thair was naething to do but auld Dunrod
Forsuith maun leive the laun.

7.

Dunrod taketh the earliest conveyance he had, and he quitteth his premises. And the sequel sheweth he did not return in a hurry.

Sae auld Dunrod he muntit his stick,
His brumestick muntit he;
And he flychter't twa three tymes about,
Syne throu the air did flee.

8.

A geographical, or rather topographical account of his passage upon his broomstick. A simile introduced.

And he flew by auld Greinock tour, §
And by the Newark haw, ||
Ye wadna kend him in his flicht,
Be a huddock or a craw.

9.

This stanza showeth the extent of his journey on this occasion, and the merry mood he was in.

And he flew to the Rest and be Thankfu Stane—
A merrie auld carl was he;
He stottit and siffer't as he had bein wud,
Or drucken wi' the barlie brie.

10.

Impediments not foreseen in his way, of which he was not cognizant. Hints as to botany or the knowledge of herbs.

But a rountree grew at the Stane—
It is thair unto this day,
And gin ye dinna find it still,
Set down that it's away.

11.

Showing the effects of ignorance and rashness. An accident befalls Dunrod consequent thereon.

And he neir wist o' the rountree
Till he cam dunt thairon;
His magic brumestick tint its spell,
And he daudit on the stone.

12.

A comparison between his head and a stone—given in favour of the former. Case, being upon doubtful authority, should be continued for judgment.

His heid was hard, and the Stane was sae,
And quhan they met ane anither,
It was hard to tell what wad be the weird
Of either the tane or the tither.

§ Mr George Crawford says, in 1710, there "above the town, on an eminence, stands the castle of Greenock, which overlooks it, surrounded with pleasant parks and enclosures, having on all sides a great deal of regular and beautiful planting, with spacious avenues and terraces." Sir John Schaw, the last of the distinguished race of the Lairds of Greenock, died in 1752, without male issue, and the estate fell into the hands of the Stewarts of Blackhall and Ardgowan, Baronets.

|| George Maxwell sold the castle and estates of Newark at the beginning of the last century. The chapel was within the castle, but the cemetery was in the midst of the village of Newark—an odd thing.

Effects of collision between two impenetrable substances; with a word of advice to people on a journey.

But the Stane was mullt lyke a lampat shell,
And sae was auld Dunrod;
When ye munt a brumestick to tak a slicht,
Ye had best tak anither road.

14.

The officious neighbours are rewarded as they ought to be in every case of impertinence. Dunrod and the said Stane ought to have settled the matter themselves.

The neibours gather't to see the sicht,
The Stane's remains they saw;
But as for auld Dunrod himsel,
He was carreit clain awa.

15.

A lamentation for a meikle stane, a thing quite uncalled for. It may safely be left out of the following editions. There is here, too, a very doubtful opinion as to the propriety of the hero of the poem not taking the air as he did. In all the circumstances of the case he was the better of doing so.

And monie noy't, as weill thay nicht,
The Rest and be thankfu Stane,
And ilk ane said it had been better far,
Gin Dunrod had staid at hame.

16.

The latter end of Dunrod is involved still in some uncertainty, which it is hoped future labours may resolve.

And what becam o' Auld Dunrod,
Was doutfu for to say;
Sum said he wasna thair ava,
But flew anither way.

NOTES FROM THE RECORDS

OF THE

OLD TOLBOOTH,

The "Heart of Mid-Lothian."

1674, June 25. Sir James Kirkaldy, younger of Grange, and ten others, by Privy Council.

— July 21. Mr John Law, an outed minister, by warrant signed "Atholl."

— July 21. Mr John King, an outed minister.

[From a passage in Robert Law's Memorials, (Edin. 1818, 4to.), it appears that Law was minister in Kirkaldy, and King, chaplain to Lord Cardross, both prisoners "for the crime of preaching."] — Sept. 12. Andrew Rutherford, for the murder of James Douglas, brother to Sir William Douglas of Cavers. Apprehended at New-castle.

1674, Sept. 14. Fourteen persons for "mutinie," from Stirling, on warrant signed "Mar, Wigtounne, Kincardine."

1679, Nov. 12. Mistress Christian Hamilton was this day relieved furth of ward, by being brought to the Croas of Edinburgh, and having her head severed from her body, for the slaughter committed by her upon the Lord Forrester.

[James Baillie, born 29th October, 1629, succeeded to the title of Forrester in 1654. The fair murderess was Lord Forrester's first wife's niece, and it is pretty plain that an improper connection existed between them—although she was a married person, being the wife of James Nimmo, shop-keeper in Edinburgh. She pleaded pregnancy in bar of her punishment, alleging that she was with child to his lordship. She escaped, on the 30th September, in men's apparel; but remaining, foolishly, at Fala-Mill, in place of crossing the border, she was retaken on the 1st of October, and beheaded on the 12th November. Fountainhall says "She was a woman of a godless life, and ordinarily carried a sword beneath her petticoats."]

1681, Jan. 26. The which day, Isobel Wilson and Marion Harvie "was set at liberty by being taken to the Grasmercat" and executed for disowning the King's authority; as also Elsa Morrison, Isabella Bell, her daughter, Jean Henderson, Helen Girdwood, and — Donaldson, all hanged the foresaid day, for murdering their children. [Seven women executed at one and the same time.]

— March 7. Margaret Tait, for murder of a child, by throwing it out of a window.

— March 11. Mary Lawson, and Mary Gordon, for child murder.

— March 11. Christopher Miller, William Green, and Robert Sangster, executed in the 'Grasmercat' for high treason.

— April 13. Margaret Tait, child-murder, executed.

[Fountainhall remarks, in noticing this execution—"They say she declared one of the main temptations which induced her to murder her child, was to show the ignominy of the Church Pillorie, which the Duke of York (James II.) hearing and informing himself of our custom; and that it was used in no other place of the Christian world, and it rather made scandals than buried them, and increased whoredom rather than brought the committers of it to any penitent sense of their sin, and that it was not used for drunkenness, sabbath-breaking, lying and other enormities; the Duke was displeased, and thought it would be a more efficacious restraint if the civil magistrate were to punish them either by a pecuniary mulct or corporal punishment."]

— April 13. David Cathcart of Glendusk liberated after being two years a prisoner, for being at Bothwell Bridge.

[Glendusk is in Ayrshire. Cathcart was seventy years of age at the time. He was connected with the Cathcarts of Carleton.]

1681, June 2. Eight schoolmasters, by warrant of the Lords of Secret Council.

— June 20. Anna Murray, for child-murder.

— June 23. Privy Council order Christian Cunningham and Elspeth Lookhart to be set at liberty, and who were imprisoned for "adhering to those called the Sweet Singers, they having renounced and abjured their principles."

[Fountainhall gives the following account of the "Sweet Singers"]—"The 21st of February, 1681, there were brought from Borrowstonnes, a company of distracted men and women, who called themselves Sweet Singers, or the only true saints, declared for Mr Donald Cargill's covenant, and had napkins dipped in the blood of Steuart and Potter, after-mentioned, and waving them in their prayers, crying for vengeance on the murderers, disowned the King and all Government, and followed a sailor called Gibb, who assumed the name of King Solomon. Their husbands, who were not of their opinion, they would not converse with. There were three of them hanged in the Grass-Mercat, 11th May, 1681, for disowning the King, and saying it was lawful to kill him and his Judges. Their names were Goyer, Miller, and Sangster, and when on the scaffold they were offered pardon by the Duke if they would but say God save the King. Some days befor several of their principall leaders had taken of the West Port the heads [&c.] of Stuart; and the Lords of Justiciary, to supply that want, ordered two of the above-condemned persons to have their heads cut off, and put in their place." The editor of Fountainhall's Notes adds, "The Sweet Singers adhered to no preacher, save their own leaders, Meiklejohn, Gibb the sailor, and one David Jamie. They burnt the Bible, and were guilty of the wildest blasphemies. When lodged in the jail with the other prisoners, they disturbed their devotions by their wild cries, until George Jackson, a Cameronian martyr, put a stop to that practice by beating Gibb severely. After which he used to sit howling behind the door, until their exercise was finished. He and Jamie were both banished to America, where Gibb came to be much admired by the poor blind Indians, for his familiar converse with the devil."]

— July 13. Andrew Pitilloch and Laurence Hay, executed for "denying authoritie."

[They were weavers from Kilconquhar, commonly called Kenneachar; and their crime was a denial of the King's authority, calling him a tyrant, and thinking it lawful to kill him.]

— July 27. That "Arch Traytor," Mr Donald Cargill, Mr James Boage, Mr Walter Smith, William Thomson, and William Cuthel, "all" executed at the Cross of Edinburgh, for "treasoun and denying his Majesty's authoritie."

[Cargill and his fellow-sufferers are well-known to the readers of "The Scots Worthies."]

— Aug. 2. William Riddell, late Provost of Rutherglen, confined for his accession to the rebellion of Bothwell Bridge, "in hounding out persons thereto and resetting them," being of great age, was relieved furth of ward of this date.

1681, Aug. 12. Eleven persons for Conventicles.

— Aug. 16. William Murray, Sheriff-Depute of Selkirk, "Resetting and Corresponding with Rebels." Liberated on finding caution to compare when called upon.

— Oct. 17. Patrick Forman, Robert Garnock, Alexander Russell, David Ferrier and James Stewart, all hanged at the Gallowlee, for "high treasoun and denying the King's authoritie."

[Garnock, at a meeting of the Council, made a fierce attack with his tongue upon General Dalziel, "calling him a Muscovia Bear, who used to roast men," whereupon the gallant commander struck him "with the pomel of his shable on his face till the blood sprung." Dalziel seems to have been a coarse minded man, and like all parvenues, (for his father was a gardener, who married the bastard daughter of Lord Bruce of Kinloss) arbitrary and tyrannical. The heads of "the martyrs" were placed upon prickns on the Pleasance Port, and Forman, who had a knife with this inscription on it, "This is to cut the throats of Tyrants," was sentenced to have his head cut off while alive, which seems to have been done. The bodies were stolen from under the gallows, and buried in the West Kirk.]

1682, Jan. 27. Anna Smith, for child-murder, and Christian Gale, for the like crime, from Aberdeen. Both confessed their guilt.

— March 29. Twenty-two persons for Conventicles.

— April 7. Major Learmonth, the Laird of Barscobe, Hugh Fleming, and Hugh M'Ilwraith. Sentenced to death for the rebellion of Pentland Hill and Bothwell Bridge.

[All well-known champions of the Covenant.]

— June 1. Seven Gypsies, from Dumfries, by warrant of his Royal Highness, (the Duke of York, afterwards James II.), dated at Edinburgh, 13th May, 1682.

— June 22. Charles Allan, for the Poor's money of Humble parish, by warrant from the Lord Bishop, signed "Lo. Edinburgh."

[To be continued.]

FLORENCE WILSON.

THE following letter of this accomplished Scotsman was written in 1531 or 1532. It is printed from the original in the Cottonian Library, which has partially suffered from fire. The lacunæ have been conjecturally filled up, so far as they could be; and as the only letter in the vernacular tongue by Florence Wilson, it deserves a place in this miscellany. Volusenus, or Wilson—or, as some say, Williamson—a Scotsman by birth, was author of a treatise of some celebrity, entitled "De Animi Tranquillitate Dialogus;" Lyons, 1543, 4to. He obtained, in 1535, the situation of teacher of the Greek and Latin languages in the Public School of Carpentras, a town of France, in the department of Vaucluse. When about to return to his native land, he was taken ill, and died at Vienne, in Dauphine, in 1547. He was born on the banks of the Loessie, in the neighbourhood of Elgin.

The work of Wilson, "De Animi Tranquillitate," was, as above mentioned, first published at Lyons, by the learned printer, Gryphius, a German, who settled there in 1528. There are three editions at Edinburgh in the last century; but an edition, very rare and little known, is that of Leyden, 1637, 8vo., a copy of which was in the library of the illustrious De Thou. The Dialogue is well written, but tedious, being one long-continued dialogue, in imitation of Plato.

In the dedication of the first edition of the "Emblems of Alcibiades, 1549, Wilson is described as "a man, besides his excellent manners and virtues, and the knowledge of the arts and sciences and all things good and worthy, having also the intelligence and faculty of Greek and Latin, and of the modern Scottish, (his own,) French, Italian and Spanish, all acquired by visiting those nations." This is addressed to James Earl of Arran, in Scotland, and Duke of Chatelherault, in France, Governor of Scotland.

MINUTES OF IRVINE PRESBYTERY.

FROM the excerpts now given, it would appear that his Satanic majesty had not been very fastidious in his amours; but, as we think it but fair play to give even the devil his due, we have added a case taken from the work formerly quoted, "Satan's Invisible World Discovered," which, emanating from no less a person than a Professor of Philosophy, will, no doubt, remove all scepticism on the subject, and, in which instance, the devil showed a better taste. In the same work there is a description given by some of the witnesses in a case of witchcraft, of the personal appearance of the devil. He is described as a dark man, dressed in black clothes, with a blue band, white handcuffs, and wearing hoggars—(stockings without feet)—and that he had cloven feet and no shoes. If, in place of hoggars, he had put on a pair of smart Wellingtons, he might have passed muster in decent society.

"22d April, 1650.—The Presbytery finding that the sin of witchcraft was growing daily, and that in the several parishes meikle of the hidden works of darkness was discovered and brought to light in the mercy of God, and that several were apprehended, and in firmance for that sin, did meet occasionally this day to hear and receive the confessions of some, of the said sin of witchcraft, that they might recommend the same to the Lords of Privy Council, for the issuing forth of a commission of assize to sit upon the said persons; and after hearing the Presbytery, do judge the confessions of the persons following relevant to be recommended:—Imprimis of Margaret Couper in Saltcoats, who was apprehended by the Bailie of Cuninghame, upon presumption of witchcraft and common bruit, who confessed the renunciation of her baptism, carnal copulation with the devil, and the taking of a new name from him. Item, the confession of Janet Robison in Monkcastle, of Sarah Erskine in Largs, of John Shedden there, of Margaret Montgomerie in Irvine, of Jean Hamilton, Marion Cuninghame, and Euphame Dickie, there, of Janet M'Kie in Dalry, Catherine Robison, Agnes Glen, and Bessie Ewing there, likewise of Violet Mudie in Kilbride, all which did confess before famous witnesses the renouncing of their baptism, copulation with the devil, taking of a new name from him, and several apparitions of the devil to them, and some of them by and attour, did confess. Further, the Presbytery being informed that there were several persons in Dalry, who, partly upon presumption, partly upon delation, and partly upon mala fama, were apprehended by the Judge Ordinar for witchcraft, who continued still impenitent, therefore it is appointed that Mr Patrick Colville, and Mr W. S. Russel, shall go to Dalry, and deal with the said persons for bringing of them to ane confession. Likewise the confession of Catherine Montgomerie in Saltcoats, who did confess, beside the renunciation of her baptism—the appearing of the devil—the taking of a new name from the devil—copulation with him and sundry malafices, and the alluring and drawing on of others to the devil's service, is found relevant and clear, and recommend it amongst the rest.

"The Bailie Depute of Cuninghame," (north district of Ayrshire,) "having represented to the Presbytery that sundry persons, who were suspected of witchcraft within the bounds of the Presbytery, were apprehended (contrary to the privilege of the bailiary) without a warrant from him, the foresaid representation being heard and examined by the Presbytery, they do judge it expedient that no person or persons suspect of witchcraft as said is, be apprehended and put in firmance by any person, without a warrant from the Bailie of Cuninghame or Depute; and in case any person be apprehended before a warrant can be obtained and had, that word be presently sent to the bailie thereof.

"The confessions of several persons in Largs, of the sin of witchcraft, being read and examined, are recommended to the Committee of Estates for issuing furth of a commission to put the said persons to ane assize, that so the land may be purged of that abominable sin."

"30th April, 1650.—Some of the brethren, viz. Mr James Ferguson, moderator, Mr Alex. Nisbet, Thom Bell, Mr James Rowat, Mr And. Hutchison, Mr Ralph Rodger, Mr Wm. Rodger, Mr Jas. Clandening, Mr Robt. Urie, and Thos. Guthrie, ruling elder, did convene to receive and examine the confession of Maal Montgomerie in Largs, Maal Small and Isobel Maillshead there. Sikelike of Margaret Isset in Kilwinning, who had confessed ilk ane of them their guiltiness of the sin of witchcraft; and after examination of the foresaid confessions, they are found relevant to be recommended for issuing furth of a commission to put them to ane assize."

"7th May, 1650.—Because there is to be ane execution of four persons upon Saturday next, at Irvine, for the sin of witchcraft, the Presbytery does appoint three ministers, viz., Mr James Ferguson, Mr Matthew Mowat, and Mr Andw. Hutchison, together with the minister of the place, to attend the execution the said day.

"Three ministers to go to Dalry, and deal with those persons apprehended for the sin of witchcraft and continuing impenitent, to bring them to a confession of their guilt, if it be possible.

"Isobel Allan in Kilwinning, being triplapee in fornication, compeared, and because she was under the suspicion of witchcraft, and withal great with child, &c., delay proceeding in the meantime.

"The confession of Geiles Buchanan in Ardrossan, and Janet Hill there, wherein was contained their acknowledgment of the abominable sin of witchcraft in renouncing their baptism, taking a new name from the devil, having carnal copulation with him, and being at diverse meetings with him, being read and examined, are judged clear to be presented to the Lords of Privy Council or Committee of Estates, for granting and giving a commission to put the said persons to ane assize."

"28th May, 1650.—The confession of Wm. Semple in Kilburnie, and Agnes Houston there, being apprehended by the Bailie Depute of Cuninghame, for the sin of witchcraft, and acknowledging the same before witnesses, being read and examined, are to be recommended to the Committee of Estates for the issuing furth of a commission to put the said persons to ane assize.

"Mr Wm. Guthrey, and the two ministers of Stewarton, are appointed to deal with some persons within the parish of Dreghorn, apprehended for the sin of witchcraft, both upon presumptions and delations, for bringing them to ane confession."

"16th June, 1650.—Having heard the confession of Jean Hamiltown, Isobel Hutchison, Marion Boyd, of Agnes Dunlop and Jean Swan, in Irvine, of witchcraft, how that they had renounced their baptism, taken a new name from the devil, and that the devil had copulation with them, &c., being read, are found to be clear, to be recommended to the Committee of Estates for a commission.

"James Robertson and his wife, indwellers in Irvine, apprehended to be cited before the Presbytery for writing a letter to Barbara Montgomerie, now apprehended for the sin of witchcraft, wherein they dissuade her from confession of that sin, and desiring her by any means to keep her tongue, and all the world will not get her life."

"2d July, 1650.—The confession of two persons in Irvine, having acknowledged their guiltiness of witchcraft, viz., Thomas Brown and Isobel Carse, likewise of ane Samuel Elves, an Englishman, who had been a common beggar this many years in the country, being read, are judged clear to be holden forth to the Committee of Estates for a commission to put them to ane assize."

"In 1697, a fast to be observed for various sins, among others the sin of witchcraft. Three people in Ardrossan, charged with using a charm to preserve their cattle from disease, declared they did it ignorantly, and professed their grief, are sharply rebuked, and ordered back to their session to be rebuked."

"19th July, 1698.—The Presbytery appoint Mr Pat. Warner, their commissioner, to attend with other ministers, meeting of Parliament for prosecution of the recommendations of General Assembly against popery and witchcraft."

This is the last instance in which witchcraft is mentioned. There are several cases where parties were brought before the Presbytery for consulting spawwies for the purpose of recovering stolen goods, the last instance was in the year 1735.

In the reign of James VI., it appears that persons accused of witchcraft were tortured by the thumbkins, and cords twisted round their heads to make them confess. There appears too much reason to suspect that this practice was continued.

EXCERPT FROM "SATAN'S INVISIBLE WORLD DISCOVERED."

Another Revelation, 34, is contained in a letter from Edinburgh, dated 8th Oct., 1684, addressed to Philosopher Sinclair:—

"The last case, which is more remarkable, shall be anent the wife of one Goodal, a cooper in the parish of Carron. This woman was about 32 or 33, a most beautiful and comely woman as was in the country about. She was often filed and delated"—(a very common fate of pretty women)—"by many who had been burnt. They told that amongst them all she was the person that the devil, at their meetings, did most court and embrace, calling her constantly my dear mistress, setting her always at his right hand, to the great discontent of the old hags, who, as they conceived, he now slighted, &c.

She was accordingly imprisoned and tried: but as she appeared to be the devil's favourite Sultana, they considered it necessary to have a strong guard to prevent him carrying her off; and this precaution seems to have been very necessary, as the devil made a bold attempt for that purpose, in which, however, he was defeated. During the skirmish she fell into a swoon, and on awakening she accused the devil of having betrayed and delated her—a very common complaint on the part of frail fair ones—stating that he had promised to carry her off to Ireland by four in the morning, and to call, in passing, on her sister at Paisley. She suffered like the rest, confessing the witchcraft and delating others.

ROMAN ANTIQUITIES IN NORTHUMBERLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE GATESHEAD OBSERVER.

Sir,—I was yesterday favoured by a copy of the Gateshead Observer of Saturday last, with a request that I would translate and give an account of some antiquities printed, in that newspaper, and lately discovered by Mr Richard Shanks of Broadgates, near Risingham, the modern name of Habitancum, the Roman station in which these antiquities were discovered. To this request I am glad to forward you an immediate answer, because it gives me an opportunity of thanking Mr Shanks for the kindness he has shown me about his researches, and for the zeal and energy he has employed for the last three years in investigating the extensive ruins of Risingham. About a year since I made in his garden drawings and minutes about all the altars, coins and curiosities he had then discovered in his station, of which in February last I gave an account in the Gentleman's Magazine and the Newcastle Courant. In April and June following, he favoured me with drawings and observations on the four Roman grave-stones then lately discovered by him in Risingham, and noticed in the Gateshead Observer of Saturday last: and of these, in his letters to me, he says they were all found within the great wall that surrounds the station, on a level to each other, their ends inwards, and the inscriptions on the under side. "Not a letter is defaced by the hand of time." Number I. was found at the north-east corner of the wall; numbers II. and III. about 20 feet further to the south; and all of them six inches thick, with the back side quite rough.

The inscriptions are in the following letters, all in capitals, and some words much abbreviated, but below translated in Latin and English at length. The figures, 1, 2, &c., show the beginning and number of each line.

I.—ID.M. 2SATRIVS 3HONORATVS 4VIXIT. AN 4NIS. V. ME5SIBVS. VIII.

Diis manibus. Satrius Honoratus vixit, annis quinque, mensibus octo.—To the Gods of the Shades below. Satrius Honoratus lived five years, eight months.—This tombstone is 38 inches by 22, and has the six lines of the inscription cut in capital letters on a writing tablet.

—II.ID.M.S. 2AVR. OVART3LA. VIX. AN 4NIS. XIII. MI. V. 5D.XXII. AVR. 6OVAR-TINVS 7POSVIT. FILI8AE. SVAE.

Diis manibus sacrum. Aurelia Ovartla vixit annis tredecim, mensibus quinque, diebus viginti duo—Aurelius Ovartinus posuit filia suæ. Sacred to the Gods of the Shades below. Aurelia Ovartla lived thirteen years, five months, twenty-two days. Aurelius Ovartinus set it to his daughter.—The stone is nearly three feet high, but its top and bottom are broken off.

Julius Victor sicut vixit annos quatuor. Julius Victor lived nearly four years.—This is on a stone two feet high, but broken at both ends.

Among the Romans, as at present, funereal monuments were very commonly raised out of the graves of one age, to be used as common stones for the walls and buildings of others.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
JOHN HODGSON.

THE ROBBER, KEMP.

WILLIAM KEMP was by birth a Dane. His parents dying when he was a mere boy, an uncle, who neglected him altogether, became his guardian. Allowed to do whatever he pleased, with no one to direct or advise him, he grew up a strong, athletic, youth—bold, headstrong, and passionate; nevertheless possessing a feeling heart, for whom the sea rose like mountains, wrecking some unfortunate ship on the rocky coast, he was the first to render assistance to the sufferers.

At the end of eight years his uncle died. He was then thrown upon the world a houseless wanderer. The sea at that time swarmed with innumerable pirate ships, and he soon found an opportunity of joining one of them, where his courage and bravery secured him the favour of the captain, as well as of the whole crew. Among such company his better qualities were soon corrupted, and in a short time he became one of the most blood-thirsty villains on board. Months rolled on, and his captain having been killed in an engagement, he was unanimously called upon to take the command. This he declined at the time, but ultimately agreed to; and after sailing the sea for many a day, striking terror into every ship that crossed his path, he sailed into the Frith of Forth—landed at Kirkcaldy, burned his ship, and betook himself, together with his band, to an almost inaccessible ravine in the immediate vicinity of Castle Campbell. Here he carried on his lawless pursuits without interruption. For miles round he kept the country in perpetual alarm, and the most powerful barons, instead of endeavouring to suppress him, were glad to court his favour by heavy bribes. Thus he lived, feared and respected by all. Vengeance, however, overtook the robber at last. A party of his men in disguise, headed by himself, entered Dunfermline, and succeeded in carrying off a great quantity of valuable plate, with other booty. The theft having been discovered, pursuit was given, and the chase lasted many hours. Driven to desperation, and seeing escape impossible, Kemp ordered his men to stand and fight for their lives, an order they did not hesitate to obey. The pursuers came up, and a desperate battle ensued, in which the whole of the robbers fell. Kemp, with his back to a tree, fought long and well. At last he was overpowered. His head was severed from his body, and stuck upon the point of a spear, while the headless trunk was thrown into the river Devon. The place, from this circumstance, has since retained the name of "Willie's Pool."

INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF PRINCE CHARLES-EDWARD STUART.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL.

Sir,—I am a reader of your "Journal," and often admire the ancient stories about "auld Scotia" that appear in its pages. I beg leave to enclose you an adventure, or incident in the life of Prince Charles-Edward Stuart, that occurred during his wanderings in the Highlands. The story was told to me lately by one of the descendants of the peasant in whose humble cot the circumstance took place, and who felt proud when recounting the story as it has been handed down from father to son. As I do not think it has ever appeared among the many anecdotes recorded of the Prince, I thought it might perhaps be worthy of a place in your really national "Journal." I therefore take the liberty of sending it to you, with every wish for the success of your periodical. I am, &c. W. S.

THE Prince, during his unhappy wanderings among the Highland wilds, was one day endeavouring to escape from a party of royal dragoons, who had obtained information of the place of his concealment, and were now in hot pursuit of him and a small band of his followers. He had so far succeeded in his attempt as to be able, unseen, to enter one of the wild rocky glens by which he was surrounded, where, the better to aid his escape, he dispersed all his followers, save one or two trusty Highlanders, who were determined rather to die than leave him. They rested for a short time among the crevices of the rocks, but, fearful of being discovered, they again sought their way to a more secure retreat. In doing so they were espied by the royal troops, who were making desperate efforts to overtake them. The rugged road, however, favoured their escape; but, a party of foot soldiers, who had been sent in aid of the dragoons, coming in sight, the Prince found it necessary to command the few men that were with him to leave him, and trust for protection from another source. Agreeing to meet at a certain rendezvous, after it became dark, they dispersed in different directions, at the same time hovering round the Prince, who was not far ahead of his pursuers. A turn of the glen, which fortunately hid the royal wanderer from the view of his pursuers, brought him to a peasant's cot. Here he sought a hiding place; but there was none. The peasant was not without an expedient, however. Dressing the Prince in female attire, he gave him the cradle, in which the infant was asleep, to rock, and a stocking to darn. Anxiously waiting the result, they saw the soldier searching among the rocks near the cottage. At length they came to the house, and laying hold of the peasant, ordered him to deliver up the Prince, as they were sure he had concealed him. He told them they might search. They did so, even laughing and joking with Grannie, as they imagined, while the Prince sat earnestly at his assumed vocation. Failing in their object, they left the house to proceed farther on in their search. The Chevalier was again safe, and the noble peasant received the thanks of the unfortunate Prince. But the generous deed did not terminate here; for, when all was dark in the glen, he lod him safely to the appointed rendezvous, where hope again cheered the little band.

CLEVELAND.

THE History of Cleveland, like that of almost every spot upon our island, is replete with events that have more than a local interest. The neighbourhood abounds in relics of the British and Roman eras. Thus at Danby they are thickly scattered. "Trenches, camps, forts, houses, British habitations, may be met with in almost every ridge, moor, hill-side, and projecting headland of this romantic region. The ridge which terminates at Castleton, and that which separates Glaisdale from Egton Grange, have been strongly fortified by the ancient Britons. A strong trench between the upper part of Danby Dale and Little Fryup is also unquestionably British. A cluster of British camps, three in number, have been discovered in Little Fryup, a mile south of Danby Castle, each 200 feet square, and calculated for mutual defence, and to resist any attack from the sea in that quarter. Three clusters of pits have also been discovered on the moor between Danby Beacon and Waupley. These differ from others already described, being arranged in parallel lines, instead of the zig-zag form; and the earth, instead of being heaped up as a parapet, has been removed to form a wall, outside the lines, enclosing the pits within, so as to conceal them from view. Each range consists of fourteen pits, the breadth of the whole 50 feet. About 100 paces S.E., another small cluster commences; and 150 paces to the western edge of the valley are two other ranges still more extensive—the one consisting of fifteen pits, the other of thirty-four pits. In the spaces between are Druidical remains; and a tall Druidical pillar, called Longstone, stands northward. Southward are three large houses or tumuli, each 70 feet in diameter and 100 feet asunder. Three large houses, of the crater form, stand near Castleton, close to the Gisborough-road; and the heights are studded with them. From one elevated point we counted at least fifty of these ancient British and Danish sepulchres: none of which, that we heard of, have ever been explored. This seems to indicate that when the low fertile grounds were overrun by their rapacious invaders, the Britons retreated to the heights and fastnesses, where they withdrew their cattle, formed their dwellings, raised fortifications, died or perished amongst the hills, and were interred beneath these sepulchral mounds amidst the desert heath."

Among the most curious of these relics, and which have given rise to much controversy, are the crosses, thus described by the author:—"Crosses were erected by the Danes as memorials of battles, and not unfrequently placed on the graves of distinguished warriors. In Angushshire, in Scotland, above the grave of one of their bravest generals (slain by the valiant Keith), 'there was a high stone erected, which carries the name of Camus' Cross. And about ten miles distant from this, at Aberlemno, is another cross, erected upon some of the Danes killed there. Both of these have some antique pictures and letters upon them.' The name 'Stump's Cross,' near Gisborough, has perhaps been derived from a similar circumstance. A tradition (familiar to every one in Gisborough) has brought down to us the story of a bloody battle on this spot, probably during the furious dynasty of the Danes; and here one of the soldiers is said to have fought with incredible valour after his legs were hewn off—literally on his stumps—wherefore "Stump's Cross." I did conceive at one time that this tradition might refer to the contest between the royalists and the rebels mentioned at p. 63; but, on further consideration, I am inclined to fix the site of the latter battle elsewhere, viz. "Wars' Fields" (so called to this day), now in the occupation of Mr Charles Simmonds. A cannon-ball, found in this field, is in the possession of Mr Simmonds; and on examining the field, the antiquarian will discover abundance of proof, in the raised mounds, trenches, and irregular disposition of the ground, of its having been strongly fortified, and the scene of some fierce and desperate encounter. The tradition of Stump's Cross, must, therefore, go back to a remoter period. The only other cross we need mention, may be seen on the road near Hutton Low Cross, fronting the green lane leading to Kempley, where the Chaloner property joins a small slip belonging to the Crown. All that now remains is the broken shaft and socket; but the sacred symbol has long since been demolished, probably by the same rude fanatic bands before whose brutal rage so many rare and venerable antiquities have disappeared."

The traditions of the country are numerous, and many are here collected. One of the most amusing is the following:—"Tradition affirms that in days of yore his Satanic majesty, with a sporting company of favourite imps, was accustomed, like the stout Percy of Northumberland,

His pleasure in the 'Kildale' woods
Three summer days to take.

A worthy named Stephen Howe, incensed at his highness for poaching on his manor, had the effrontery to boast, on one occasion, that if he again caught him hunting without license, he would not only discharge him from his liberty, but chastise him for his insolence. Hearing of this, Satan, whose courage has never been impeached, seated in a magnificent car, drawn by six coal-black steeds, drove down boldly, at his next visit, to Stephen Howe's small cot, on the brink of Court Moor. 'Hah, hah!' shouted Lucifer, 'I have found you at last!' Upon which poor Stephen took to his heels, being mightily afraid. Not so his wife, Nanny Howe, who being reputed a famous witch, did not fear even the devil himself, and boldly saluted him with her broom, which caused him to scratch his head with his claws. Soon rallying, with a powerful switch of his tail, he capsized poor Nanny, who was thus compelled to own the superior skill and agility of her antagonist. 'Ah!' quoth the devil, 'you have both grievously offended me; one of you at least must accompany me,—see, I have brought you a carriage and horses: say which of you will go.' 'I, I,' said Nanny; and shouldering her broom leaped into the coach without waiting further invitation, and away they drove in gallant style. Midway up the hill the devil, who felt thirsty, alighted, and at one draught drank dry the church well, which formerly supplied the holy water for baptism. We were further informed, that, during the last century, a certain youth, who, like Tam O'Shanter, had been 'getting fou' and 'unco happy,' in crossing the wild heaths and moorlands above Kildale, actually beheld Nanny riding on her broomstick over the "Devil's Court." The fright occasioned by this incident induced the youth to become a zealous teetotaler. Nanny Howe is still sometimes to be seen gaily frolicking through the air at the awful hour of midnight.

Another is scarcely less wild. "About the year 1200. Kirklevington was given by Adam de Brus to Henry de Percy, in marriage with his daughter Isabel, on condition (such was the polite chivalry of that age) that 'the said Henry and his heirs should repair to Skelton every Christmas day, and lead the lady of that castle from her chamber to the chapel to mass, and from thence to her chamber again, and after dining with her, to depart.'"

Subterraneous passages are invariably associated with the popular stories about old castles. At Skelton Castle this sort of mystery was supposed to have been largely enjoyed. "Every child yet believes in the story of the subterraneous passage running from the Priory to Plantation-field in Toccotes. Midway in this dismal pathway is an enormous chest of gold, guarded by a raven or crow, who keeps incessant watch over the precious contents. Once only was the treasure invaded, by a person who hoped to appropriate some of the ingots; but when he had reached the box, its guardian, the raven, suddenly became transformed into his Satanic majesty, who belaboured the intruder with such terrible severity, and otherwise excited such a dreadful fright, that neither he nor any other person ever ventured within the precincts afterwards. Be this as it may, a subterraneous passage unquestionably existed, commencing in the ancient part of the ruin, now occupied as a wine-vault: but the mason who discovered it, Thomas Winter, was ordered by the late Mr Chaloner again to close it up. The use and object of such a passage, we must, of course, leave to conjecture. Doubtless it might reveal many histories of sorrow and guilt, of outrage and licentiousness, which were best hid in the silence and oblivion of the past."

These extracts are sufficient to excite the interest of all who are acquainted with the locality. To others the volume scarcely addresses itself.—Notice of "The History of Cleveland," in 'The Critic.'

Varieties.

CARRONADES.—This species of great gun, so much used in the last war and the present on board of ship, is usually accounted a modern invention, and takes its name from the Carron foundry where they are made. We find, however, in the Patent-Office a notice, September, 1727, "That his majesty was pleased to grant to Henry Brown, Esq., a patent for the sole use and benefit of his new invention of making cannon and great guns, both in iron and brass, which will be much shorter and lighter, and with less powder will carry farther than those of equal bore now in use, which it is said will save great expense to the public."

OXFORD.—The following is among the MSS. of Anthony Wood, as a specimen of the logic and learning which prevailed at Oxford in the beginning of the fourteenth century. "In king Edward II's time, as I remember (says my author), at which time the university of Oxford, was much addicted to the learning of those, who by some were called Nominals, for that they were strict in examining the nature and signification of every word, Merton College being seated upon the walls, and the master and fellows of the house being desirous to walk in the meadows that lay close to the walls, thought good to send three of their company to the king, then at Woodstock. There, being admitted into his presence, one of them signified to his majesty, that they were sent by the college, to demand 'Licentiam faciendi ostium,' 'a licence or liberty to make a door.' The second, presently interrupting him said, 'that he was mistaken, for that liberty to make a door was not a satisfaction to them, for so they might have a licence, and yet the door never made; and therefore his desire was, to have 'ostium fieri,' 'a door to be made.' Whereunto the third replied, they were both mistaken, for so it might still be 'in fieri; but his petition was to have 'ostium factum,' 'a door made.' Whereunto the first replied again, that they were not so unmannerly as to desire a 'door made,' for that was to demand the king to make them a door; and he therefore desired they might have leave 'posse ostium fieri,' 'to have it in their power to make a door.' But the second again opposing him, and the third opposing the second, and the king growing weary, his majesty answered them, 'that though he understood their request, he would not give them satisfaction till they should agree 'in modo loquendi.'"

GARDENING.—The following fact is curious in the history of gardening. In the time of Charlemagne, this prince possessed an orchard in Paris, which was then considered as a very rare luxury. It contained 'sorb,' or service trees, filberts, chestnuts, plums, pears and apples. The rarity of these fruits is shewn by a bishop in 606 sending from Tours, as an acceptable present, some chestnuts and crabs to his mother and sisters, who were at Poitiers. The orchard of Charles V. in Paris, the site of the present botanic garden, is also cited as a remarkable circumstance. It contained cherry, pear, and apple trees. Afterwards, under Francis I., Olivier de Terres, by his excellent writings, and the Cardinal of Bellay, Bishop of Mans, by his personal exertions increased the orchards; and the friend and correspondent of the latter, the physician Belon, who travelled into Syria, Egypt, and Persia, sent seeds and grafts from those countries, which were distributed through Maine, Anjou and Touraine, and succeeded there so well, that these provinces have long been, and still are, considered as the gardens of France. Under Lewis XIV. the taste for symmetric gardens, introduced by Laquintinie, caused the preference to be given to espaliers instead of orchards, though these latter still are much attended to in some of the finest provinces in the centre of France.

VALUABLE COWS.—Mr Morrice has at Craig eight capital milk cows (one of them gives eighteen pints with froth), from which he makes 100 stones of cheese in the season, which sells for 12s. per stone, besides supplying the family with milk, butter, &c. An acre of his pasture feeds a cow.—Memorandum-Book, July 22, 1805.

THE LINDSAYS OF DUNROD.

THERE is a melancholy pleasure in contemplating the few traces of the public transactions, the joys, amusements, the virtues and the vices of an ancient, by-gone family, to be found in a stray leaf of local history. The Lindsays of Dunrod, in the county of Renfrew, were an old and powerful clan. In the parish of Innerkip, between the village of that name and Greenock, were to be seen "the embellishments" of two Castles of Dunrod. One of the fortalices disappeared between 1619 and 1650;* the other existed in 1710, but had been demolished before 1782.† The Old Place of Dunrod is laid down in the map of the Greenock Railway, 1837.

Dunrod may be derived from the Gaelic dun, a hill, or fortified hill; and roid, a fragrant shrub, called gaul, or sweet sauch, or bog-myrtle, which delights in wet soil, and grows in marshes not subject to the plough. The botanists invented a name for it, myrica gale. The modern improvements of husbandry have banished this delightful plant, in Renfrewshire, to a few obscure places, such as "the Back o' the Warl," in Innerkip parish, and Auchinbothie, in Kilmalcolm parish.

The following Barons, or Lairds of Dunrod, are recorded in scarce books and manuscripts:

I. The progenitor of this family was Sir James Lindsay, the constant companion of King Robert the Bruce; which James Lindsay was a younger son of Alexander Lindsay of Crawford.

The "Bruce repaired to Dumfries, where Comyn happened at that time to reside. Bruce requested an interview with him in the Convent of the Minorites. There they met before the great altar. Bruce passionately reproached Comyn for his treachery. 'You lie,' cried Comyn. Bruce stabbed him instantly. Hastening out of the sanctuary, he called "To horse." His attendants, Lindsay and Kirkpatrick, perceiving him look pale, and in extreme agitation, anxiously inquired how it was with him? 'Ill,' replied Bruce, 'I doubt I have slain Comyn.' 'You doubt!' cried Kirkpatrick; and rushing into the church, fixed his dagger in Comyn's heart. (10th February, 1305-6.)

II. John Lindsay, Laird of Dunrod, his successor, obtained from King Robert II. the barony of Kilbryde, and the lands of Kittochsyde, Thortoun, &c., extending to "ane hundred merk land," in Clydesdale, for his good and faithful services, in the year 1382.†

III. John de Lindsay de Dunrod, about 1362, was a witness to a charter granted by Robert Earl of Strathern to Stephen of the lands of Porterfield. Witnesses, John Stewart, Lord Kyle (afterwards King Robert III., alias John Fernyeir), Dominus Joannes Stewart de Darnlie, Jo. de Lindsay de Dunrod, Thomas Sympill and Goselinus de Cochran.‡

IV. John Lindissay ye Lard of Dürod was ordanit by the Parliament at Strivelin, 12 Jan. 1467, "to take ye Inquisicions Imprimis in ye Sherefdom of Lanerk."§

V. Alexander Lindissay, 4th August, 1473, "persewit befor the Lords Auditors, Richard of Bannohtine of Corhouss, and got a Decreit against him that he sall pay to himself (Dunrod) samekle as he may prufe he is seathin in his matris and costis and expenss, in defalt of entre of said Richard to the landis of Allirstokis."||

Alexander Lindsay of Dunrod, 5th June, 1478, "persewit aganis Thomas Braidwod, Johnne Braidwod, Andro Kennedy and Roule, anent the wrangwis withhalding of vii. c. of mele of fermes of the landis of the Toftis pertenynng to sd. Alexander."¶

The Lords of Council, 9th March, 1490, "decrettis that Johnne Maxwell of Caldairwood, knyght, and Alexander Lindsay of Dunrod, sall pay to Coline Erle of Ergile, chancellare of Scotland, 100 merks aucht to him."

Robert third Lord Lyle and his Lady, Mariot Lindsay, a daughter of the house of Dunrod, had charters of the lands of the Scheills of Kilbryde, and of Buchan, 18th September, 1497.‡

VI. David Lindsay of Dunrod married Isobel, daughter of Sir Alexander Elphinstoun of that Ilk, afterwards first Lord Elphinstoun, created in 1509. This Isobel Elphinstoun was secondly married to Sir Robert Maxwell of Calderwood.§

John Cochran of that Ilk, married Mary, daughter of Lindsay of Dunrod. He died in 1558.‖

VII. John Lindsay of Dunrod married Marian, daughter of Sir Robert Douglas of Lochleven, ancestor of the Earls of Mortoun. Sir Robert succeeded in 1513.¶

Douglas styles Lindsay "of Dowhill;" but Wood probably discovered the mistake.

John Brisbane of Bishoptoun occurs in 1523 and 1532. He was slain at the battle of Pinkiecleuch in 1547. His wife's name was Elisabeth Lindsay. She may have been of this family.

The Laird of Dunrod was said to have married a daughter of William Lord Semple.††

Gabriel Sympill of Craigbait, younger son of Lord Sympill and Margaret Lindsay, his wife, had a charter of confirmation granted by Queen Mary, 25th February, 1550, of the fyve pund land of Craigbait within the paroch of Kilbarchan. She may also have been of this house.‡‡

VIII. Robert Lindsay of Dunrod was at the Parliament, and signed the declaration of 17th August, 1560, "approving as hailsome and sound doctrine, groundit vpon the infallible trewth of Godis word.§§

Robert Lindsay of Dunrod, in 1562, baillie to the Priory of Blantyre. His fie was 13 merks yearly.‖‖

Robert of Dunrod was elected, in the year 1562, Provost of Glasgow. "He was a great and opulent Baron in the neighbourhood, and generally such were chosen that could best protect the inhabitants, and the privileges of the city, from the insults of other great men, who were now and then attempting to make encroachments upon the city's privileges."*

Dunrod consented to sign the Maurent of Robert the great Lord Sympill, in 1572, before his death, with other thirty-five noblemen and gentlemen, who obliged themselves to defend Robert the future Lord Sympill, a boy, the great Lord's oe, to assist him with their bodies and goods.†

James Wallace of Johnstoun married Margaret Lindsay, daughter of the Laird of Dunrod, about 1580, or thereby.‡

John of Dunrod, of the family of Dunrod, married Isobel Schaw, daughter of the Laird of Greenock, about 1590 or 1630.§

IX. Sir John Lindsay of Dunrod, before 1602, as the following notice :

X. Alexander, son of Sir John Lindsay of Dunrod, Knight, had a retour, 27th April, 1602, in the ten pund land of Dunrod, with the advowson of the chapel of the same.‖

There was a remission to Alexander Lindsay of Dunrod, for adultery with Marjorie, daughter of Patrick Hamilton, formerly of Kincaird, in Linlithgowshire, in 1609.¶

"Deame Jeane Hamilton, Lady Dunrod," is mentioned in a testamentary document in 1610.

Not long after this a transaction occurred, rather uncommon and stirring, from the creed and exile of the other party, namely, Hew Sempill of Craigbait, a Roman Catholic and Jesuit, and possibly a kinsman of Dunrod, from Craigbait's grandmother, Margaret Lindsay, who may have been a daughter of the house of Dunrod. A remarkable person, Mr John Ogilvie, a Jesuit, from the College of Grats, was apprehended in Glasgow, in 1614, and tried for being a professed Jesuit, and a traveller from the Pope, stirring up Scots subjects to rebellion against King James VI. During the trial he had an extraordinary courage, bigotry and firmness. Among other things, he, in his defence, said, "Where I am said to be an enemy to the King's authority, I know no authority he has, but what he received from his predecessors, who acknowledged the Pope's jurisdiction. If the King will be to me as his predecessors were to mine, I will obey and acknowledge him for my king; but if he do otherwise, and play the runagate from God, as he and you all do, I will not acknowledge him more than this old hat." Upon this he pulled off his hat, and twirled it in the air. At last, doom was pronounced; and he was hanged in the public streets of Glasgow.

The said Hew Sempill of Craigbait "resortit to Craighaitt fled for his life from the port of Irving, 27th August, 1614, and lived afterwards in Spain safely. He borrowed, 24th July, 1614, at Rutherglen, 800 pundis from Alexander Lindsay of Dunrode, over his fyve pund land of Craighaitt. He "barrowit fra Dunrode 570 merk," 7th July, 1614, at Kilbryde-Maines.†

Hew Sempill of Craighaitt, of the Jesuit College at Madrid, acquired considerable reputation by his critical disquisitions, and by his mathematical works. One of his books was published at Antwerp in 1635.‡

The laird was in difficulties, as appears, about 1618 and 1619. There was a paper drawn up, displaying the properties of the barony of Dunrod, as an advertisement, for sale. The ten pund land was divided into 20 maillings, and it had 37 tenants, rentallers, pofflers and cottars, who paid mails to the laird. This is a highly curious list of his tenants, their possessions, their rents, silver, corn, vittall, beir, maut, meill, salt-butter, cheise, fousls, creills of peits, herring, rouch-wedders;§ turses of hay, daily service, and riding for service. The conclusion is as follows:—"This by the place and yairdis, wt. woddis;|| wt.in ye grund abundans of lymestaine and friestaine; in ye widdis|| all kynd of temmir vsuall in yis cuntrie; ye miller takes na milstanes farther yane ye mill floir or ye mill geawell.¶ Upone ye north syde ane commonty of my awin, on ye sowthe syd lyis ye common commontie;†† wt.in Dunrod is abundans of gud mos and trufe, qlk. wt.in werie few years will not be gattin for silver.‡‡ Ye place is twa towirs and forteine housis, by§§ ye

This laird sold the barony of Dunrod, in 1619, to Sir Archibald Stewart of Blackhall and Ardgowan.

There is a notice in Spotswood's Practicks, 20th March, 1628, namely, "In a general Declarator of the Laird of Dunrod's Escheat and Liferent, compeared one Wallace, and alleged no Process at the Pursuer's Instance till he were paid of the debt owing by the Rebel to him, because the Horning upon which the Gift flowed was at his Instance.

"It was found that this Alledgiance could not stop the General Declarator; but the Donator being once constitut Debitor by the General Declarator, then the Creditor would have good Action against him."||

XI. A representative of this family had the title of Dunrod about 1640.¶¶ He sold the "hundred pund land of Kilbryde, including the Castles of Kilbryde-Maines and Corcebasket, about 1640.

The ancient Castle of Basket, the age of which is not known, was the jointure-house of the family of the Mains.

It is reported, says the Rev. David Ure, that the last Baron—the "Auld Dunrod" of the ballad—greatly exceeded all his forbears in haughtiness, oppression, debauchery, and every kind of wickedness. He seldom went from home, unless attended with a retinue of twelve vassals, well mounted on white steeds.

There was a cultivation of hemp at Innerkip about 1619, with a considerable profit.

But the expense of home grown, perhaps, may, at the present day, be greater than imported hemp. Mr Boaz, in his General Report of Scotland (in 1813), says, 'the hemp employed is almost all imported, either from Russia, or from America.

§§ Besides.

Among the instances of his cruelty, it is told that, when playing at the curling, he ordered a hole to be made in the ice, and one of his tenants, who had by chance offended him in a jest, or in sport, to be drowned. The place has been since called "Crawfurd's Hole," from the name of the sufferer.

Shortly after that brutality, it is reported that his pride was brought very low. This haughty chieftain was at length obliged to beg alms from his former tenants and domestics. We have reason to believe they would not give a very kind welcome to so unfeeling and overbearing a tyrant. It is said that, having worn out the remains of a wretched life, he perished in a barn of one of his former farmers. Such was the miserable end of one of the greatest and most opulent families, of the rank of the true Lairds, the crown vassals, or the Barons, in this part of the country.*

We may be allowed to add to Mr Ure's statement, that "auld Dunrod," in his indigent days, feigned to be a warlock, and made a league with some reputed witches among his former cottars at Innerkip. He and his accomplices levied a sort of black mail from skippers and fishers. They pretended to have the power of warding off all witchcraft and malefices of the allies of Satan, from the sea-craft of the simple and credulous owners, by their mystical blue clue, for a valuable consideration, in the shape of "white sillar."

According to the "Greenock Visitor," Marie Lamond, in the judicial trial of the Innerkip witches, in 1662, confessed and deposed, that fyve yeares since, Katrein Seot, in Murdistaine, learnt hir to tak kyeis milk, bidding hir goe out in mistie mornings, and tak with hir a hairie tedder, and draw it over the mouth of a mug, saying in God's name, God send us milk, God send it, and meikle of it:—Be thae wayes she and the said Katrein gat muckle of thair neibours milk, and made butter and cheise thairof: That the deill nipt her upon the richt syd, qik. was vera painfull for a tym, but thairefter he straitit it with his hand and healed it:—That she was at a meiting at the Brig-Lin, &c., wher the Deill was with thaim, in the likeness of a brown dog; and the end of thair meiting was to raise stormie wather, tharby to hinder boits from the killing fish:—That she knew sum witches carreit meikle ill-will at Blackhall, younger, and Mr John Hamiltoun, and wad fain give thaim an ill-cast gif thay could:—That Jean King, Kaitie Scot, Janet Holm, herself, and sundrie others, met togidder, in the mirk, at the Buchtgait of Ardgowand, whar the Devill was with thaim, in the lykeness of a black man, with cloven feet, and directit thaim to fetch whyt sand fra the shore, and cast it about the yetts of Ardgowand, and about the minister's hous; but God wad not give thame libertie to get any evill done:—That shee and severall others went out to the sea, betwix and the land of Arran, to doe skaith to boits and ships that sould come alongs; they gart the storme to wax greitlie; and forgathering of Colin Campbell's ship, thay rave the saills fra hir:—That she was at a meiting at Kempock, wher thay designit to caet

the lang sten into the sea, tharby to destroy a whein boats and ships:—And that the Deill for ordinar, in the shape of a black man, sang to thame; he gave thame wyn to drink, and wheat bread to eat; whon thay dancit thay war all vera merrie; and he kist thame, ane and all, when thay skailit."*

The following rhyme, picked up from some "auld spaewife," was published in the "Paisley Magazine:—"

In Auldkirk the witches ryde thick,
And in Dunrod thay dwell?
The graitest loon among thaim aw
Is auld Dunrod himsell.

KING JAMES VI. ON WITCHCRAFT.

On the return of King James the Sixth from Denmark, with the second daughter of Frederick the Second as his bride elect, in the year 1590, such was the imbecility of the government of Scotland, that the people neither respected the laws nor the civilities of social life; and although domestic feuds were frequently attended with open murder or private assassination, yet the perpetrators of these atrocities went unpunished, and even occasionally appeared at court, marked with distinction in place of infamy.

But, while real crimes were allowed to pass unheeded, imaginary ones were sought out with inquisitorial activity, and punished with rigorous severity. The king was a firm believer in the supernatural agency of witches and sorcerers, whose supposed power to inflict incurable diseases by secret incantations, became to his mind an object of dread. Several persons, of both sexes, some of them even moving in a respectable sphere of society, were apprehended, tortured into a confession, and executed, on the ridiculous charges of having been present at midnight as-semblies, where the devil presided in person: of raising storms at sea, and "witching folks to death," &c.

But it was not in the Council only that the king propagated and enforced his opinions; for, so that the public mind might be enlightened on the subject, and thoroughly imbued with the royal belief, his majesty wrote a treatise on "Dæmonologie," extending to forty-five folio pages, in the preface of which he states that "the fearefull abounding at this time in this countrey, of these detestable slaues of the Diuel, the witches or enchaunters, hath moued mee to dispatch in post this following Treatise of mine, not in any wise, as I protest, to serue for a shew of my learning and ingine, but only moued of conscience, to preasse thereby, so farre as I can, to resolute the doubting hearts of many, both that such assaults of Satan are most certainly practised, and that the instruments thereof merit most seuerely to be punished: against the damnable opinions of two principally in our age, whereof the one called Scot, an Englishman, is not ashamed in publicke Print to deny, that there can be such a thing as witchcraft."

Having thus given his reason for writing the treatise, the royal author proceeds with a rapid sketch of the contents of the work, stating, amongst other things, that it is divided into three books, the first, "Magic in General," and "Necromancie in Speciall;" the second, "Sorcerie and Witchcraft;" and the third, "A Discourse of all these kinds of Spirits and Spectres;" that he cannot "touch every particular thing of the Diuel's power," "but only to speake scholastickley on genus, leaving species and differentia comprehended therein;" that his information is derived from the works of several German writers, Bodinus Dæmonomancie, Hyperius, Hemmingius, Cornelius Agrippa and Wierus, "together with their confessions that have been at this time apprehended." The mention of these German authorities would give some countenance to the idea, that it had been while the king was storm-steed on the Continent, when he went for his bride, that he had imbibed so thoroughly the ridiculous notions which he develops in this treatise, and which lighted the fires of the cruel and barbarous witch persecution which disgraced his reign. The treatise is written in form of a dialogue, and opens with a very learned disquisition on "Saul's Pythonisse," and other passages of Scripture, viz: 1st Cor., ii. 14; 1st Kings, xxii.; Exodus, xxii., and Exodus, vii. 2; 1st Samuel, xv.; Acts, viii.; and Acts, xvi., "to prove that there can be such a thing as witchcraft and witches," and that "their sinne is a sin against the Holy Ghost." After tracing the art of magic back to the Chaldees, and explaining the difference between it and witchcraft to consist in this, that the witches are the servants only and slaues of the diuel; but the Necromancers are his masters and commanders, he comes to speak of the "Diuels rudiments," and "entres-sets to the arte of magic."

We shall now see of what this "sinne against the Holy Ghost" consisted. We are gravely informed that in general the rudiments are "all that which is vulgarly called the vertue of word, herbe, and stone, charmes, freits, and other extraordinary actions, which cannot abide the trew touch of natural reason, and in particular such charmes as daft wiues use for healing of forespoken goods, for preserving them from euill eyes, by knitting roun trees or sundry herbes to the haire or tails of the goods; by curing the worm; by stemming of blood, by healing horsecrooks, by turning of the riddle, by staying married folke, by knitting so many knots upon a point at the time of their marriage, and doing such innumerable things by words, without applying anything meete to the part offended, as the Mediciners do."

But having got through the rudiments, we come next to deal with the "foul thief" in propria persona, who, it appears, allowed his votaries to conjure him up when they required his aid. This, however, was so "difficile and perillous" that they generally came to a plain contract with him, "wherein was specially contained formes and effects written with the blood of the conjuror." The "formes" have reference to the manner of raising him, and the shapes in which he obliges himself to come when they call; sometimes in the likeness of a cat, dog, ape, or other beast, or else to answer by a voice only. The effects "are to answer such demands as concerne curing of diseases," &c., or sometimes "to enter into a dead body, and to give out answers on matters concerning the state, the event of battles, and other great questions;" to some he will even be "a continuall attender and page," and to others "he will permit himself to be conjured for the space of so many yeeres in a tablet or a ring, which they may easily carry about with them."—But, even to "give the diuel his due," it appears that his work was not all mischief, for in those days when the schoolmaster was abroad, he would "oblige himselfe to teach them the artes and sciences, which he may easily do, so learned a knaue as he is." He also, in those days, performed the part of an electric telegraph, for he would "carry them news from any part of the world, which the agilitie of a spirit may easily performe"—"reueale secretes"—make them "creepe in credite with princes"—and please them by carrying them "dainty dishes in short space fra the farthest part of the world, for no one doubts but he is a thief; and also learns them tricks at cards and dice, and such like, to deceive men's senses thereby;" not that he gets any credit for all these services, for it is "only secundum quid and ex pacto allanerlie, whereby he obliges himselfe in some trifles to them, that he may on the other part obtaine the fruition of their body and soul, which is the only thing he hunts for," has done since the fall, and will do till the latter day, in "wandering through the world as God's hangman to execute such turnes as hee employes him in; and when not employed in that, returne he must to his prison in hell."

But, many of our readers will be anxious to know "the difficile and perillous" operation of conjuration, whereby his sooty majesty might be brought up to a tete a tete. The Scottish Solomon says, "There are four principal parts in the conjuration, the persons, the actors, the words and the rites, and the spirits conjured;" and also two other things that cannot be wanted, "holy water, and some living thing to present to him." There are, likewise, "certaine seasons, days and hours, that must be observed in this purpose; these being all ready, circles are made triangular, quadrangular, round, double, or single, according to the form of the apparition that they crave, with innumerable characters and crosses within and without, and out-through." But after the conjured spirit appears, which will not be "while after many circumstances, long prayers, and much muttering and murmuring, if they have missed one iote of all their rites, or if any of their feet but slyde over the circle, through terror of his fearfull apparition, he at once pays himself of that due debt which they ought him, and otherwise would have delayed longer; I mean, he carries them with him, body and soul."

Having thus disposed of the "Necromancers," our author turns to his own particular branch of the art, namely, witchcraft. As before noticed, it appears that witches were only the servants and slaves of the "Roarand Lyon," and therefore his manner of introducing himself to them is different from that which we have been considering as his tactics with the necromancers. And it farther appears that he assailed "none except he first find an entresse ready for him, either by the great ignorance of the person he deales with, joined with an euil life, or else by their carelessness and contempt of God," and of this class, either "those who are rich and desire revengo," or "those who are poor and melancholy." These he tries first to drive to despair, and at a proper time, when they are either "walking solitarie in the fieldes, or lying panning in bed," he appears to them in "the likeness of a man," and promises them a suddaine and certaine remedie," if they will but follow his advise, the first part of which is "that they renounce their God and Baptisme directly," and then "he gives them his marke upon some secrete place of their bodie, which remains soare unhealed," but it nevertheless "remaineth eur after insensible, howsoever it may be nipped or pricked by any, to give them a prooff thereby, that as in that doing he could hurt and heal them, so all their ill and well doing thereafter must depend on him;" and as they are but as yet "newe Prentises," they might wish to retract their "horrible promise," and "skunner at the same." At their third meeting he makes a show to "performe his promises, by teaching them, by vile and unlawful means, how they may be revenged, or get gain, as the case may be."

The compact being thus fairly formed, they are next informed of the general place of meeting, and as the "Diuel," we are told, is "God's ape," so "he counterfeits in his seruants this seruice and forme of adoration that God prescribed and made his seruants to practise," "so he makes them conueene in great numbers;" and "further, witches oft times confesse not only his conueening in the Church with them, but his occupying the Pulpit. Yea, their forme of adoration to be the kissing of his hinder parts; which, though it seem ridiculous, yet may it likewise be trow, seeing we read that in Calicute he appeared in forme of a goat-bucke, and had publickely that unhonest homage done unto him by every one of the People:" after this, we think few will deny that, to give him "his due," his title of "foul-thief" is at least just and well earned! But a word or two on their manner of "conueening," and the natural philosophy of flying in the air, so that all knotty points may be unloosed, and the way to belief made clear. In our boyish days it has often excited our wonder how the "withered hags" could so easily accomplish that feat, and it really did seem to us a very pleasant part of the art to skim the blue ether, and sweep through the clouds like the swift goshawk, even although they had but a broomstick for their Pegasus. However, hear the Scottish Solomon elucidate the mystery. One way of "conueening" is "that which is natural, riding, going or sailing, at what houre their master aduertises them, and this way may be easily beleueed; another way is somewhat more strange, and yet it is possible to be trow, which is by being carried by the force of the spirit, which is their conductor, either above the earth or sea, swiftly to the place where they are to meete, which I am perswaded to bee likewise possible, in respect that as Habakkuk was carried by the angel in that form to the den where Daniel lay;" another was by "a mighty wind, being but a naturall meteoore to transport, from one place to another, a solid body, as is daily seen in practise; but in this violent manner they cannot be caried but a short bounds, agreeing with the space that they may retain their breath, for if it were longer their breath could not remain unextinguished, as, by example, if one fall from an high rocke his breath will be forcibly banished from his body before he can win to the earth. In this transporting, they say themselves that they are inuisible to any other, which may also be possible, in my opinion; for if the deuill may forme what kinde of impressions he pleases in the aire, why may he not farre easilier thicken and obscure, so the aire that is next about them by contracting it strait together that the beams of any other man's eyes cannot pierce thorow the same to see them." So far for their journeying at home; but when they take a foreign trip, they leave their bodies lying at home "in an extasie, their spirits being vanished therefrom and caried to such places." However, the convention met, and adoration such as we have noticed past, the next part of the business is that "cury one of them propones to him what wicked turn they would have done, and, as it is to doe euill, he teaches them the means whereby thay may doe the same;" such as how to "joynt dead corpses, and to make powders thairof, mixing such things amongst them as he gives them, to make pictures of wax or clay, that by the roasting thereof the persons they bear the name of may be continually melted and dried away by continual sickness: to some he gives stones and powders whereby they may cure or cast on diseases; or teacheth all kinds of vncouth poysons, which the mediciners vnderstand not;" and also to make men and women to loue or hate each other, raise stormes and tempests in the aire, either on sea or land, to make folkes become phronticque or maniacque," to "make spirits haunt houses, affray the inhabitants," and to "follow and trouble persons," and likewise to "make some to be possessed with spirits, and so to become very Deamoniacques."—Sad catalogue of crimes this! The good people of those days must have lived under a "reign of terror" which is now a-days difficult to conceive.

Into his third book, containing the discourse on all kinds of spirits, we cannot follow our royal author, many of their pranks with dead bodies not being fit for the pages of a public journal. There is another secret, however, which we must put our readers in possession of before we close. It has often occurred to us as being unaccountable, how his black majesty happened to be so fond of the softer sex. Nothing was a mystery to our learned author, and this little matter he disposes of in a few words. Thus we have "the cause that there are twenty women given to that craft, for one man." "The reason," he says, "is easie, for as that sexe is frailer than man is, so is it easier intrapped in these grosse snares of the diuell, as was ouer-well proued to be trew by the serpent's deciding of Eua at the beginning, which makes him the homelier with that sexe sensine!" We shall only just glance now at the last chapter, which treats of the "tryall and punishments of witches." We have already seen that witchcraft was accounted the sin against the Holy Ghost, and therefore unpardonable; and now he tells us that "they ought to be put to death according to the law of God, the ciuill and imperiall law, and municipal law of all Christian nations;" and that if the magistrate spared them, it "would be doubtlesse no less sinne in that magistrate nor it was in Saul's sparing Agag;" and that they ought to be put to death "by fyre:" and neither "sexe, aage, nor rancke exempted, for it is the highest point of Idolatry, wherein no exception is admitted by the lawe of God."

In our day, one is apt to wonder that such nonsense as we have been detailing should have gained such an ascendancy, from the peasant to the monarch, in the most learned and gifted minds in Scotland in that age; but from this treatise, every statement of which, however gross or ridiculous, is staunchly "nailed with scripture," the whole secret of the matter appears to have been, that witchcraft was made a religion, or rather the religion of the time in question; for those very few who had the god sense and hardihood to avow their disbelief in it, were termed infidels, who taught "damnable opinions," maintainers of the "old errours of the Sadducees, in denying of Spirits," and one Wierus, a German physician, was accused of witchcraft himself, because he wrote against the persecution of witches. The religious sentiments are the noblest elements in the nature of man—the medium by which he can in some measure assimilate his mind to the mind of God—rise as it were from earth to heaven and hold converse with his Creator; but as the proper direction of the religious sentiments is the greatest blessing that man can enjoy, so their misdirection has in all ages been his greatest curse. When we find, therefore, that they were deeply interested and fully involved in the question, and that consequently the witch persecution was in reality a religious persecution, we are quite prepared for tales of blood and suffering, the most horrible and revolting, and can recognise in them the work of the same demon that lighted the fires of Smithfield, perpetrated the massacre of St Bartholomew, and consigned our own martyrs and covenanters to the dungeon, the rack and the flames!—all the fearful and fatal results of the religious sentiments misdirected—gross and terrible ignorance endeavouring, by deeds of legal murder, to do God a service!

THE LORDS OF PRIVY COUNCIL TO KING JAMES VI.

ROBERT BRUCE, a well-known name to those versant in Scottish ecclesiastical history, incurred the enmity of James VI. for his uncompromising independence. The following letter, descriptive of his infirmities, possesses deep interest. It is printed from the Balfour MSS. belonging to the Faculty of Advocates. As Bruce was born in 1554, he must at the time have been about sixty-eight years of age. It is to be hoped that the application of the Privy Council was successful. Bruce died 15th Aug. 1631.

Most Sacred Souerane,

Thair wes this day a petition gevin to youre maiesteis counsaill, be Maister Robert Bruce, humelie craving some ease and releiff in that directioun, and charge gevin to him for his confyneing within the burgh of Inuernes, in respect of the indispositioun and inhabilitie of his persone, and of his grit aige and infirmiteis, quhilkis are incident to aige, quhairwith, as he alledgeis, he is so far worne, and become so feeble and waik, as hardlie may he travell ony quhair; and he offeris to be confynned in his awne house, and twa myllis aboute the same, and never to transcend the boundis thairof, without youre maiesteis warrand, as more particularlie youre maiestie will persave, be his petition, whilk we haif heirwith send vnto youre maiestie. Bot becaus the directioun and warrand for his confyneing in Inuernes, proceidit frome youre maiestie, we wald not presume to medle thairwith, without youre maiesteis allowance. Onlie this far, we ar to shoue vnto youre maiestie, that, be the sight we had of him these twa dayis he wes broght befor the counsell, we knowe him to be a far decayed and worne man, not able, by probable coniectour and appeirance, to live lang; and we ar credibillie informed that his worldlie estate is verie waik, althocht he hes concealed the same in his petition, and that he hes nane of his awne to tak the charge thairof; swa that his confyneing so far from his awne house, and frome attendance on his awne affairs, will altogidder vndoe him. We write not this as ane motiue and argument to pleade for fauour vnto him, bot onlie to latt youre maiestie knowe quhat we apprehend anent the dispositioun of his persone, and quhat we heir anent his worldlie estate and fortunis. Remitting the consideratioun, bothe of the one and the other, to youre maiesteis most pious, graue, and princelie resolutioun, whilk your maiestie wilbe pleased to caus be returnit vnto ws, quhen the importance of your maiesteis more weyghtie affairs may afford the occasioun. And so, with oure vncessant prayeris vnto God for

OF THE

OLD TOLBOOTH,

The "Heart of Mid-Lothian."

1682, July 19. William Murrie, executed for murder.

— July 21. Andrew Walker, executed for murder of his gude-brother.

— August 3. Richard Storie, for murder, brought from Dumfries tolbooth, his friends on the Border having threatened to rescue him.

— August 16. James Douglas, beheaded at the Cross, for the murder of ——— Lindsay, † son to the Laird of Eveloch.

[Fountainhall observes that Douglas was the son of Mr William Douglas, "the advocate and poet." He was under nineteen, and was troubled with hypocondria and melancholy.]

— Oct. 5. John Leper, from Hamilton, for murder.

— Oct. 21. Six gypsies sent to New York.

— Nov. 2. John Buij, for murder.

— Dec. 15. William Cochrane, John Finlay, and James Robertson, hanged for treason.

— Dec. 29. Alexander Home, portioner in Home, hanged for treason.

1683, May 4. John Wilson, writer in Lanark, sentenced to death for treason.

— May 4. Robert Teviotdale, for a murder committed in Leith. Sentenced to death by the magistrates of Edinburgh.

— May 4. David McMillan, sentenced to death for treason.

— May 4. Andrew Gullane, one of the Archbishop's murderers.

— July 21. Twenty-one persons, by Court of Justiciary, for treason.

— July 26. Twenty-three persons on same charge.

— July 31. Eleven persons on same charge.

— Aug. 2. Seventeen persons on same charge.

[Seventy-two individuals committed to prison

† His step-brother.

in the course of ten days! When we recollect the limited accommodation in the Old Tolbooth, the sufferings of these unfortunate people must have been very grievous.]

1683, Nov. 1. Baillie of Jerviswood, and ten others, brought from London on a charge of treason.

— Nov. 23. Alexander Gordon of Earlstoun, ordered to be kept by himself; was to be put to the torture, but appeared mad.

[When brought to the Privy Council Chambers to be tortured, he commenced roaring like a bull, and struck about him with such violence, that not even the hangman would lay hands on him. He then fell into a swoon, and asserted that the bloody Dalziel and Drummond were to head the fanatic party, and that Duke Hamilton was on the same side. The Council became evidently alarmed at this, for had he confessed under torture, this might have bothered those in power very seriously. It was judged more prudent to treat him as a madman; and by this ingenious device he escaped torture.]

1684, Jan. 18. Sir William Scott of Harden, warded for nonpayment to his Majesty's Cash-keeper of 10,125 pounds Scots, as the fourth part of his valued rent, for keeping three house Conventicles; and the sum of 36,000 pounds, as the sixteenth part of his valued rent, for his lady's constant withdrawing from her paroch kirk.

[The Author of Waverley refers to this in one of his Introductory Chapters in the "Tales of My Landlord," wherein he says, "That some of his ancestors had suffered in purse and person in the cause of the Covenanters."—(Vol. ix.) The Scottish game of curling is incidentally mentioned by Lord Fountainhall, in his "Decisions," in the notice of this case: "A party of the forces having been sent out to apprehend Sir William Scott of Harden; one William Scott of Langhope getting notice of their coming, went and acquainted Harden with it, as he was playing at the curling with Riddell of Haining and others."]

— March 10. John Nicolson and Margaret —, for "bigamie and adulterie."

— May 9. Margaret Burnet, hanged for poisoning Catharine Hannie.

— June 5. Act of Privy Council, allowing the "gude town" to transport all "the idle vacabonds, whoors and thieves," who may be in the Gaol or Correction-house, for the well and ease of the place, and their more virtuous living in time coming.

— July 11. Robert Elder, for the murder of Finlay More MacFindlay.

— July 14. Daniel Ferguson, burning a wheat stack.

— Aug. 14. Act of Privy Council, allowing Lady Graden to be kept a closs prisoner with Baillie of Jerviswood.

— Aug. 18. Act of Privy Council, allowing Lady Jerviswood to visit her husband, but not to speak to him.

— Oct. 27. Privy Council, allowing the spouse of Mr William Carstairs to be kept close prisoner with her husband.

[Carstairs was afterwards chaplain of William the Third, and one of his chief advisers.]

1684, Sept. 10. Act of Privy Council, withdrawing liberty for the ladies to be with Jerviswood.

— Sept. 13. Sir John Dalrymple, advocate, open prisoner. Dame Elizabeth Dundas, his lady, and maid-servant to stay with him.

— Oct. 15. Eight parish ministers entered ward, conform to their obligations given at the Circuit.

— Nov. 13. Thirteen gentlemen from the west ward.

— Nov. 24. John Semple "that was put in the Thumbikins," by the Council, executed of this date.

[This was an instrument applied to the thumbs in such a way as to enable the executioner to squeeze them violently; and this was done frequently, with so much force as to bruise the thumb bones, and swell the arm of the sufferer up to his shoulders. A picture of the Thumbikins, used in torturing Carstairs, occurs in the Scots Magazine for August 1817, p. 7. They were fastened to the table with a screw. The thumbs are placed between two small iron bars; the upper bar was then screwed down by the executioner, and every turn of the screw inflicted the most excruciating torture on the sufferer.]

1685, Jan. 29. Janet Wallace, child murder, confessed.

— Mar. 5. Sir William Scott, of Harden, by warrant of Privy Council. Warrant signed "Perth."

— May 11. Christain Gardner, for adultery and child murder.

— May 20. Thirty-seven persons from Burntisland warded on a verbal order from Lord Balcarras, and the laird of Gosford.

1685, June 20. Lady Sophia Lindsay, by order of the Privy Council, to be kept close prisoner with her maid, but to have the best room.

[Sister of Colin, third Earl of Balcarras, she married a son of the Earl of Argyll, and assisted her father-in-law to escape from the Castle of Edinburgh in 1680, in the disguise of a page holding up her train.]

— June 26. James Webster and John Urquhart, merchants in Aberdeen, for the murder of Alexander Simpson there.

— June 30. Mr Robert Black, for keeping a "disorderlie schoole" in Edinburgh.

June 30. John Reid, skipper in Leith, for murder.

— July 3. Sir John Cochrane,* his son, and David Dunbar, by order of the Privy Council, to be met at the Watergate by the common hangman, who is to tie their hands behind their backs, to uncover them, and usher them up the way to the Tolbooth, with his coat on and covered.

— July 28. Nine gentlemen of the name of Campbell warded by order of the Privy Council.

— Dec. 13. Twelve women and nine men, who were imprisoned in Leith on the public account, removed to Edinburgh and put in the Iron-house for attempting to escape.

[The Iron-house was one apartment of the Tolbooth, so that these twenty-one individuals, male and female, were all huddled together.]

1686, March 23. John Gavins, soldier, hanged for the murder of a messenger on the High Street.

— April 18. Marion Hay, warded on the application of the minister of Libberton, till she find caution to satisfy the discipline of the Church for being an adulteress, and recommended by the minister to be fed on bread and water.

— Oct. 12. Mr John Adamson, and Mr John Shiell, brought from the Bass, by order of the Privy Council to Colonel Graham of Clavers.

— Oct. 12. Alexander Mowat, and John M'Kiver, for assassinating Mr John Irving, minister, in the wood of Humberie, and robbing him of 350 merks. Both hanged on the 23d December following.

— Nov. 16. Sixteen persons warded, "all phanaticks."

1687, June 23. Nine men brought in by Lieut. Lyon, Lieutenant to Colonel Graham.

— June 23. Thirteen women, on a warrant from Lord Strathallan.

1688, Feb. 17. Mr James Renwick executed in the Grasmere. Sentence pronounced on the 8th, but reprieved by the Privy Council till this day.

— Feb. 18. George Gibson, brother to Sir Alexander Gibson, liberated, after being seven years confined, on bond to return to prison in July next, if he is in life.

— Feb. 24. Philip Stanfield, executed at the Cross.

— June 16. The Lords of His Majesty's Privy Council do, upon the happy news of Her Most Serene Majesty having been delivered of a Prince of Scotland, hereby give order and warrant to the Magistrates of Edinburgh, furthwith to set at liberty Allan Bell, William Bell, William Haddock, James Janet, and Mary Howisons, prisoners on the account of field conventicles, and other church disorders and irregularities, and have discharged, and hereby discharge ym., or any of ym., to be troubled on the account foresaid, by any person qt.somewer in time coming. (Signed) Wm. Paterson, Clk. Secti. Concilii.

— June 29. John Allan, executed at the Cross for false coynage, was reprieved by the Privy Council from the 26th of April, "in regard to his continued unpreparedness to die and enter on eternitie."

— Aug. 2. The Lords of his Majesty's Privy Council, "Doe hereby, in pursuance of his Majesty's royall command, sygnified to them by his royall Letter, dated at Whythall, the 17th July, 1688, Give order and warrant for taking down the head of the late Earle of Argyll from off the tolbooth of Edinburgh, where it now stands, and for delivering it to any person who shall have the late Lord's son's order for receiving the same, to be disposed of yf. after in such way and manner as to the said late Lord's son shall seem fitt, without any lett, hinderance, or molestation qt.somewer: And Ordains the Magistrates of Edinburgh to give their concurrence and assistance in putting His Majesty's royall commands aforesaid to due execution. Extracted by me, W. P. C.S.C."

SOME ACCOUNT OF AN ANCIENT MINE.

[From the "Belfast Commercial Chronicle."]

THE neighbourhood of Ballidehob, in the parish of Schull, county Cork, has been for many years known to abound in mineral veins; but these, like many other sources of wealth possessed, but not employed by this unfortunate country, have been heretofore, except in a few instances, neglected, or perverted by designing men into means of fraud. The history of the Cappagh mine, near Ballidehob, the chief scene of the West Cork Mining Company's notorious adventure, is, unhappily for the interests of Irish mining, but too familiar both to mining capitalists and to those versed in Chancery reports. This and similar projects have tended to the utter extinction of a spirit of enterprise, always too feeble to withstand any great discouragement. But a more active and intelligent disposition, mainly fostered, if not altogether inspired, by the patriotic researches of Sir Robert Kane, is now beginning to exhibit itself in increased attention to our various "industrial resources," and amongst others to the mineral possessions of the country. Amongst the enterprises to which this disposition has given birth is that which has led to the remarkable discovery of which it is attempted in this paper to give an unpretending account. A few gentlemen of the city, and of this part of the county of Cork, agreed about two years since to expend a moderate sum in a search for mineral deposits, to which end they obtained the mining sets of two extensive estates, and engaged the service of an intelligent Cornish mining agent, Captain Charles Thomas. The researches hitherto have been attended with signal success, and the results promise to become highly important. Amongst them may be mentioned the discovery of several loads of yellow copper ore at the Mizen Head, where there is reason to hope for the establishment of a great and profitable mine. In the strata of the country, and the character of the loads, it is pronounced by Capt. John Reed, of the Berehaven Mines, to bear a close analogy to that celebrated mine (in whose neighbourhood it lies). But this by the way.

In the course of Captain Thomas's searches near Ballidehob, on the land of North Derrycarhune, an unfrequented mountain about two miles to the north of Ballidehob, and three miles from the sea, where he had previously found several mineral indications more or less promising, he observed a smooth rock of the slate of the country facing towards the south, which his experience at once told him was the northern boundary, or "north wall," of a "load" or vein. He further observed in the surface of the adjoining ground, which consisted of peat closely covered with strong herbage, several lags or depressions of the ground, running parallel to each other in a direction nearly east and west, at a distance of from ten to thirty yards apart. These depressions were about five feet in width each, and sunk below the ordinary surface at either side not more than six or seven inches, and covered with green sod like that around. Capt. Thomas, with a sagacity for which he deserves credit, at once stated his conviction that ancient miners had worked there, and that these depressions were caused by the subsidence of loose stuff, filling up excavations which had been made upon the course of the east and west loads. It must here be stated that no record or tradition whatever existed in the country of any ancient excavations or works for mining or other purposes. Captain Thomas at once set men to work, and his inquiries have led to some extraordinary results. He discovered ancient workings on five different parallel roads; but that which has been hitherto most extensively cleared of rubbish is the third in order from the south. The rubbish appears to have been replaced in all with an anxiety to refill the excavations, and to obliterate from the surface every vestige of the works. In the load referred to the old excavation has been found to extend for about 600 feet along the course of the load at the surface, but to become rapidly narrower in longitudinal extent as it descends. It has been cleared out to a depth of about 60 feet, but the bottom has not yet been seen. (At this point a "cross-cut" has been driven north and south to intersect some of the other loads, for the mining purposes of the present proprietors; and it is understood that in one of them a valuable course of grey sulphuret of copper two feet wide has been discovered. If this be true, the discovery is likely to prove of at least equal interest to the poor labourers of the neighbourhood as to the antiquarian.) This ancient excavation was not made, like a modern mine, by shafts and levels, cross-cuts and winzes; but the whole contents of the load were cleared out along the entire surface of the work, small portions only of the load having been left standing here and there; so as to form natural abutments for the support of the "walls" of the load, performing the duty of the timber "stalls" of the modern Cornish miner, and being in fact indispensable for the safety of the mine. This load is from three to five feet wide, and this is accordingly the width of the old excavation as it now stands cleared out, and once more, after many centuries, exposed to light. As above stated, its longitudinal, or east and west dimensions, become narrower as they descend, its western termination being much more precipitous than the eastern, which latter appears to have been used for the purposes of ascent and descent. Thus a vertical section of the limits of the excavation would present a curve, somewhat like that of a syphon, thus

Pure precipitate of copper has been found in considerable quantities mixed with the peat of the surface; but no ore, at least in any important quantity, is seen standing where the ancients left off work.

Numerous implements have been found in the rubbish, the most remarkable of which are the syphon-shaped tube, and the funnel attached, now at the Irish Academy, which this sketch is intended to accompany. These were found precisely in their present state, at a depth of about 50 feet. The material is apparently of yew, but its use is as yet wholly unexplained. It is charred on the inside, as if it had been hollowed by fire; and the direction of the annuli of the wood may show whether it was cut from a solid piece, or artificially bent into its present curve, or was a natural "knee" of timber. An annular mark will be observed at its lesser end, as fresh as if it had been contracted but yesterday, showing that it had there insertion into another tube. Could it have been used for the purpose of washing the ore, the knee being placed undermost, and the legs upwards, so that the richer and heavier particles on subsiding might have been extracted through the longitudinal aperture on the inside and at the bottom of the curve?

There has been also found a very wide ladder, consisting of a single piece of oak, the steps being formed by notches cut on one side. The timber is much decayed. Its length now remaining is about 12 feet.

A multitude of stone hammers of the very rudest construction have been found dispersed through the rubbish, two of which are believed to be at present in the possession of Professor Allman, of Trinity College, Dublin, who recently visited the place. These consist of single stones, of four or seven pounds weight, and of an irregular oval shape, which in some appears to have been artificial; but the majority seem to owe their form to the action of water, and to have been brought from the neighbouring sea-shore. They are generally slightly flattened at one side to fit the hand, and battered at the opposite end as if from use.

No metallic implement of any kind has been found, nor does the mine exhibit the smallest trace of the use of any such. It is needless to say that no marks of the use of gunpowder are to be seen. It is probable that the place was densely wooded at the period of the operations. It is further to be observed that no scorificæ, or "slags," the residue of smelting processes, have yet been found.

Who, then, were those ancient and mysterious workmen, who, possessing no metallic implements, yet laboured with incredible perseverance to obtain the raw ores from which the metal could still be extracted only by a difficult and tedious process—who, ignorant and rude as they must have been, are yet proved by those "stalls," which are above described, to have been not wholly inexperienced in the art of mining? Why did they so carefully and with so much labour replace the rubbish and remove the traces of their works? Were they natives of the island, or casual visitors from a more civilised nation, as the Phœnicians; who, unexpectedly falling on these mineral deposits, worked them with such means as they had at hand, afterwards closing and concealing them, with the intention of reserving them for a future visit? The works, from their extent, and the imperfection of the tools which appear to have been used, must either have occupied a considerable portion of time, or been accomplished by a great number of workmen. Either of these facts would seem unfavourable to the foregoing supposition.

Finally, what was the era of these works? A singular and authentic element for this inquiry is supplied by the hand of nature herself, for at the edge of one of the excavations may now be seen, lying on a bed of peat, a stratum of the rubbish thrown up by the workmen, about one foot in thickness. Above this rubbish there lies in situ the peat which has accumulated since the throwing up of the stuff: and this stratum of peat, which is moderately compressed, is of three feet in thickness. The time therefore required for the accumulation of such a stratum has obviously elapsed since the period of these ancient works; and that, measured by the generations of men, must be of considerable length.

It is greatly to be desired that some gentlemen qualified to investigate such a subject should examine the circumstances on the spot; where they would, doubtless, find much to interest them, both in the scientific and the industrial relations of the matter.

MINUTES OF IRVINE PRESBYTERY.

WE shall now give a series of extracts illustrating the conduct of the kirk in matters of ordinary procedure, as well as the extent and character of her claims of sanctity, and to public regard. We shall see how nobles bowed the neck to her uncompromising decisions—how "the call" was made and responded to in the "golden age"—what exertions were made in cases of public distress and for objects of public utility—and how the clergy passed through the ordeal of the solemn visitation, when Presbyterial committees inquired at the people, individually and collectively, what accusation in regard to life, doctrine, character, &c., they could bring against their minister.

2d Oct., 1646.—It was reported that Janet Reid, in Largs, had made her repentance for slandering her minister. That David Brown, in London, has satisfied for speaking against the covenant. Rob. Brown, Largs, cited for saying The devil be with the ministers, a pack of false common thieves went after them &c.; and when a piper came out to play, he said he came to play away the puritans. The Laird of Knock, for taking protection, cited—also Lord Boyd, the Laird of Craig, and others, for similar practices."

"12th Jan., 1647.—My Lord Montgomerie having exhibit ane presentation to the kirk of Ardrossan, in favour of Ralph Rodger; after reading of the said presentation, Mr Ralph was inquired whither or no he would accept of it, and answerit he would accept of it, in case the Presbytery found it ruled; whereupon it is ordained that Mr Alex. Dunlop, the next day, should produce before the Presbytery both the decret of the plat and the prior presentation, to collation the two together, that the Presbytery might give their judgment the better. The Presbytery ordered a day of solemn humiliation for divers sins, and also for the plague or pestilence that was beginning to rage in Glasgow."

2d Feb., 1647.—My Lord Boyd expressed his willingness to give satisfaction to the kirk for his complying with the enemy. The Presbytery ordered a contribution from every parish to repair the bridge of Lugton. A contribution ordered for the distressed people of Argyre, as recommended by the committee of the kirk."

"29th March, 1647.—This day being appointed for the closing and perfyting of Mr Andw. Hutchison on his trials, the brethren, in an afternoon session, convened, and having examined and tried the said Mr Andrew, both in his knowledge of tongues, chronology, reconciliation of seeming contradictions, exposition of harder places and cases of conscience, he was approved in all; and having given satisfaction in his whole trials, the Presbytery ordains his edict to be given out and served, and returned formallie, indorsed the next day of meeting, and for hastening his admission, that there should be no stop and let to it. Mr John Bell and Mr Hugh M'Kaile, are appointed to meet at Stewarton upon Monday come-eight-days, for the removal of all impediments out of the way, that there may be a full settling betwixt the parish of Stewarton and the said Mr Andrew. This being the day of censure, the brethren were removit as follows: Mr Pat. Colville and Mr John Bell, well reported of by all; Mr Hugh M'Kaile and Mr Wm. Guthrie, has a good testimony of the whole brethren; Mr Wm. Lindsay and Mr Jas. Ferguson, well reported of; Mr Wm. Castellan and Mr Alex. Nisbet, reported well of; Mr John Nevey and Mr Rob. Urie, had the like testimony. The absent ordained to be censured next day."

"20th April, 1647. The edict of Andw. Hutchison being called for, was returned formallie, indorsed by Robert Brown, clerk to the session at Stewarton. The parishioners of Stewarton being called upon three several times, if they had any thing to object, either against the doctrine or life and conversation of the said Mr Andrew, that they should compar, with certification, that if they did not compar the Presbytery would go on to the admission. None gave appearance, whereupon the Presbytery concludes to go on to the admission of the said Mr Andrew, and to the end, that his admission might be hastened, the ordinance is renewed to the former committee that was appointed to meet at Stewarton, for settling of any thing that might be controverted betwixt the parish and the said Mr Andrew, to meet upon Monday next, without delay, for the full settling of Mr Andrew and the parish of Stewarton, and to report their diligence."

"27th April, 1647.—Mr John Bell, in name of the rest of the brethren who were appointed to go to Stewarton for settling and composing any thing that might be controverted between Mr Andrew Hutchison and the parish of Stewarton, relates that he had kepted, and had settled all things that were debateable, and ane security for stipend, glebe, and manse, agreed upon to be given to the said Mr Andrew, whereupon the Presbytery ordains Mr Andrew Hutchison his admission to be upon Thursday come-eight-days, and Mr Hugh M'Kaile to preach, in case the foresaid conditions be fulfilled that were agreed upon both by the commissioners of the Presbytery and the parish of Stewarton."

"4th May, 1647.—Mr Wm. Castellan being enquired if the securities for Mr Andrew Hutchison, his stipend, glebe, and manse, was subscribed by the gentlemen and heritors of the parish of Stewarton, answered that it was drawn up and subscribed, and that he had a commission to produce the same to the Presbytery. The bond being read and produced was found to be defective in this, that it was not subscribed by the whole heritors. The said Mr William fearing that the admission upon this ground would be delayed, undertook to have the bond subscribed by the whole heritors having interest against the day of admission; and in case he should fail in this, he is content to be bound and obliged, and binds and obliges himself to pay what was unlaiking by the non-subscribers, and upon this the Presbytery ordains the admission to go on upon Thursday next, and the whole Presbytery to be present. Upon the humble petition of Mr Alex. Dunlop, (the lately deposed minister of Ardrrossan,) the Presbytery, notwithstanding that they have appointed Mr Ralph Rodger his edict to be served, concludes that the admission should be delayed till the 1100 merks be paid to him by the parish of Ardrrossan, and all other conditions fulfilled that were agreed upon between the said parish and Mr Alex. Dunlop.

"18th May, 1647.—The Presbytery had no exercise this day, because that the brethren who were appointed did pretend that they got no advertisement, whereupon the Presbytery, de novo, appointed the same two who were formerly appointed to exercise this day 15 days. The edict of Mr Ralph Rodger being called for, was returned formallie and lawfullie indorsit—proclamation according to the custom being made at the kirk door to the parishioners of Ardrrossan, to come here in case they had any thing to object either against the doctrine or the life and conversation of Mr Ralph Rodger. None comparred. The presentation being produced and compared with the prior presentation, it was found to be deficient in ane clause anent the sea vicarage, whilk it did not specify at all, which the Presbytery was confident that the two noblemen, Eglington and Montgomerie, would rectify. The edict being served, the parishioners pleased with the man, and the Presbytery being hopeful that the said two noblemen would be willing to mend any thing that was deficient in the presentation, upon this consideration the Presbytery ordains the admission of the said Mr Ralph Rodger to be upon Thursday come-eight-days, and Mr Wm. Russel to preach. Mr Hugh M'Kaile, and Mr Alex. Nisbet, and Mr James Ferguson, are appointed to revise Row, his psalms, and to give in their animadversions thereupon."

1st June, 1647.—A visitation at the new kirk at Kilmarnock, (understood to be Fenwick,) Mr Wm. Guthrie, the minister, preached, and was approved of. Their different elders being called upon separately, expressed themselves highly pleased with their minister. The rest of the elders being called in cumulo, because there was not the least surmise of any particular to occasion farther and particular enquiry one by one, most unanimously and most cheerfully confirmed the good opinion, &c. The elders being removed, the ministers gave them a very sweet testimony, as also to the whole flock.

Being enquired at about the payment of his stipend, gave a very unsatisfactory account as to that matter."

15th June, 1647.—The plague surmised to be in Kilwinning, and that the sickness at Largs still continues. The Laird of Dunlop having related to the Presbytery that the parish of Dunlop had given an unanimous call to Mr James Durham of Pourie, to be their minister, and withal desiring the Presbytery's concurrence with them in the said call. The Presbytery being most willing to further the motion upon the sight of the said call, appoints a letter to be direct from the Presbytery to the said Mr James, intreating that he would lay the call of the Presbytery to heart."

Next month, we shall give an interesting account of the process of Presbyterial investigation as to a ministers' diligence, acceptability and usefulness. Associated with these proceedings will be found the names of many, such as M'Kail, Outhrie, and Durham,—names which fall like a strain of soft music on the ear of all whose hearts glow at the reminiscences of those days, when the banner of the covenant waved over the wild and heathy hills of the west, besprinkled with, and hallowed by, the blood of its martyrs.

BATTLE OF PRESTONPANS.

THIS battle, fought September 21st, 1745, between the forces of Prince Charles-Edward—usually styled the Pretender—and those of the Hanoverian dynasty, is sometimes called Gadsmuir. It was so designated in the despatches of the Prince, after the victory, and more than one historian of the events of the period has followed the example. The reader, unless versant in Scottish topography and history, might suppose that Prestonpans and Gladsmuir were two different battle-fields. The inconvenience of this seems to have been anticipated by a contributor, or contributors to the Scots Magazine at the time—November 1745—in the following humorously serious petition :

To the author of the SCOTS MAGAZINE.

The petition of Prestonpans, Preston, Cockenzie, Seton and Tranent.

Humbly sheweth,

That whereas, from all antiquity, it has been, and still is the universal custom, to denominate battles from the field on which they were fought, or from some town or village nearest to such fields ;

And whereas some dignity is thereby added to such fields, towns, or villages, their names made remarkable in the maps, and recorded in history ;—witness the small village of Dettingen, which was never of such consideration as to find a place in the maps of Germany, until it was celebrated by the engagement which happened near it a few years ago ;

And whereas, on the 21st of September last, there was a battle fought on a field which is in a manner surrounded by us the petitioning towns and villages ; from one or other of which the said battle ought undoubtedly to derive its title :

Nevertheless, the publishers of a certain newspaper, intitled, The Caledonian Mercury, have most unjustly denominated the said battle from a muir on which it was not fought, nor near to it ; in which they are followed by several people, who, either through malice against your petitioners, or through stupidity, have affected to call, and still do call it, The battle of Gladsmuir. By which practice your petitioners are, conjunctly and severally, deprived of that honour and fame which of right pertains to them, and which in all histories, future maps and almanacks, ought to be transmitted as theirs to the latest posterity.

Your petitioners humbly apprehend, that even the conquerors themselves have no right, after a battle is once fought, to determine that it was fought on any other field than where it really was.

Shall, then, our fruitful fields and meadow-ground be called by the name of a barren muir ? This, Sir, is downright transubstantiation, and can be enforced by nothing less than the late fashionable arguments of military execution.

Your petitioners could have put up with such an encroachment as they take this to be upon their property, had it appeared only in a short-lived newspaper, especially when published by a certain authority, or rather command ; but it affects us much to see the same usurped title of the fore-mentioned battle find a way into your last September Magazine, which bids fair to perpetuate it.

May it therefore please you, Good Sir, if you have occasion hereafter to publish any thing concerning the said battle, to denominate it from one of your petitioners ; or at least to publish this our remonstrance against the encroachment made upon our rights. And your petitioners shall ever pray &c.

The editor of the SCOTS MAGAZINE, in a strain of well-affected gravity, appends a conditional interlocutor in favour of Preston. He says—

The desire of the above petition appears to be just and reasonable, for any thing yet seen. But, as in matters of great importance all parties having or pretending to have interest ought to be called, we ordain the said petition to be seen, and answers to be given in betwixt and the tenth day of January next ; with certification, that, if no answer is then given in, the desire of it will be granted. And in regard the honour and fame resulting from the name of this battle, must be confined to one of the petitioners, so that all of them except one must give up their right, for the greater utility of his Majesty's subjects, (for there would not be room in maps or almanacks to conjoin all the petitioners in one), we hereby declare, that, in case no answer is given in against the time appointed, we shall for the future denominate this battle by the name of Preston, as this petitioner's title seems to be best founded in the nature of the thing, and as we have the greatest number of precedents for such preference ; allowing the other petitioners, nevertheless, to make their objections, if they any have, in due time. And further, in case judgment is allowed to pass in the above terms, which it is hereby declared to do without further form, provided no answers or objections are presented as aforesaid, we hereby give full power to such of our readers as think proper, to erase the word Gladsmuir in all places of our Magazine in which it is used to denominate the battle in question, and in place thereof to write Preston; allowing such of them, however, as may have reasons unknown to the petitioners and to us for preferring the former word, not only to continue Gladsmuir, where it already is, but even to write it in place of Preston, in case this last word should in its turn be exceptionable: for we are utterly averse to any encroachments on the liberties of mankind, sacred or civil.

SEARCH FOR PEARLS IN SCOTLAND, IN 1622.

EARL OF MELROS TO KING JAMES IV.

MOST SACRED SOVERAINE,

VNDERSTANDING, by my Lord Chancellor, that the Earle of Kellie, by his letter, had signified to him, that it wes your royall pleasour, that I sould aduertise what order wes proseriued for the timelie and convenient search of pearles in this kingdome, with the effects thairrof. For obedience of your maiesties commandement, by the letter first sent to me for that purpose, I conferred with the Lord Chancellor and Aduocat, and by their aduice and concurrence, directed commissions to Sir Robert Gordon, and, in his absence, to his brother Sir Alexander, for Sutherland; to the Lord of Kintail, for the waters in Ross; and to Mr Patrik Maitland of Auchincreib, for the waters of Eythen, and others within the schirefdome of Aberdeen: with power to Maistor Patrik Maitland to receiue all the pearle that sould be found to youre maiesties vse, geuing due satisfaction to the takers thereof. I haue not hard of the effects of Sir Alexander Gordons diligence, but haue of new remembred him, by letter, of your maiesties direction, and his owne dutie. I haue spoken with the Lord Kintail, in this towne, who sayes he hes not hard of any pearl taken, sence his commission, in the waters of Ross. Maister Patrik Maitland persewed some men of Aberdene, before the counsell, for thair vnlauffull buyeing of pearles, since the proclamation; who compeiring, some confessed a small quantitie of pearle of no valow, the rest, being sworne and examined, denied. Order wes taken with the contravenars, and they acted vnder great panes to abstean from that trade; and the proclamation commanded to be of new published, to restra.ne the abuse of vnlauffull buyeing. I am informed that their are sindrie other riuers in this kingedome where pearles ar found; as the water of Forth, the waters of Cart beside Paislay, and some waters in Galloway; but I heare not of any pearles of wourth found thairin, except verie rarelie. If it please your maiestie to make choice of any dwelling in those cuntries, to take charge of the riuers, commissions sall be given as they sall be directed. So, praying God long and graciously to preserue your maiestie, the pearle of kings, I rest,

Your sacred Maiesties most humble and faithfull subject and bund seruant,

MELROS.

AN INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF ROBERT THE BRUCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SCOTTISH JOURNAL."

SIR,—As your valuable Journal is a repertory of ancient traditionary stories, and antiquarian lore, I haue made bold to submit for your consideration the following short but striking legend, which I heard long ago, in my boyhood, from the lips of an old sybil, yclept my "grannie," deeply versed in all the unearthly mysteries of the "world of spirits," fairies, brownies, witches, kelpies, and "such other bugs," (as honest Reginald Scot says in his famous Discoverie of Witchcraft), by which our forefathers were rendered "afraid of their own shadows."

That eventful period, when the sun of Scottish liberty had set in the blood of our noblest patriot, "the wight Wallace," and the young King, Robert the Bruce, was pursued, as an alien, among his native mountains by the "Southron kernes," is peculiarly rife with many heart-stirring narratives of the countless perils to which our gallant countrymen were exposed, and the noble deeds they achieved. Prodiges, too, were eagerly caught at by both parties, as auguries of the success of their respective causes. The life of King Robert the Bruce teems with marvellous exploits, and not a few mysterious incidents (such as the strange fire which lighted him over to Turnberry) which may never be sufficiently explained. But perhaps the most mysterious incident related of Bruce is that which I am about to state, for the veracity of which, however, nobody could of course vouch—I only

"Say the tale as 'twas said to me."

One dark and stormy night in the spring of 13—, Bruce was wandering alone upon the Ayrshire coast, near to an old castle called Blairstone. That day his little but devoted band of followers had been scattered by a sudden and unexpected onset of the enemy; and the poor King, driven to extremity, pinched with hunger, and without a single friend to whom he could unburthen his grief, sought refuge in the "pathless wilds." Weary and wayworn, he at length reached a bleak and dreary muir, close to the sea, from which the cold sea-blast was howling, and looked round for shelter, where shelter there was none. It is said that on this muir there once lay a large smooth slab of stone, half embedded in the sod, and half covered with the heather; and that Bruce, in despair of finding any human dwelling that night, sat himself down on the stone, and giving free vent to his despair, in the agony of the moment, began to repine against the mysterious workings and ways of Providence. Despair often makes the sufferer an unbeliever. Bruce then prayed that heaven would vouchsafe, by some visible and apparent sign, to show whether he should continue the almost hopeless struggle to retrieve his fortunes, and regain the liberties of Scotland. What pathos must have been in that prayer, evoked from the very depths of his labouring heart!

Faint and famished, sleep overtook him, and he fell forward on the face of the stone, his ponderous two-handed sword lying beneath him. The midnight storm beat in all its fury over the unprotected head of the unfortunate King. He awoke in the cold grey of the morning; but picture his amazement when, on raising his brand, he perceived that on the face of the stone, whereon he had lain, was impressed the figure of his sword!

This undoubted miracle or prodigy at once filled him with the cheering rays of hope. He knelt down that moment, and offered grateful thanks to God; and from that hour he never despaired of success in his glorious cause.

My garrulous informant stated that the stone, bearing the well-defined impress of the Bruce's sword, existed in her "young days," but whether it exists at present I cannot tell. Perhaps some of the western readers or correspondents of the "Journal" may be able to say.

A. W. E.

[The stone referred to still exists. It is a huge block of granite—not properly a slab, though it lies flat. It is mentioned in Abercrommie's description of Carrick—written before 1688—and appears to have occupied the same ground then that it does at present. He says "There is also upon the descent of Broun-Carrick-Hill, near to the Mains of Blairstoune, a big Whinstone, upon which there is the dull figure of a Cross; which is alleged to have been done by some venerable Churchman, who did mediat a peace twixt the king of the Picts and the Scots; and to give the more authority to his proposalls, did in their sight, by laying a Cross upon the stone, imprint that figure thereon." Such was, apparently, the tradition when Abercrommie wrote. It has also been attributed to Wallace as well as Bruce.]

ADDRESS TO AUCHENBOTHIE TOWER.

THE remains of this fine old ruin are situated in the parish of Lochwinnoch, Renfrewshire, close by the high way leading from Caldwell to the little rural clachan of Howood. The earliest account which we have of Auchenbothie, or Auchenbathie, is by Crawford in his history of Renfrewshire, (quarto edition, with a continuation by Robertson, published in 1818). At page 82, he thus speaks of the Wallaces of Elderslie:—"I have seen a resignation of the lands of Auchenbothie into the hands of Robert, Duke of Albany, governor of Scotland, in the year 1398, by John Wallace of Elderslie, in favour of Thomas Wallace, his son:" and at page 87, still speaking of the Wallace family, he repeats the former statement: thus, "the first of whom (meaning the Wallaces), I have found mentioned, is John Wallace of Elderslie, who resigns the lands of Auchenbathie in favour of Thomas Wallace his son in the year 1398, who was author of the Wallaces of Johnston." About nine years after the preceding date, we find that Wallace of Elderslie, having obtained, by some means unknown, the lands of Fulton, which had before belonged to Fulton of that Ilk, gifted or resigned them, for some priestly service, to the "Ecclesiastics of Paisley."

It is supposed that the Fultons of that Ilk removed and settled at the time on a portion of the lands of Auchenbothie. In a note appended to an article in the "Paisley Magazine," entitled "Some Incidents in the Life of Alexander Wilson, the celebrated American Ornithologist, collected in the parish of Locwhinnoch," we are informed that Auchenbothie, which belonged to the Wallaces of Elderslie, and which is thus alluded to by Blind Harry in his metrical history of Sir William Wallace—

Malcolm Walys hir got in marreage
That Elderslie had in heritage;
Auchenbath and other sundrie places,
The second oe he was of gude Walys—was a barony whereon was a tower or castle, considerable ruins of which were to be seen at that time. The dimensions of the ruins of the castle at this day are as follows: 30 feet in length, 30 feet in breadth, and the walls at the base about 6 feet in thickness. A part of the walls standing measures about 16 feet in height. It must have been a place of some strength in the feudal ages.

Mould'ring ruin! all neglected,
Can'st thou tell of ages gone,
When thy proud halls were respected—
Now so desolate and lone?
Can'st thou tell the martial story
Of brave Wallace, freedom's son,
Who, on war-fields red and gory,
Scotia's independence won.

Did his footsteps ere awaken
Echoes in thy stately hall?
Was there ere a gathering beacon
Kindled on thy lofty walls?
Was there ere a foe, assailant,
Led by knight of famous powers,
Who was vanquished by the valiant
Warriors in thy guarded towers?

Was there ere a beauteous maiden,
Lovely as the sun-beam bright,
In thy halls, whose smile did gladden
The won hearts of many a knight?
Tell me of the warriors hoary,
Who, around the wassail bowl,
Echoed the heroic story
Of their chief of noble soul.

Mouldering ruin! desolation
O'er thee wilds his lonely sway,
And silence mocks my fond petition
That in echo dies away.
Shorn of all thy former glory,
Solitude dwells in thy walls,
And oblivion shrouds the story
Of the brave who graced thy halls.

In thy towers, where oft were seated,
Warriors brave and ladies fair,
Whose bright eyes to eyes repeated
Love's pure language fondly there,
Sits the night-owl, idly slumbering
When the sun is shining high,
And with shrieks the lone hours numbering,
When the stars are in the sky.

Where rich strains of music swelling
Often echoed in thy hall,
There the bat hath found a dwelling
In thy solitary walls;
And the dews of eve are sleeping
Flowers thy ruins dark among,
And the "ivy green" is creeping
Where rich tapestry was hung.

Ruin lone! I love to wander
Near thee when the evening falls,

Where the mossy streams meander,
Singing round thy gloomy walls—
When the cooling breeze is bringing Odour from the moorland flowers;
When the blythesome birds are singing
Flitting round thy broken towers.

And I love thee, though deserted—
Left to moulder in decay:
Like the cheerless broken-hearted,
That neglected pine away.
The more I love thee, thus forsaken,
My heart the warmer turns to thee;
And thy sad fate can awaken
A mournful sympathy in me.

FORGERY.—Is one of those crimes, says a letter in Nov. 1803, the frequency of which seems to increase with the certainty of punishment. Excluded in almost every instance from clemency, it is daily becoming more common, and the alteration of the punishment to death has had no terrifying influence. The punishment of this crime formerly was perhaps thought too sanguinary by some, and too merciful by others, so difficult it is to apportion punishment to crimes, and so short-sighted are legislators when they consider death as a preventative as well as a curb. In a Journal for the year 1731, we find the following detail of the then mode of punishment, which to many of our readers is probably unknown:—June 9. "This day, about noon, Japhet Crook, alias Sir Peter Stranger, was brought to the pillory at Charing Cross, according to his sentence of forgery. He stood an hour thereon; after which a chair was set on the pillory, and he being put therein, the hangman, with a sort of pruning-knife cut off both his ears, and immediately a surgeon clapt a styptic thereon. When the executioner, with a pair of scissors, cut his left nostril twice before it was through, and afterwards cut through his right nostril at once. He bore all this with great patience; but when, in pursuance of his sentence, his right nostril was seared with a hot iron, he was in such violent pain, that his left nostril was let alone, and he went from the pillory bleeding. He was conveyed thence to the King's Bench Prison, to remain there for life. He died in confinement about three years after.

ARMAGH CAPTURED BY STRATAGEM.—In the month of January, 1696, the earl of Tyrone made a grand effort to regain Armagh, and with that object he attacked a considerable force of the English army, under Sir John Norris, which was stationed at the church of Killoter. They were forced to give way to the desperate valour of the Irish, and after losing many of their number they fled through Armagh to Dundalk, having left a garrison of 500 men under Captain Stafford for the defence of the former place. Tyrone being now master of the surrounding country, took the most effectual means to cut off all communication between Armagh and the English army, by which the garrison became a prey to famine and disease. Sir John Norris made an attempt to relieve the city, by forwarding a quantity of provisions from Dundalk, under the escort of a squadron of horse and three companies of foot. But, through the vigilance of Tyrone, the escort was defeated and captured, with the whole convoy, and the Irish chieftain stripped the British soldiers and equipped an equal number of his own men in their uniforms. He placed one half of these under Con O'Neil in the vaults of a ruined monastery, which was situated eastward of the city, and with the remainder he appeared at dawn of day in full view of the garrison. A sham fight soon commenced between those dressed in the English uniform and another body of the Irish army, the men on each side firing their muskets, which were charged only with powder, and many of the soldiers fell to the ground as if struck by the shock of their antagonists. Completely deceived by this stratagem, Stafford sent forth the half of his garrison to the assistance of his supposed countrymen; but when the English advanced to the conflict, they suddenly found themselves assailed by the troops whom they had been so eager to succour, as well as by Tyrone's forces; and in the midst of their confusion Con O'Neil sprang forth with his corps from the old monastery, and the whole party thus attacked in front and rear, were put to the sword in the very view of the garrison. Stafford was so weakened by this disaster that he surrendered the city, on being permitted to retire to Dunalk.—'Stories of Ireland.'

STAGE PLAYS.—The reign of Henry VIII. was memorable for the introduction of stage plays into Ireland. The members of the different guilds, or corporations, of Dublin were the first actors, and it is said that, during the Christmas of 1523, the earl of Kildare was invited every day to a new play, performed on a stage erected in Hoggan (New College) Green—the tailors acting Adam and Eve; the shoemakers, Crispin and Crispinus; the vintners, the story of Bacchus; the smiths, that of Vulcan; the carpenters, Joseph and Mary; the bakers, the comedy of Ceres; the prior of St John of Jerusalem and all Hallows caused at the same time two plays to be acted, the one representing the passion of our Saviour, and the other representing the various Martyrdoms of the apostles—so indecently were sacred and profane subjects mixed together at that time.

WOLVES IN SCOTLAND.—The honour of having slain the last Scottish wolf is claimed by different distinguished families, and the scene of his death has been laid in various parts of the kingdom. By some authorities, the very last wolf in Scotland was killed in the seventeenth century by the famous Sir Evan Cameron of Lochiel. The same exploit is also said to have been achieved by an Ogilvy in the wild glen of Bach-na-gairn, where the Grampians descend in steep and abrupt gorges to the Lowland districts of Forfarshire. However or wherever the race may have become extinct, we are well pleased to remember that it is so—that shepherds are no longer in fear for their flocks, or mothers for thier infants, as often happens in the severity of a Continental winter, when these ferocious animals come hunger-stimulated from the mountains. In former times the "woulfs" were objects of deserved terror. We are told that the tract of country called Ederachillis, on the west coast of Sutherland, was so invested by them that they even rifled the corpses from the graves, and the inhabitants were obliged to convey their dead to the neighbouring island of Handa, as the only safe place of sepulture. Handa is a barren and lofty rock of red sandstone, its cliffs on the north-west side rising six hundred feet in a perpendicular wall from the ocean. They are stratified horizontally, and present the appearance of the most regular and artistic masonry. The spray from the stormy billows, which here seldom know repose, is dashed often to their summits, while, undaunted by the noisy roar and continual showers, the sea-fowl gather thickly on the inaccessible ledges of the rocks. These birds are of various kinds. The osprey or sea-eagle, the gannet or solan-goose, all sorts of gulls, puffins, fulmars, the kestrel falcon or hawk, and many others of rarer species, make Handa's shelves their yearly home, coming always to lay their eggs and rear their young in the beginning of spring, and leaving the island in the end of summer, or later, according to the nature of the season. They afford food to the inhabitants. The fulmer yields an oil, which cheers the dreariness of winter, by lighting their wretched hovels; and the feathers are received as rent by the proprietors of the island. The grey-furred and green-eyed wolf, which was once a tenant of these districts, was the same as the common European wolf of the present day. The female suckles her young for six months, in a sort of nest heaped roughly together of twigs of grass. The wolf, from its extreme voracity, when flesh cannot be had, will eat refuse of any description. The "ware-wolf," or witch disguised in the shape of a wolf, was at one time an universal superstition wherever these animals were found. Even now, the peasant of Russia and Poland hold a belief of the same nature.

LARGS.

THE Church of this interesting parish is situated in the town of Largs, at the north end of the street, facing the sea.* The former church stood within the burying-ground, but when its re-building became necessary, in 1812, it was removed from its primitive site to the present more open and eligible situation. The present edifice is a neat plain building, originally a simple oblong in plan, but, by the addition of aisles to its eastern extremity, in 1821, it has been made to assume a cruciform appearance. A steeple, of a quadrilateral form, crowned with embrasures, and small turrets at the angles, from which rises an octagonal spire, surmounted by a weather-cock, graces the west gable, which is, moreover, the principal façade of the building. Whatever may be the architectural defects of the edifice, it possesses one feature, in the single tier of windows by which it is lighted, that all must commend. Within, the church presents a light, airy, and comfortable look, and is capable of accommodating about 1300 sitters.

The burying-ground, which is a moderate sized enclosure, is situated behind the south extremity of the same street as that in which the church stands, and another running eastward. It is a quiet spot, though partly surrounded by dwelling-houses and gardens, and is kept in a state of decency and order that might serve as a pattern to most of the churchyards in the district. From the north-west it is not inappropriately overlooked by a large tumulus or mound of earth, raised

Savage of heart and large of limb," who fell in the battle of 1263, and is now one of the few memorials of that decisive contest that has withstood the changes of modern times.* An aisle erected, in 1636, by Sir Robert Montgomery of Skelmorlie, and which extended northward from the demolished church, has been left entire. It contains a burial vault, and over it a stately and richly sculptured monument, erected in 1639, by the same eminent person. The style of the monument, and the painted ornaments of the apartment, are subjects of no common interest to those conversant with that department of the arts. Every person of taste, therefore, must regret that such rare and valuable specimens of monumental architecture, and the ornamental style of the early part of the seventeenth century, should be consigned by neglect to decay, and that nothing should be attempted, by the noble proprietor, to arrest the wasting "deliberate malice" of time.

The aisle measures, over the walls, 34 feet 10 inches, by 22 feet. It is built both outside and inside, the ceiling excepted, of chiseled freestone, and is covered with a deep roof, the south gable of which is surmounted by a thistle, and the other by a fleur-de-lis. The interior is lighted by a large equilateral arched window in the north gable, divided by a strong mullion into two trefoil-headed lights, with a small circular aperture between the heads; two of the ordinary form in each of the side-walls, and since the removal of the church, by another in the south gable. The entrance-door, the moderate height of which is characteristic of

* In several respects this parish is certainly among the most interesting in the west of Scotland. The few but significant relics still extant of the famous battle of 1263, along with the vestiges of entrenchments of a more remote antiquity, are objects that have long attracted the attention of the antiquary, and conferred on the district historical celebrity. Of times more modern, yet still rude and lawless, the ancient portions of the feudal residences of Skelmorlie and Kelburn, and the ruined Castles of Fairlie and Knock, will be found not unworthy of the notice of him who studies the condition and manners of ages long since past, through the medium of such tangible and unequivocal monuments. The admirer, too, of fine prospects will not lack gratification here; for, though the scenery of the lower part of the parish is not of a very picturesque cast, it presents a variety of views of a character decidedly beautiful, while those commanded from the higher grounds are extremely magnificent, and scarcely equalled in variety, extent and grandeur, by any on the shores of the Firth of Clyde. Even in the less attractive field to which our humble researches are limited, there are few parishes that have higher claims to distinction; and we doubt not that this paper will shew, that the churchyard of Largs does not yield in interest to any in the county.

* The mound, which is of an elliptical form, measures in length about 25 yards, is 9 in breadth, and between 4 and 5 in height. Its proximity to the church, and the circumstance of human bones having been found beneath a portion of it that was removed several years ago, afford testimony corresponding to that of the Norwegian chronicle, that Haco did bury, at least, some of his dead, at the church of Largs. The old church, of which a fragment of the south wall has been preserved, was a building of unknown antiquity and great strength, the portion remaining being 4 feet in thickness, and still of the most compact solidity. It is not, therefore, improbable that the recently demolished edifice was the original church of Largs, which appears, says Dillon, in his "Observations on the Norwegian Expedition against Scotland," from the Chartularies of Glasgow and Paisley, to have existed before 1263.

the architecture of the country at the period of its construction, is in the west side of the building. It is ornamented with a moulded architrave, and finished with an ogee arch, ensigned with a fleur-de-lis. Above the door, on a panel enclosed with mouldings, are very neatly sculptured, and but little injured by the weather, the quartered armorials of Montgomery and Eglinton, impaled with Douglas and Mar. The shield, in heraldic phrase, is timbred with helmet and mantlings, the former by mistake befitting the degree of an Esquire in place of that of a Baronet. For Crest, an anchor, and on an escroll is the motto:—"The Lord only is my support;" with the words, "Only to God. Be Lavd, and Gloir," on a compartment, along with the initials and date, S. R. M. 1636. D. M. D. The stone on which this interesting specimen of the "Noble Science" is insculp'd, has been skilfully selected for resisting the action of the weather, as all the lettering, though in small raised characters, as well as the equally delicate figures in the shield, have lost little of their original sharpness.

The aisle within is lofty, being nearly twenty feet in height, and its roof is embowed, or vaulted semi-circularly, with boarding. It is thrown, by painted gothic arches, mouldings and panels, into forty-one compartments of various forms and dimensions, each of which is adorned by the pencil with a religious, moral, emblematical, fanciful, or heraldic subject. The larger, if not the most masterly in design and colouring, of these compositions are four views depicting the seasons; a scene in which a female and a furious horse are the principal figures, intended it is said, to commemorate an accident which deprived a lady of the family of life;* figures emblematical of Justice and Fortitude; two biblical subjects; and pictorial representations of the twelve signs of the zodiac. Other lesser divisions are embellished with fanciful subjects combined with tasteful involutions of foliage. In the centre of the ceiling is a hexagonal panel, and right and left, at equal distances from it, along the central line, is one of a diamond form. The central panel is occupied with the emblazoned coats of Montgomery and Douglas, quartered, and impaled as over the door, and ornamented secundum artem, with all the exterior accompaniments of the shield. The family motto, "Gardez bien," is here resumed, and on a compartment is inscribed, in gilt characters, "Sir .

* The account of this fatal occurrence, as given in the old Statistical Account of Cumbræ, 1794, is as follows:—"About the beginning of the last century, according to the tradition of the island, there was a family of the name of Montgomery, who then possessed the greatest part of the land, now belonging to Lord Glasgow, and had a mansion-house at Billikellet. Among the last of that family was Dame Margaret Montgomery, joint patroness of the Kirk, who being on horseback at the green of the Largs, is said to have been thrown off amidst a crowd of people; but being a woman of a high spirit, she pursued the horse, and received a stroke of his foot, which proved instantly fatal." In the new Statistical Account of the parish of Cumbræ, it is said that the lady killed was Dame Margaret Montgomery, daughter of Sir Robert, though we know not on what authority the statement rests, as none of our family genealogists mention other issue of Sir Robert Montgomery than an only son, Robert, younger of Skelmorlie, who died in the lifetime of his father.

Robert . Montgomerie .; Dame . Margaret . Douglas." Appended to the achievement is a small cartouch, bearing the date 1638, and the French monosyllable Ouy, lettered in the reverse order of the date; neither of which could ever have been legible unless read within a few feet of the ceiling.* In one of the diamond panels above alluded to are four shields of arms, bearing, as is intimated in letters beneath them, the heraldic honors of "The House of Eglinton;" "The House of Drumlanrig;" "The House of Lochinvar;" "The House of Sempill." These symbols of family distinction are garnished with helmets, crests, and mantlings, but without their mottoes, and are placed opposite to each other in the order in which they are here written. The panel corresponding to the above contains only one shield, blank, or argent, but is ensigned with a baronet's helmet, and ornamented with mantlings. Among other decorated subdivisions of this singularly ornate ceiling, are twelve oblong tablets, placed within flat-arched compartments, along the lower extremity or spring of the vault. On each of the tablets is inscribed a "Holy Text," in gold characters, on an azure ground, and over all of them are limned in their natural tints, wreathes of foliage, garlands of flowers, corbels of fruit, birds, butterflies, &c., of varied designs. The greater portion of these are still "beautiful and bright," after an exposure of two hundred years to an atmosphere which has pulverised the surface of the incumbent ashlar walls. If tradition may be credited, each of the scriptural citations with which the tablets are charged, was, after the completion of the aisle, chosen by the clergyman of the parish as the subject of a discourse. Be that as it may, the selections from holy writ are so impressive, and withal illustrate so pleasingly the taste and piety of former times, that we gladly enrich our page by giving them at length. They follow in the order of the signs of the zodiac painted in compartments over them; that is, by commencing at the lower extremity of the left hand side of the apartment looking northward:—

"Blessed are they that movrn, for they shall be comforted." Mat. 5—4.

"But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens will pass away with a noise." 2 Peter—10.

"Ho that covereth his sins shall not prosper, but he that confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy." Prov. 18—14.

"Be thou faithful unto the Death, and I will give thee a crown of Life." Rev. 2—10.

"Trust in the Lord forever, for in the Lord God is strength forever more." Isaii 26—4.

"Blessed are the children that enlargeth the kingdom of Heaven, and cursed are the children that enlargeth the kingdom of Hell."

"The first man Adam was made a living Soule, and the last Adam was made a quickening Spirit." 1 Corinth. 15—45.

"Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints." Psal. 116—15.

* This date occurs likewise on one of the larger divisions of the ceiling, accompanied with the words "Stal-ker Fecit."

"I am sure that my Redeemer liveth, and that he will stand the last on the earth." Job. 19—25.

"Take heed to thy feet when thou entrest into the house of God, and be more neere to hear than to give the sacrifice to foolles." Eccl. 4—17.

"Come unto mee all yea that are weary and laden, and I will give you rest." Matth. 11—28.

"I am God, walk thou before me and be thou upright." Gen. 17—1.

Besides the above, there are inscriptions in Latin, though somewhat faded, below the figurative representations of Justice and Fortitude, already alluded to. That beneath the former, as nearly as it could be made out, runs thus: "Cum jvstio pensans libramine reddo silioque homine consilioque Devs;" and the other, illustrative of Fortitude, is as follows: "Fortis in ardis animosque pene gestans infractis animis ardua quoque."

In so general a sketch as the present, we can scarcely advert to the minor ornamental features of the ceiling. A few of the details, however, are so elegant in design, and have been so carefully finished, as to have at least some claims to a passing notice. Among these are ten small escutcheons, limned on the faces of brackets, or consoles, placed along the margin of each side of the vault—the feigned supports of a series of arched compartments. As the ground, or field, of these miniature bearings are all argent, the charges, consisting of single figures in their natural colours, and as few or none of their prototypes are to be found in any book of Scottish heraldry, they seem more probably to be fancies of the artist, than regular armorial ensigns. Commencing in the order of the scriptural quotations given above, the 1st of the shields bears a pine tree; the 2d is concealed by the upper part of an old funeral escutcheon; the 3d bears a ship in sail; the 4th a cow statant; the 5th a fox passant; the 6th three bars undé, vert; the 7th, a dexter hand holding a two-edged sword in pale; the 8th, a book displayed; the 9th, a lion rampant; the 10th is concealed by the like cause as the 2d. In addition to these we shall only observe that the initials S. D. occur twice each, in gilt characters, R.M. M.D. on shields painted over the intersection of several of the mouldings, and that the following patriotic couplet is halved between opposite compartments, close to the south gable of the aisle:

Warre . or . worke . we . the . hande . shoud . arme .
That . to . defende . our . countrie . deare . from . harme .

The colouring of the ceiling, which we have thus attempted to describe, though partially faded, has in no part altogether given way, while portions of it appear still to retain much of their original brightness. Considering its long exposure to the influence of so fitful an atmosphere, the free admission of which through broken windows and crannied roof, has been for many years unopposed, it says much for the excellence of the materials employed, that they have so long successfully resisted the most active agents of decay. The embellishments, both in design and execution, it may well be supposed, are not of uniform merit throughout. The ornamented inscriptive tablets, and the various emblazonments, along with the figures of Justice and Fortitude, have been decidedly the most happily conceived, and are the best executed parts of the design. Six landscapes, occupying the upper part of as many large gothic arches, four of which, representing the seasons, and two, apparently allegorical of Agriculture and Commerce, rank lowest in the scale of merit, being alike deficient in composition, perspective, and colouring. Some of these landscapes, it has been said, contain views of Skelmorlie House, and of the old church of Largs; but if such were the intention of the artist, he has signally failed in his efforts, both as regards the exterior mien of the buildings, and the natural features of their respective localities.* This ceiling, however, with all its defects, has well-grounded claims on the attention of the decorative artist, and the connoisseur in such matters: both of whom, we doubt not, will award it no slight measure of commendation. A century ago, when in the full lustre of its untarnished brilliancy, and when the stately monument, well worthy of such a canopy, rose unskathed, either by time or violence, the aisle must have presented a coup d'œil exquisite of its kind, and certainly unequalled for taste and magnificence, at least by any thing reared in Scotland since the era of

"That violent commotion, which o'erthrew,
In town, and city, and sequestered glen,
Altar and cross, and church of solemn roof,
And old religious house."

The Monument stands across the aisle to the left of the entrance. In length it is eleven feet and a half, in width five feet, and in height eighteen feet. It presents two fronts and profiles responding to each other in every respect, save that the elevation next to the entrance door is three feet ten inches (the depth of the lower stage of the basement) higher than its counterpart. Both elevations may, therefore, be described as a basement, sustaining an arcade between two intercolumniations with appropriate entablatures, surmounted by sculptured compartments, obelisks, and figures: the whole supported by eight Corinthian columns, four in each elevation, and ten pilasters of the same order, distributed between them. The columns stand on pedestals boldly projected, and compose, with the recessed divisions to which the latter are attached, the full basement of the north elevation, and the upper stage of its counterpart. The lower part of the latter has pilasters corresponding with the pedestals over them, but of a slighter relief, and support a congeries of mouldings, in the design of which, variety has been studied more than lightness and simplicity. To the right of the monument, a stair of seven steps conducts to a small area between the north elevation and the gable of the aisle. From this platform, the carved details of the monument may be advantageously examined, though its limited extent precludes the spectator from forming a correct idea of its full outline.

The monument is, indeed, not less remarkable for the taste, variety, and finish, exhibited in its ornamental details, than for the purity of its architectural profiles and general proportions, considering the period of its construction. We can, however, but simply advert to the more striking of its enrichments, aware not only that the descriptive language of ornamental sculpture is exhausted in a few words, but that, at the best, it is seldom effective unless when referring to common-place forms, or the simplest combinations. Among the carvings which stand in boldest relief are fifty-five flowers or roses of various patterns, cut in panels on the soffit of the arcade, and others similarly arranged, but larger, on the platfords of the intercolumniations; while the arabesques, with which the faces of the pilasters and pedestals are encrusted, present well-managed specimens of low relief. Two small pilasters standing over the columns of the arch, as well as the spandrils they enclose, and the friezes and soffits of the entablatures, are likewise distinguished by beautiful and delicately carved ornaments. The crowning compartments, along with the pyramidal finials and juvenile figures, are, however, the richest and most ingeniously devised of the sculptured compositions. Two of these extend along the entablatures of the elevation from the pilasters last mentioned, and a third surmounts that of the arcade. The two first are of course similar to each other, and somewhat resemble in outline the profile of a console. They are edged with bands of foliated scrolls, which are extended partially over the surface of the compartment in a few curvatures, and finish in spirited heads of nondescript animals with distended jaws. Combined with the scroll-work of each of the designs is a small trophy of martial weapons. Over the bounding columns of the elevation, and coinciding with the extremities of the compartments, are placed small half-draped juvenile figures. The figure above the right hand column is represented leaning with the left arm on an inverted flambeau resting on a skull: the other figure holds a spade in the right hand, and an apple in the left. These effigies, as well as the obelisks, to be shortly noticed hereafter, are about two feet in height. The former, unfortunately, have rather a grotesque appearance; the form of their heads, and the expression of their faces being considerably in advance of the undeveloped anatomy of their bodies. The outline of the central compartment is composed likewise of gentle curves ending in scrolls, the bands of which being partially foliated, and carried round the exterior lines, enclose the superficies with a sort of frame-work. The centre of the panel is occupied by a figure, of the form of which we can only say that it is composed of alternate round and hollow curves, and that the upper part of it rises above the outline of the compartment, and is finished with a plinth and ball. Within its limits are sculptured, the one surmounting the other, a mustachied mask, surrounded with rays, a winged sand-glass, and a female busto, ensigned, if the expression be admissible, with a crescent. A flaming vase, with torches in saltire over it, hangs from one of the scrolls on each side of these figures, from which is likewise suspended, but in another direction, a couple of violins. This ornate composition, (which it may not be amiss to repeat, is, as well as all the other parts just described, the same on both of the elevations,) is flanked by obelisks, or finials, but regarding which we have only to remark, that they are elegant in form, and elaborately carved. The crowning member of the monument, however, deserves to be more particularly noticed. It is of a pyramidal form, surmounted by a ball, and, though upwards of two feet in height, yet, from its situation, the transverse diameter of the monument, it is difficult to command a satisfactory view of it. Its sides are insculped with an ingenious variety of ornaments. One is allotted to musical instruments; another to martial gear, including a helmet and coat of mail; a third to several kinds of native fruit suspended by drapery; and the fourth is decked with emblems of mortality. The subjects are arranged or grouped with considerable address, and the workmanship, as on every other part of the monument, is free, spirited, and carefully finished.

The sculptured heraldry, and the inscriptions on the monument, have yet to be noticed. The former, consisting of eight shields of arms, occupies the divisions between the pedestals of the intercolumniations, the central ones excepted, which have been assigned to the inscriptions. The shields are of an elegant form, and cut within panels encased with frame-work composed of scrolls, foliage, heads of animals, and drapery, the carving of which must have cost more labour than the armorials enclosed. Two of the shields to the right of the arcade, of which there are four, including two in the lateral elevation, bear Montmerie of Skelmorlie, another, the same impaled with Sempil; and one is effaced. Two, on the left of the arcade, similarly disposed as the first just mentioned, bear Douglas of Drumlanrig, while, from the like number, decay has totally expunged the charges. One-half of the intervening pedestals, of which there are eight in all, besides other ornaments, the initials, S. R. M., and the other half, D. M. D., in raised characters, each of which, moreover, are repeated six times on other parts of the monument, besides being twice interlaced or combined into ciphers.*

Should the initials of Sir Robert, and his lady, appear repeated to satiety, but very narrow limits, on the other hand, have been allotted for their respective epitaphs; the tablets destined to this purpose measuring only eighteen inches by six. These are ornamented in the same style as the panels enclosing the armorials. The lettering on the tablet of the principal elevation, if it ever bore any, has, time out of mind, been completely effaced; but that on the opposite basement remains entire. Until very recently, this, too, was for many years obliterated by a coating of white-wash—which doubtless saved an occasional curious visitor the trouble of attempting to decipher it; a task, from the smallness of the character in which it is cut, the contraction of the terminations, and the complication of the letters, along with the closeness of

* Each, likewise, of these initials occur twice on the ceiling, and once over the entrance door, besides being extended in full below the emblazonment in the hexagonal panel, as already given: making reference thus, in all eighteen times, to the name of Sir Robert, and as often to that of his lady. The use of initials of names as sculptured ornaments, appears to have been peculiar to what is called the Elizabethan style of architecture, with the enrichments of which their forms better assort than with any other. Like the most of novelties, it was occasionally carried to an extreme, though this was an error attributable with greater justice to the architects of the period, than, as is frequently asserted, to the vanity and bad taste of their employers.

the tablet to the pavement, demanding some little patience. The annexed copy of this inscription may lay claim to some degree of accuracy; it presents, at least, the results of repeated efforts to attain it:—

Bis deo bisq decem transegi virginis annos;
Ter duo ter decem consociata viro
Et bis opem Lucina tulit. Mas Paris imago;
Spesq domus superest: Femina idvsa mori.
Clara genvs generosa, anima speciosa, decore,
Chara Deo vivia; nunc mihi cuncta Deus.*

The family vault, as already stated, is situated below the monument. To its low-browed door, which is placed between the central pilasters of the basement, access is obtained by a descent of several steps. The apartment is somewhat stinted in height, and is but obscurely lighted by a narrow aperture in the north wall. A kind of stone bench runs along the side walls, on which, besides two large coffins, and another of smaller dimensions entire, there are placed two broken ones, the contents of which having been embalmed. Such portions of them as still remain, are in a sufficiently shrivelled and repulsive state of preservation, and along with various disjecta membra of both sexes, and rotten fragments of faithless coffins, heaped promiscuously together in a corner of the vault, emphatically illustrate, the "sorry pre-eminence of high descent above the baser born, to rot in state." The two largest coffins are covered with lead, and contain the relics of Sir Robert Montgomery, and those of his Lady. That of the latter bears on the ends her family armorials, and on the cover in raised characters: Dame . Margaret Douglas . Spouse . To . Sir Robert . Montgomery. The coffin of Sir Robert is ornamented in a similar style, but

* This inscription, of which a free translation is subjoined, presents a very good specimen of the turn of thought displayed in epitaphian compositions, on persons of rank, two hundred years ago. It is made to personate the deceased, and represent her as speaking from the tomb; more, however, we apprehend, in the tone of a defunct gentlewoman, than in that of a humble christian, experienced in the vanity of those affections which are confined to earthly objects. The translation is as follows:—

"Twice times two, and twice times ten years I lived a virgin life; twice times three, and thrice times ten, I cohabited with a husband. Twice I required the assistance of Lucina. My husband was the image of Paris: he still survives as the hope of his house. I, the female, was alone destined to die. My birth was noble, my mind was brilliant, my heart was generous, my beauty was splendid. I was dear to God when alive, and now God is all to me."

In several respects, this epitaph is unsatisfactory: it does not embody the name of the person it commemorates, nor the year of her death; neither does it acquaint us with any thing regarding one of her children, of whom no mention is made by family genealogists, but who, it has been supposed, predeceased her mother by having been killed, as previously noticed, by an accident on the green of Largs. As it is stated in Wood's Douglas' Peerage, that Dame Margaret Douglas died in 1624, it would appear from the inscription that Sir Robert Montgomery and she were married in 1584, the year in which his father and eldest brother were killed by Patrick Maxwell of Newark, in revenge for their having shot Alexander Cuninghame, Commandator of Kilwinning, a son of the Earl of Glencairn, in the great feud betwixt the Montgomeries and the Cuninghames. Sir Robert survived his lady twenty-seven years, and if their ages were equal, he must have attained, in 1651, the year of his death, the venerable age of eighty-seven.

on the cover, instead of his name, there is the following inscription in latin:—

"Ipse mihi præmortuus fui, fato funera
Præcipui, unicum, idque Cæsareum,
Exemplar, inter tot mortales secutus."

Signifying, "I was dead before myself; I anticipated my proper funeral: alone, of all mortals, following the example of Cæsar," i. e. Charles V., who it will be recollected, had his obsequies performed before he died. The explanation usually given of the strange conceits of the inscription, is, that Sir Robert was a very pious man, and used to descend into the vault at night to perform his devotions, there burying himself, as it were, alive.*

* The following short memoir of Sir Robert Montgomery, from Robertson's "Genealogical Account of the Principal families in Ayrshire," though meagre in facts illustrative of his character, may not, perhaps, prove unacceptable to such as have not that work, or Douglas' Peerage, from which it is chiefly taken, at command. To us, the laconic description of the monument is not the least curious portion of the extract. Neither this, however, nor the notice of the painted ceiling, is original, both being borrowed verbatim from the report of the parish, drawn up for the old Statistical Account of Scotland, a work that has long served as a common quarry to topographical compilers, though the materials extracted from it have not, on every occasion, been of the first rate quality. The memoir is as follows:—

"Sir Robert Montgomerie of Skelmorlie came to the estate at an eventful period in the great feud betwixt the two families of Eglinton and Glencairn. For, in the spirit of the times, he had not only the death of his father and brother to avenge, but that also of the chief of his house, Hugh, the fourth Earl of Eglinton, who, about the same time was murdered by the Cuninghames, on the 19th April, 1586, near to Stewarton. Sir Robert set no bounds to his wrath, but indulged in it with such eagerness, as to occasion very much bloodshed of his enemies. For this he was afterwards seized with remorse, and in expiation performed many acts of charity and mortification in his latter days. He was knighted by James the VI., and was afterwards, in 1628, created a Baronet by Charles I. He married Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir William Douglas of Dramlanrig, (maternally descended of the house of Eglinton,) by whom he had a son, Robert.

He erected an elegant monument and funeral vault, in an aisle of the old church of Largs; and which still remains entire, although the church itself has been removed. This monument forms an arch and two compartments, supported by eighteen pillars of the Corinthian order, surmounted with cherubims. Above the arch is a small pyramid, finished at the top with a globe. It is very richly carved, and is highly admired for the great taste displayed. It was built in 1636, and must have been erected at a very great expense, even in those days. On the roof of the aisle are painted the twelve signs of the zodiac, and several views of the house of Skelmorlie, with that of the premature death of a lady of the family, who was killed by the kick of a horse. It is likewise adorned with several texts of scripture, and various escutcheons of the different relatives of that ancient family. Under this is the vault, in which are two niches, where, in leaden coffins, are deposited the remains of Sir Robert himself, and his lady, who died in 1624." The inscription on the coffin of Sir Robert is then added.

"This plainly alludes," continues the Genealogist, "to the Emperor Charles V., who had his funeral obsequies performed before his death; for Sir Robert himself becoming seriously affected in the latter part of his life, among other acts of mortification repaired hither at night for devotional meditation; and thus, as it were, burying himself alive. He died in 1651, after enjoying the estate of Skelmorlie during a period of 67 years."

GLIMPSES OF THE PAST—WITCHCRAFT.

[Second Article.]

SEVERAL circumstances conspired to render the reign of James VI. a favourable period for the prosecution of witchcraft. The occurrence of "piping times of peace" in a country accustomed, as Scotland then was, to almost perpetual warfare, as it would produce a blank both in the mental and physical employment of great numbers of the community, so it would leave them exceedingly apt to catch up and carry to a mania any popular feeling that might be cast upon the public mind. Then there was the general superstition of the time, and the ignorance of medical science, which led almost all diseases, especially if they were strange or epidemical, to be ascribed to demoniacal influence; and, added to all these, there was the half-superstitious, half-metaphysical mind of the monarch himself, giving a cast and colour to the whole—producing the "Daemonologie," and arming the witch-finders with a royal commission, so that there is little wonder, as has been sarcastically remarked, that the extent of Satan's invisible kingdom was discovered to be so vast.

We shall return to the trials of the witches at Aberdeen for further illustrations of the practices of that "treasonabill cryme." Some charges against "Helene Frasser," while they denote the low state of morals at the time, serve also to illustrate a feeling common to the human race since Adam, when accused of eating the forbidden fruit, said, "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat," viz., that of ascribing our sins to any or every thing rather than our own demerit. "Be witchcraft the said Helen abstractit and withdrew the luiff and affectione of vmquhill Andrew Lillidoff of Ranistoun, from his spous Issobell Cheyne, to Margerat Neilsoun, and sa mychtely bewitchit him, that he culd never be reconseillit with his wyif, or remove his effectioun fra the said harlote." And again: "Quhen Robert Merchand, in the Nevbrucht, had contractit mariadg, and haldin hous be the space of twa yeiris with vmquhill Christiane Quhyt, it happinit him to pas to the Murihill of Foverne, to saw corn to vmquhill Issobell Bruce, the relict of vmquhill Alexander Frasser, the said Helen Frasser beand familiar and actuall resident in the hous of the said Issobell, scho was thair at his cuming: Fra the quhilke tyme furthe the said Robert fand his affectione violentlie and extraordinarie drawin away from the said Christiane to the said Issobell, ane great luiff beand betuixt him and the said Christiane alwayis thairtofor, and na brak of luiff or discorde falling oute or intervenand vpon ather of thair partes: Quhilke thing the contre supposit, and spak to be brochte aboute be the vnlauchtfull travellis of the said Helen. Testified be said Robert." Helen seems to have been quite a mistress of charms, although it would appear she did not believe much in their power, for she "publictly confessit in Foverne, eftir hir apprehensionne, that she was a commonde abvser of the peple; and that, farther, to sustene hir self and hir barnis, pretendit knowledge quhilke she had not, and vnderuik to do thingis quhilke she culd nocht." The following are some of her charms: "The said Helen counsellit Christiane Hendersoune, vulgo callit mekil Cristane, to put hir ane hand to the crone of hir heid, and the other to the soill of hir fute, and so beteich quhatevir was between hir handis, to the Dewill, sche suld want nathing that sche wald wiss or desyr." "The said Christiane Hendersoune being Henwyiff in Foverne, the young foullis died thick; for remedie quhairof, the said Helen bade the said Christiane tak the hail cheikennis or young foullis, and draw tham throw the link of the cruik, and tak the heindnest and slay with ane fyrie stick, quhilke thing being practised, nane died thairafter that yeir." John Ramsay in Newburgh being "seik of a consuming disease," "Sche commandit the said Johne to arryiss wp airle in the morning, to eat sourakis aboute sounne rysing, quhill as the dew was wpone thame; sicklyke to eat valcars, and to mak cavrie kail and soupt. Mairower, to sit doune in ane dure, befor the fleing of the foullis to the roust, and oppin his breist, that quhen the foullis flaw to the roust ower him, he mycht resaeu the wind of thair wings aboute his harte, for that wes werrie profitable to lousse his harte pypis, quhilke wer closit. But befor his departure from hir, sche causit the said Johne sit doune, bear heidit, vpon ane stuill, and said ane orisounne thryiss vpon his heid, quhairin sche nominat the Devil." "The said Helen maid ane peccatioun with certane laxis fischearis of the Neubrucht, at the kirk of Foverne, in Mallie Skoynis hous, and promesit to causs thame fische weil, and to that effect resaut of thame ane peice salmoud to handle at hir pleassur for effectuating the mater. Wpone the morrow sche came to the Neubrucht, to the hous of umquhill Jone Fergusoune, a laxis fischear, and delyuerit unto him, in a cloute, four cuttis of salmond, with ane pennie; efter that sche callit him oute of his awin hous, fra the compaie that wes thair drinkand with him, and bad him put the samyn in the horne of his coble, and he sud have ane dosin of fische at the first schote; quhilke came to pas.

There seems to be no end to the forms in which "the Devill ther maister" appeared to his servants the witches. At one time we find him assuming "the liknes of a calf," at another the "liknes of a lamb;" sometimes "in liknes of ane fair angell, and clad in quhit claythis," and again "in the scheap of ane agit man, beirdit, with a quhyt gown and a thrummit hatt." Nor, in some cases, do the witches seem to have had much fear or respect for his Satanic majesty, for at the dance about the cross of Aberdeen, mentioned in our last article, Isobel Cockie is accused of being ring-leader at said dance, "nixt Thomas Leyis; and becaws the Dewill playit nocht so melodiouslie and weil as thou crewit, thou tuik his instrument out of his mouth, than tuik him on the chafis therwith, and plaid thi self theron to thi hail compaie."

It would appear that some epidemic disease was raging in and about Aberdeen in the years 1596-7, the common symptoms of which were, that the patient was "the ane half of the day rostin in his body as gif he had bene rostin in ane wne [ovin], with ane extreme birning and drwth, sua that he could never be satisfied of drink, the vther half of the day melting away his body, with ane extraordinar cald sweitt; or, as it is sometimes stated, at one time "melting awa lyke ane quibite candel;" and, at another time, "als wak as ane pair of gluffis" [gloves], or "als cald as isse." This sickness, of course, was all ascribed to witchcraft, and it may create a smile to observe the expressions used to denote the thirst occasioned by this disease. Janet Leang seems, through the instrumentality of Meriorie Mutche, to have "contractit ane deidly seikness," and is described as being "the ane half day sueting, birning, and suelling with ane vnsatiable drowth, swa that albeit ane burne of watter war at hir head, it culd nocht satisfie hir drouthe." While Walter Cruickshank, having fallen under the ban of Jonat Leisk's wrath, "be the space of xxxiii hours befor he inlaikit, be vertow of her deuilische witchcraft laid vpon him sa many wayis, he drank mair than xxxiii gallowins of wyne, aill, and watter, and wissit at he haid abilitie to haue gane to ane cauld wall, that he micht haue gottin watter to haue quencit his birning heat."

One of the charges against Margrate Clark suggests an extremely ludicrous idea. "In the yeir of God fourscore fyveteine yeiris, about the monthe of Apryle or thairby, thow being send for be the wyif of Nicoll Ros, fier of Auchlossin, sche being than lyand in hir cheild bed lair, and cuming to hir, thow caist the hail dolouris, seiknes, and pannes, quhilkis sche suld haue sustenit, vpon Andro Harper, qha, during all the time of hir troweling, was excedinglie, and mervelouslie troblit, in ane furie and madnes as it war, and could nocht be hauldin; and quho sone as the said gentlewoman was delyver of hir birth, the pannes departit from the said [Andro.]" We can fancy we see poor Andro rolling and graning, while the howdie and cummers are congratulating the guidwife vpon her easy delivery. Ether and Cloriform are but improvements upon the charm of Margrate Clark for the removal of the primeval curse.

We are afraid we would become tedious were we to quote all the cases of witches stopping mills, depriving kine of their milk, stilling the hurricane by "hinging vpe of a beittill be ane string or threid," preventing a neighbour's ale from working, or causing it to work over the vats; or how

"They would travel a' night in the shape of a hare,
Or elf-shoot a quey, or lame a grey mare,
Or gar an' auld wife ca' in vain at her kirm,
Loose the loops o' her stocking or ravel her pira."

Neither can we mention all their distinguishing marks, such as devil's pinches under the left pap, which would not bleed when pricked with a pin; nor their simple stock of implements, "to witt, all sort of thrwnis and threidis cutit, of all cullouris, with ane peice of cruickit weir, lyke ane fische buk," or figures of lead or wax to represent their victims. But we cannot withhold the following extract from "The comptis of the dearnie of Gild of the brught of Abirdene," which furnishes evidence of the fate of several of the witches from whose indictments our excerpts have been made: "Followis the debursementis maid be the Comptar at comand, and be virtow of the ordinance of the Pronest, Baileis, and Counsall, in the Birning and Sustentation of the Witches:

Imprimis, for eirding of Suppak, quha died in prisoun, vish. viiid.

Christen Mitchell, Bessie Thom, Issobell Barron, burnt ix March, 1597."

Such was the cruel fate of the victims of a puerile superstition, two hundred and fifty years ago. When another two hundred and fifty years shall have witnessed the grand marches of human progress, at which of our headlong prosecutions of pernicious fallacy will the stately men of the twenty-second century smile, as we now smile at the eager haste of our forefathers to convict a few old women of the impossible crime of witchcraft? Will our sanguinary criminal code meet their reprobation? or, living in perfect and universal harmony and peace themselves, will they wonder at our wars and bloodshed? Knit in one bond of universal brotherhood, will they marvel at our short-sighted international policies? Or, will they accuse us of our slavish worship of Mammon? Will they point out how we rear the arch and column in conspicuous places of our cities, until, to the superficial observer, they appear to be the sole components of the place; while, at the same time, in filthy courts and noisome alleys, poverty cowers over its dying embers in the wind-pierced, dilapidated hovel? And that, while in one street the tables groan with sumptuous feasts, and the glasses sparkle with costly wines; in the next, the starving wretches cannot obtain enough even of the coarsest fare to satisfy the gnawings of hunger; and the rude huzza of boisterous mirth, and the faint sighs of the famishing, rise together to the blue welkin!

Thank God! to redeem our memory in some measure, there are a few bright spirits among us, who give glorious premonition of the coming time. O! let us never denounce any one of these, even in his most tranced moment, as an idle visionary, or regard the warmest anticipation he ever gave as a foolish dream;

"But dream, or no dream, take it as it came:

It gave HIM hope,—it may give US the same.

And as bright hopes make the intention strong,

Take heart with him, and muse upon his song."

LETTERS FROM A PILGRIM IN SCOTLAND.

No. IV.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SCOTTISH JOURNAL.

SIR,—Fleein' Nancy [influenza], in revenge, I presume, for my 'revelations,' in the Witch of Torwood, has racketted me so that I have only now the pleasure of sending you No. IV. of my letters. I said I had a few 'curious things' regarding Falkirk. Leaving, therefore, the fairies and witches, I shall give you them.

I have secured a relic of 'long ago.' I cannot make out what it is, but shall endeavour to describe it. The relic is a piece of iron (I think) covered over with rude sculpture and inscriptions. I trace the following:—1. Various men and horses. 2. A noble looking rider kneeling to a rustic, the latter appearing surprised; the rider's horse behind. 3. Circle, with a young 'face' within the circle. 4. Figures—apparently rustics throwing other figures into a river: very curious implements of agriculture. 5. Trees. The inscriptions, (which I shall not venture to decipher,) surround the tableaux. This relic was entire at first, but now consists of three large, irregular pieces, weighing nearly 50lbs.

I shall be glad to show it to any readers of the Journal applying through you. The relic was found concealed under the floor of a mansion belonging to the Earl of Zetland, near Falkirk. The mansion, (Westfield), was repaired for a new tenant; and, in the 'gutting out,' this discovery was made. Many a legend clings to the mansion, which is very ancient. A man on a horse, without a head, rides 'round and round.' A remarkable thorn still fronts the road. There, agreeably to tradition, a wild boar met his fate from a 'gallant lance.' This thorn is protected by the 'leases' of centuries, and even in the present lease.

The relic may be sepulchral. I must add that various of the figures and the prominent knights wear 'kilches,' or kilts.

I was not a little grieved to find, on visiting the Avenue, i. e. the road, which leads from the Kerse to Grahamston, that the Yew planted on the exact spot where Sir John Graham, the 'right hand' of Wallace, fell, at the battle of Falkirk, was rooted out, so that no memento now exists of the hero. The yew was in the hedge of a garden attached to the cottage of Mr Peter Mungall, who holds it under Mr Robert Grosart farmer, Boddom.

I was told that the worthy farmer was compelled to 'root up' the yew. Mrs Mungall said to me that 'travellers cam frae a' airts, even i' the doid o' the nicht, an' cuttit bits o't, till naething but the stump stude, an' the laird wissed, since it wud a' gane ony way, to preserve it for his frien's. Stap oure the way, the laird's very kin, an' 'll gie ye as muckle as mak' a bicker.' I have a piece; but I deeply regret the necessity which removed this sacred yew. The 'Bairns o' Fa'kirk' would do well to raise a pillar, or some such memorial. Let it be remembered that the yew now destroyed occupied the very spot where Sir John Graham fell—the very spot once wet with his blood. His tomb, peculiarly requiring the chisel of Old Mortality, is in the parish churchyard.

This leads me to call the attention of the antiquary to the figures now mouldering away in the parish churchyard of Falkirk. They represent two knights and their ladies, of the family of Livingstone. William, Lord Livingstone of Callendar, and Lady Livingstone, were the devoted followers of the peerless Mary.* The Livingstones of Callendar, and their ancestors, had a vault in the aisle of the "Auld Kirk." The figures belonged to their tomb. Alas! alas! the Crescent triumphs over the Cross here; for, what with the rain and the tear and wear of irreverent feet, these interesting statues are rapidly perishing. Two of the figures lay within, and two without the church, down till 1827-8. I know not who authorised their present degradation and ruin. The knights are (rather were) clad in the harness which prevailed during the thirteenth, and towards the middle of the fourteenth century: the hauberk is tight at the waist, ailettes on the shoulders, and poleyns, or greaves, on the knees and elbows. Their legs are cased in two half-cylinders, opening and shutting at the side, similar to the famous Blanchfront effigy, and fastened by overlapping straps. Their shoes are scaled; the helmet is knocked off, and the neck wants the tippet of mail. Their swords are cross-hilted, and the sword hilts filigreed over with peculiar signa, probably cabalistic charms for the prevention of witchcraft, for such was a 'freit' in the age of chivalry. The skirts of the hauberk reach no farther than the top of the thighs, where it is encircled by a broad belt, and the joints of the cuisses, or thigh-pieces, with sheaths for the legs, are covered by the greaves at the knees. The hauberk consisted of a solid metal plate, (gone now,) opening in front, like a modern coat, and is void of all ornament, although there are slight traces of carving on the greaves. The head of one of the ladies is separated from the body, and the four figures are all chipped and defaced. Otherwise, they would have afforded a specimen of ancient defensive armour which would have excited a Dr Rush Meyrick. The strap of each spur is secured by a buckle, and the feet of one of the knights rest on a lion couchant—those of his lady on a greyhound. The hair of the ladies is parted on the brow, and braided on each temple. Their heads are covered by turban-shaped caps. Their gowns are run into a series of grooves, similar to those in fluted columns, and a mantle is wrapped round each, clasping at the throat. The breasts are protected by plates of metal. The farthest out figures are cruelly mutilated. The female is remarkable for square shoulders and tight-drawn waist. The knight (companion to this figure) is in scale armour, here and there discernible. From this I refer it to the twelfth century—1107 to 1138, in the former of which years the first trace of scale armour is observable on a coin of William the Lion; and the mixture of plate and mail, or the tight hauberk, was worn at the battle of the Standard, in 1138. The hands of all the figures are folded, palm to palm, on the breast, in the attitude of devotion.

* See Robertson, and many a ballad and song. One of the Queen's four Maries' was 'Mary Livingstone.'

I have said the tomb of Sir John Graham peculiarly requires the chisel of the 'haly' Covenantanter. I must not overlook that of Sir John Stewart. 'Tis a simple slab, with this epitaph—

Here Lies
a Scottish Hero,
Sir John Stewart, who was killed at the Battle of Falkirk
22d July 1298.

Being without protection, and on the very edge of the pathway towards the church—it also is wearing away. Who knows not the daring "deeds" of the leader of the archers of Selkirk? Hemingford assures us his enemies allowed him a "stalwart" arm. Let the "bairns o' Fa'kirk" stir their hearts with the following description of the camp previous to the battle:—

"Each soldier slept on the ground, using his shield for his pillow; each horseman had his horse beside him, and the horses themselves had nothing save cold iron, champing the bridles. Speir was held above speir, pynt on pynt, and the Scots like a castle stude."

Are the graves of the leaders of such heroes worthy of protection?

I am, Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
A. B. G.

Glasgow, 22d Dec. 1847.

REV. ALEXANDER SMITH, BANISHED TO ORKNEY IN 1668.

In Mc Gavin's edition of the Scots Worthies some particulars are given, from Murray's Literary History of Galloway, of "Alexander Smith," one of the sufferers for "conscience sake," during the reign of Charles II. Nothing like a complete biography of him, however, is to be found. At the Restoration, in 1660, he was minister of Colvend, in the Presbytery of Dumfries. He was ejected from his charge by the well-known act of 1662: and, having retired to Leith, he was there in the practice of meeting a few friends for social worship in his own house. In 1664 he was summoned before the High Commission Court, for keeping conventicles, and committed to prison. Having, according to Wodrow, given offence to Archbishop Sharp, by addressing him simply as Sir, he was treated with unrelenting severity. He was banished to the Shetland Isles, where he remained for four years. Having been ordered back to Leith, he arrived at Bruntisland on the 9th of July 1668, "from whence," says the work already mentioned, "he was taken by the magistrates of Edinburgh and committed to prison. What was his condition or deportment while here on this occasion, we are not informed, but in about a fortnight after we find that the place of his confinement was changed to North Ronaldshaw, one of the Orkney Islands."

The following extracts from the "Justices of His Maties. Peace Book of Records, No. 1," lately discovered in the Town Hall of Kirkwall, with which we have been kindly favoured, are interesting as illustrative of his second banishment. His letter to the Sheriff of Orkney is particularly so, and we should think extremely characteristic. It will be observed that the order of the Privy Council to the skipper of the ship, "James of Bruntilland," for the conveyance of Smith, is dated the 24th of July 1668, so that only fifteen days elapsed between his arrival at Bruntisland, on the 9th, and his reshipment.

Here follows Letter addressed thus :

"These are for the much honoured Patrick Blair of Little Blair Sherriff Depute of Orkney."

North Ronald Shaw August 20
1668.

Much honoured,

According to my promise these are to certifie that by the good hand of my God I am safely arrived in this place, all that were with me did assert they never had a more favourable passage. The poor inhabitants so many as I have yett seen have received me wt. much joy (as I apprehend) I intend, if the Lord will to preach Christ to them the next Lord's day wtout the least mixture of any thing that may smell of sedition or rebellion. If I be further troubled for yt., I resolve to suffer further wt. meeknes and patience. Honoured Sir I am so sensible of your respect yt. if I had anything worthie I would easily part wt. it, but qt. I have I give The great governor go. sits in heaven hath given you authority in this place, and hath gifted you wt. a competency of prudence and gravitie, I obtest your hor. as you will be answerable to him go. is appointed to be judge of quick and dead, that you stretch your self to the utmost to bear downe sin as swearing drunkenness, Sabbath breaking, &c. and to advance pietie and godlines in the peace and life of it for a dead formality will not doe the turne, Sleep not till you be awaked wt. the trumpets of the time, for most of them gives either no sound, or yt. qlk is verie uncertaine, hearken to the voice of conscience, Imagine frequently and seriously yt. you hear the last trumpet calling for the dead to arise and come to judgement, this meditation I am pr.suaded (by the blessing of God) will sett you upon reformation of heart and life as to your personall walk, and will make your honors familie become a Church for Christ and will make you in your station endeavour the cutting off of all evil doers from the citie of the Lord Sir I desire that the rotten hearted old man gett not liberties to vex these poor people that are not pleased wt. his dead way God hath a people there whose prayers and teares and groanes will be his ruine, if by repentance hee prevent it not qlk I beg of the lord hee may. However I am hopefull and assuaded your hor. hath frequently upon your heart—woe be to him yt. offends on of these little ones yt. believes in mee &c. There was never man a looser by befriending the seekers of God's face. But God's work and people in the world hath been a stutthie yt. hath broken many a hamer and it yett stands. Sir I crave pardon for this freedome. If there be any thing in it yt. gives just ground of offence, qlk. truly I intend not butt on the contrair, a sincere testimonie of love and respect. Sir though the certificat.ne of my sentence be such as may tempt mee to an escape, yett by the grace of God, it shall be seen yt. I have so much respect to the supreme and subordinate magistrate, as to obey their commands and to conforme myself wt.in this poor place except upon such occasions wherefore I may be answerable to God and the law of the land. I shall add no more but subscribe myself Sir

MINUTES OF IRVINE PRESBYTERY.

Our researches hitherto have been by no means so flattering to the clerical character and the enlightenment of the age as we could have wished. We have now to represent these in a more favourable aspect, and to display the zeal they evidenced in maintaining the rights of their order; in ascertaining the ground or groundlessness of calumny attaching to individuals of their body, and in prying, at the risk of whatever disgraceful exposures, into the crimes and failings of an erring brother.

"29th June, 1647.—Compeared Mr Alex. Dunlop, (late minister of Ardrossan,) desiring, because he was to go to Ireland, that he might have an extract of his deposition, and ane testimonial. The Presbytery, understanding that his request was altogether contrary to the acts of the kirk, does conclude, that till the said Mr Alex. Dunlop confess the fault wherefore he was deposed, and give evident signs of his repentance, that neither the extract of the act of deposition, nor yet the testimonial be granted to him."

"A visitation at Kilmaurs, 14th July, 1647.—The minister, Mr Wm. Cruiks, preached upon the 1st ch. Colossians, ver. 7, and had the directory upon the 19th Psalm, and was exorted to stir up himself that he might win nearer the case and condition of the people. The Session book being called for was produced by their clerk called Adam Simpson, and given to Mr Hugh M'Kaile to revise, who, after revising, reported that he had found two defects in it:—1st, That the whole process led against delinquents was not booked. 2d, That there was no count of the collections since the 43 year of God. The minister being removit the eldership was callit in, and the end of this day's meeting was signified unto them; as also public intimation was made to the whole parish, That if any of them had any thing to say either against the minister or the elders they must appear; after intimation three persons following gave in their grievances:—1st, James Cuninghame regretted that he as an elder had delated a gross scandal to the Session, and they would not take notice of it except he had produced 40s., and obliged himself to make it good. 2dly, He regretted that ane woman was enjoined to stand three several Sabbaths in the public place of repentance in her linens, notwithstanding whereof she was receivit on the third day in the body of the kirk, out of her own seat. 3dly, He regretted that persons over taken with drunkenness upon the Lord's-day were too easily passed by, no more requirit of them than their repentance in their own seat. Alex. Jamie regretted that drunkards upon the Sabbath day, and breaches of the same, were not condignly punished. Rob. Templeton made similar complaints, and that the minister did not visit the parish sufficiently, that the Sabbath was not sanctified as he could wish, and that the minister when he did visit the sick did it perfunctorously, &c. The rest of the elders being removit, the laird of Thornton was called upon, deponit as follows:—1st, He regretted that the minister came not nearer the people's cases. He declared that there was no weeks preaching—that there was no catechising except once in the year—that in his catechising he is weak—that they could hardly get the communion celebrate once a year—that their Session is very thin and weak, and many members of the Session had withdrawn themselves, &c., &c., &c.,—that in his life he is blameless and affable in receiving those of his people that came to him. Thomas Thompson, Cuthbert Andrew, The Goodman of Hill, and Wm. Steel, gave similar testimony—the last that he ascribed a good deal of the minister's deficiency to the weakness of his body, and regretted that ane elder, James Gaut, declared in Session that ane of the parish, callit Wm. Biggart, called the minister an atheist, and all who heard him atheists likewise. James Gaut being called for declares himself satisfied with his minister in every point except in the visitation of families, whilk he could wish were more carefully done. James Gaut farther stated that Biggart had said that the minister had preached a lie, and that the minister was an atheist, and all who heard him atheists. The rest of the elders, being called in cumulo, in one voice regretted the minister's weakness, and desired ane helper. The minister being called in answered the different charges made against him, and regretted that some of his elders did not support him as they ought to do. The Presbytery very gravely rebuked both minister and elders. The minister made complaint against Wm. Biggart for the reasons above stated. Biggart ordered to appear before the Presbytery and answer for his conduct. The Laird of Craig, charged with complying with the enemy, having been too easily cleared by the minister, was called in and censured, that by his threatening and boasting he had abused the minister's simplicity, &c.,—both being removed, they were again called in and very stivly and sharplic rebukit, Craig for his unorderly way of talking of himself, whilk was very offensive both to the Presbytery and congregation; and Mr William was rebuked for his simplicity. Craig very ingenuously confessit before the Presbytery his complying with the enemy, that he had been at James Graham, his league at Ayr, and at Loudonhill, and was absolvit."

"15th Sept., 1647. The Presbytery, in terms of the Assembly's ordinance, ordains that a thanksgiving be solemnly kepted the last Lord's-day of this instant for yir causes: 1st, That the Lord hath been pleased to grant so glorious a victory to our army employed against the rebels in the hielands. 2dly, That in the time of England's confusions, and our fears from them, it has pleased the Lord to give us the benefit of a General Assembly, which, with great unanimity, has issued forth a public declaration againts the errors in England. 3dly, That the Lord hath been graciously pleased to keep the pestilence from spreading over the face of the land, &c., &c. Mr John Nevoy is returned from the army, and gave the brethren hearty thanks for their care in supplying his kirk in the time of his absence. Wm. Biggart in Kilmaurs, (after a number of witnesses had been examined to prove the charges against him which he denied,) being summoned to this diet to receive his censure, compeared, and offered to prove his whole allegation. Being posit what were the lies he affirmed the minister had preached, he answered that he had not made Joseph swearing by the life of Pharoeh and iniquitie, being further posit how he could prove him to be an atheist, he answered that he did not keep family worship in his house ordinarily. (N.B.—This charge completely disproved by evidence of the minister's servants.) That he did not reprove vice in the town of Kilmaurs—that he goes not to hear other ministers preach, all which he conceived to be points of atheism. The Presbytery finding that what he alleged was frivolous and groundless, as was cleared at the visitation of Kilmaurs, orders, before censure be given him, sundry clergymen to deal with him to bring him to a sense of his scandalous and malicious railing upon the servant of God, &c., &c. Biggart, after giving a great deal more trouble, and disobeying the orders of the Presbytery at last, on 20th June, 1648, finds that the process was at the point of excommunication, delays procedure till next day. 22d August, the process is found formal and closed. 22d Sept., the pronouncement of the sentence of excommunication delayed against Biggart, and case continued, because of the present troubles and the fewness of the brethren who were at home. 17th Oct., the sentence of excommunication against Biggart ordered to be pronounced against him upon Sabbath come twenty-days, in case he do not humbly submit himself to the Presbytery, and that the minister of the place shall do so. 13th Feb., 1649, Biggart appeared before the Presbytery, and gave in a paper agreeing—1st, To submit to censure for his obstinacy; 2d, That he had wronged the Presbytery in standing out so long; 3dly, Admitted that he had wronged the minister in calling him an atheist. The Presbytery, considering the confession not full enough, delayed till next meeting. 20th Feb., Biggart appeared before the Presbytery, and acknowledged the charges against him; and that he had spoken unchristianly in calling his minister a preacher of lies, upon sic a feckless ground as he had done—ordered to humble himself before the Presbytery, which he did; and farther that he stand two Lord's days in the place of public repentance in his ordinary habit, and be absolved.

26th Oct., 1647.—Collections ordered for Largs, where the people were very destitute. Some individuals in the bounds of the Presbytery having gone into England and got married, contrary to the order of the kirk, the General Assembly to be applied to for instructions how the Presbytery are to proceed in censuring the said persons. Sums collected for Largs:—From New Mills, 152 pounds, 2s. 4d. From Irvine, 200 merks; Kilmaurs, 102 merks; Kilbirnie, 50 pounds. From Stewarton, 111 pounds; Kilwinning 100 pounds; Dreghorn, 43 pound 8s.; Dalry, 43 pound 20 merks; Ardrossan, 50 merks. From Perston, 40 pound viii merks. Three clergymen appointed to speak to the Erie of Eglinton anent the plantation of Perston."

24th Nov., 1647.—At a visitation of the kirk of Kilbride, Mr Geo. Crawford, the minister, exercised upon 14th cap. of Hosea, and preached on 4th of John, and being removit, the brethren declared themselves satisfied with neither. The elders, and also the whole parish, called on to say if they had any thing to say against their minister—an libel was given in against him."

18th Jan., 1648.—John Thomson being able to speak the Irish tongue perfectly, the Presbytery agree to allow him 100 merks per annum, to sustain him at schools with this proviso, in case it shall please the Lord to bring him through, that he may be useful in the kirk of God—that he shall follow a call to the Highlands. When in the Lord's own time it shall be offered to him, whilk the said John assents to."

"At Kilbride, 26th Jan., 1648, to hear witnesses in the charges against Geo. Crawford, the minister. He offers to make certain confessions, viz:—1st, That he did administer the sacrament of baptism thrice without ordinary preaching—one time at a marriage, read only a piece of a chapter and expounded it—at another time did baptize two bairns, and did expound only a piece of a psalm—and a third time had nothing but prayer. 2dly, That he did read the Assembly's acts upon a forenoon, and made it serve for a preaching. 3dly, That he did not enjoin Alex. Cunninghame, younger, to make his repentance for fornication, but knew it not till long after he was married. 4th, He confesses that no worldly affairs should have drawn him so oft away from his charge. 5th, He confesses that sometimes in a passion he said in faith, and in conscience, but it was only in his own house. 6th, He confesses that he received money for making of testaments (wills). 7th, That he rode from Glasgow to Kilbarchan upon ane Sunday morning before sermon. 8th, That he desired the people of Newton, upon the Lord's-day, to come and till his glebe upon the Monday, but it was 12 or 13 years since at least. 9th, That upon ane Sabbath day, at ten hours of evening, he went to ane Cordoner and desired him to have his boots ready against the Monday morning early. The confessions being heard the Presbytery, according to the desire of the said Mr George, did condescend upon some more points of the libel to be proven, sic as his carriage towards his wife and family—his fearful cursing—his profaneing the Lord's-day, &c. The following witnesses deponed:—1st, A. Cunninghame, younger of Carlung, that the minister knew that he (Cunninghame) was guilty of fornication, and he had confessed it to him after marriage, and he did not call him to account for it. Farther, that the minister frequently made use of oaths, and that he is a common curser in sic words as devil take him, &c.—that he had sat in ane ale-house till seven pints were drunken—that one of the company made the rest merry with sundry oaths, and with some bauldie speeches, and the minister did not reprove him, but did laugh as fast as the rest—that the minister had drawn up a certain act at a meeting of the parish, which he denied having in his possession, although he was afterwards obliged to admit he had the document—that upon a Sabbath day he went from Kilbride to Hunterston about a marriage, and afterwards went to an ale-house, and there drank healths till mid-night—to the parties good luck—and albeit he received favor from the Cooper, yet the chamber floor where he lay could verfy what had been his Sabbath night's carriage. The article being read, and Alex. Cunninghame examined upon the same, he attests the whole except his vomiting, and this was about eleven years since. Farther, that about 10 years ago he paid the minister his teinds upon Sabbath day after preaching, and got a discharge from him—that upon another Sabbath he and the bellman came to Carlung and prigged about some kyne, but did not buy any. Rob. Gray deponed that the minister reproved some of his people who followed ministers who were teachers of novelties and new doctrine and left the old way, and said that meikle preaching makes people worse, and that homeliness spoils courtesy; for to be over homely, says he, with God's word, makes people count the less of it. That the minister railed upon those who went from his preaching to others, calling them brain-sick, giddy-headed, and given to the itch of the ear; and also some other charges as to his homeliness in preaching—that he passed delinquents too easily—that he seldom uses any spiritual communication—and that he had flatly denied, with a protestation to God, having the document above referred to, but afterwards he did produce it. Hunterston, younger, a witness, (was objected to by the minister, that he, and also Cuninghame, younger, a witness, were contrivers of the charge against him, and had enmity against him, allowed to give evidence.) He confirms the statement of Gray as to his slackness in discipline. Farther, that the minister mixed the communion wine with water to the common people, and kept it unmixed to the gentry. Farther, that there was not a week almost in all the year but Mr George raged, and that his wife regretted to him how very heavily her husband struck her—that he heard Mr George say often ex fide, bona fide, and as I shall answer to God; and farther, he heard him say by the firmament and coram deo; farther that there was a man in an ale-house with him—that both curst and spake bauldie language, which Mr George did not reprove—that he (Mr George) denied, with a protestation to God, that there was such an act as the one referred to above, and that after he denied it he produced it, to the grief of sundry who beheld it—that he (the minister) came down to witnesses father's house on a Sabbath day, seeking his counsel about the fewing some rowmes in Monkton. Ann Stevenston depones that being his servant four years ago, she saw Mr George strike his wife with his hands and his feet, and that she had heard him swear. Isobel Fairie, a former servant, about three years ago, gave similar evidence to the last witness. Margaret Wilson, a former servant, also deponed that she heard about a year since Mr George (the minister) swear horribly—that she never heard aue swear like him, and that very often, and that she never served the like of him. Three other witnesses depone as to his applying to them on Sabbath days about tilling the ground, purchasing a horse, &c.—that some of the matters deponed to happened seven years ago. The Presbytery in the meantime find as much proven as to merit the censure of suspension, and accordingly do so during their pleasure."

"1st March, 1648. Mr Geo. Crawford appeared, and prayed that if the points already proven did not merit deposition, he earnestly desired they would surcease the suspension. He also admitted the truth of several of the minor charges against him. The Presbytery agreed to hear some farther points in debate."

"14th March, 1648. Mr George Crawford this day deposed."

THE LORDS OF PRIVY COUNCIL TO KING JAMES VI., AS TO SIR JAMES MACDONALD'S REMISSION.

[Sir James Macdonald was the chief of the Macdonalds in Isla. He was a restless person—continually in rebellion; and ultimately was apprehended, and condemned to loose his head, 12th May, 1609. But James pardoned him. He died in 1626. Strange to say, this unscrupulous chieftain was addicted to reading and book-collecting. He complains bitterly that Lord Athole had robbed him of "Parsons Three Conversions of England, Nicol Burnes Disputation, and the meikle old Cornikle in verse."]

LORD CRICHTOUNE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SCOTTISH JOURNAL."

Sir,—The following is an attempt to narrate, in the style of the old Scottish ballads, a tradition which has been long current in the neighbourhood of New-Hall, near Penni-cuik, in Mid-Lothian.—If the thing appears worthy of a place in your Journal, it is respectfully at your service.
I may mention that there are other two versions of the story, which represent the main incident as having happened accidentally; but I have chosen the third, which represents it otherwise, as being more in keeping with the "poetical justice" of the catastrophe.—I am, &c.

11 Hill Street, Anderston, W. G.
Glasgow, 16th December, 1847.

Lord Crichtoun, in his hunting gear,
Gaed fiercely through the Ha'; (1)
While dogs and vassals, crouching near,
Attend his lordly ca';

"Gae bring the little varlet forth!
Gae bring him forth wi' speed!
Though a' my kin were in his coat,
This day I gar him bleed!

Now, Willie was a little page—
A page of beauty rare;
Fu' ruddy, ruddy were his cheeks,
And yellow was his hair.

But Willie was a wanton chit,
And fu' o' mirth and glee:
And he has ta'en a hinney pear
Frae Crichtoun's marked tree.

Thus Crichtoun's brow is swol'n and red;
And he has aithed fu' hie—
By ash, and thorn, and haly-rood,
That little Will shall dee!

Upon the tree which he hath robb'd,
"The varlet brat shall hing!"
Out then bespak his mother dear,
Upon her knee louting—

"My Willie is my only joy,
Beside him, son, I've nane,
O, wha will cheer my widow'd heart
When Willie's dead and gane?

"When age and want bow down my head,
Wha then my help will be?
O, spare him for his mither's sake
Who ne'er did wrang to thee!

"His father fell on Flodden Field,
When England wan the day;
And a' to aave thy father's life—
Lord Crichtoun, let him gae!"

"Hae dune, hae dune, thou fule woman!
Why hinder ye the chase!
Haste, hing him up, good John o' the Rape,
Frae me he gets nae grace."

"O, haud me up my mither dear!
O, haud me by the knee!
O, haud me up, my mither dear,
I'm oure young yet to dee!"

Lord Crichtoun smiled a grisly smile,
That garred the hangman grue;
"I prithee hold, good John o' the Rape,
Thus far to her I rue;—

"If she shall bear his body up
Frae this, to set o' sun,
I gie his life in her ain haun,
That she may lose or win."

"O, wae betide you, Lord Crichtoun!
O, wae betide your kin!
How shall I bear his body up
Frae dawn to set o' sun?

"How shall I bear his body up
A lee-lang simmer day?
A cruel, cruel lord ye be—
And mony ye've made wae.

"But may nae coming race o' thine
Upo' this earth be born,
To trample sae God's holy laws,
And treat the poor wi' scorn.

"And be the high, insulted Heavens
Aye deaf to thine and thee;
And never mercy to ye shawn,
As ye hae nane for me!"

Lord Crichtoun heard the widow's curse,
But answer made he nane;
To chase the deer on Pentland hills
He dauringly has gane.

And lang the widow held her son—
Till langer it micht na be;
Till she lay dead upon the grun'
And he hung on the tree!

And now the deadly wrath o' Heaven,
That burns, and burns for aye,
Fa's heavy on the tyrant's head—
Lord Crichtoun, "he is fey!"

And fast he drinks the blood-red wine,
And fensies mirth and glee;
But the sparkle o' the blood-red wine
Nae mair lights up his e'e.

And now he weds a fair, fair dame,
In youth and beauty's pride;
A comelier pair might na man see,
When they ride side by side—

But, in their secret joys o' love,
A joyless pair they be;
The lady pines in her painted bower—
She sits wi' an empty knee!

And now he bows in haly kirk,
Wi' meikle dool and pine;
While mony a haly mass is said
In gude Sanct Mungo's shrine; (2)

And now he's gane to Italy,
Out owre the saut sen faem,
Frae a foreign lan' and the Pope's ain han',
To bring redemption hame;

But the deadly might o' the widow's blight
Nae priest or Pope could saine;—
Frae Eskdale bowers and New-Hall's towers
Lord Crichtoun's race is gane!

(1) New-Hall House is situated on the south-western confine of Edinburghshire, about nine Scots or twelve English miles from the metropolis. It stands at the head of the valley of Mid-Lothian, near the foot of the Pentland Hills, with the North Roke (there a small stream) running behind it in a deep glen of great picturesque beauty. The present mansion is comparatively modern, but includes within its walls a portion of what was, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, a baronial castle, belonging to a family of the name of Crichtoun, ancestors, maternally, of the Earls of Dumfries. The tradition refers to the last Lord Crichtoun. After his death the lands appear to have become the property of the Church, and the Castle to have been converted into a religious house, or hospital. At the Reformation the property was again secularized, and it is supposed then to have received its present designation of "New Hall." It was long in the possession of the Pennicuiks, representatives of the Pennicuiks of that Ilk, (viz. of the adjoining estate) till in 1703 it was purchased by Sir David Forbes, uncle to the celebrated President Forbes of Culloden. Sir David afterwards became the friend and patron of Allan Ramsay, and New-Hall was thenceforward fated to become classic ground, by affording materials for the plot, characters and scenery of Ramsay's admired Scottish pastoral, "The Gentle Shepherd."

(2.) In the life of Sir John Clerk of Pennicuik, in the 'Scots Magazine' for June 1802, it is mentioned that "the former name of the parish of Pennicuik was that of St Kentigern or Mungo, the same to whom the Cathedral Church of Glasgow was dedicated. A religious house, or hospital, near the site of the present New-Hall, endowed with considerable landed property, is supposed to have held most of the surrounding district."

PERILOUS SITUATION.—In September last, (October 27, 1764,) the Princess Caroline custom-house-yacht, Capt. John Read, sailed from Leith for Lerwick in Shetland, with two customhouse-officers on board, to be stationed there. The ship being old and crazy, they sprung a leak, and were obliged to put in at Peterhead to refit. On the afternoon of the day they sailed from thence, either by the pilot's mistake, or by the haziness of the weather, they found themselves among the breakers on the main land of Shetland; and to avoid immediate destruction, pushed into a small bay, surrounded on all sides with rocks of a stupendous height. Here they luckily struck on a sand-bank. In the midst of their consternation, a faithful negro, whom Capt. Read had brought from the South seas, swam off with a rope in quest of dry ground. This he found; though by the sea-mark on the rocks, it was evident that it was many feet under water at full tide. By the assistance of the rope, they all left the ship, except one of the officers before mentioned, who being old and corpulent, chose rather to stay on board: they had lost their boat before. They then endeavoured in vain to climb the rock, and the advance of the tide redoubled their terror. At last the negro discovered a cleft, by which they might ascend the rock above high-water mark. This cleft terminated in a hollow or grotto, where they all took up their night's abode. Next morning at ebb they descended to reconnoitre their situation; and found that the rocks were inaccessible; nor could they any ways get round, as the rocks forming a semicircle extended on both sides far into the sea. They then in despair returned to their ship; where they found the officer they left on board, upon the main shrouds; from whence he had scarcely been ten minutes, before the mast came by the board, and was followed by the foremast. And now the hull worked so that they all resolved to leave her again; which they did with much difficulty; and had not been long on shore before she went to pieces. Thus they were to all appearance reduced to the alternative of starving or drowning; which carried them to a more minute examination of the rocks; when one of the sailors found a place which seemed to offer the bare possibility of ascent at the hazard of his neck: which however, in their circumstances, was no hazard at all. He mounted, carrying a rope with him, and fastened it to the top, by which the rest got up after him. Thus being contrary to all hopes delivered, half naked and almost perished, they sought and found a hut, where they reposed themselves, and after procured a conveyance to Lerwick. —This, though a seemingly romantic relation, is in every circumstance strictly true.—'Scots Magazine,' 1764.

QUEEN MARY'S DOMESTIC LIFE.—The queen took up her residence at Hampton Court permanently, for the summer, in the commencement of July. The manner of life led there by her and her spouse is dimly remembered by tradition. When the king used to walk with her across the halls and courts of that antique place he never gave the queen his arm, but hung on hers, and the difference of their size and stature almost provoked risibility. The king every day seemed to grow smaller and leaner beneath the pressure of the cares which his three crowns had brought him; while Mary, luxuriating in her native air, and the pleasures of her English palaces, seemed to increase in bulk every hour. She took a great deal of exercise, but did not try abstinence as a means of reducing her tendency to obesity. She used to promenade, at a great pace, up and down the long straight walk, under the wall of Hampton Court, nearly opposite to the Toy. As her majesty was attended by her Dutch maids of honour, or English ladies naturalised in Holland, the common people who gazed on their foreign garb and mein named this promenade "Frow" walk: it is now deeply shadowed with enormous elms and chesnuts, the frogs from the neighbouring Thames, to which it slants, occasionally choosing to recreate themselves there; and the name of Frow-walk is now lost in that of Frog-walk. The pleasures of the Dutch monarch were not of a sociable kind; he neither loved the English nor English manners, but preferred Dutch smoking parties, with closed doors, guarded from all approach by foreign soldiers, with pipes in their mouths, and partisans grasped in their hands. The daily routine of the life of William and Mary is only preserved in squibs and lampoons; among these manuscripts, detestable as they are in construction and metre, some lost traits are found.

HAMPTON-COURT LIFE IN 1689.

Man and wife are all one, in flesh and in bone
From hence you may guess what they mean:
The queen drinks chocolat, to make the king fat;
The king hunts, to make the queen lean.

Mr Dean says the grace, with a reverend face,
"Make room!" cries Sir Thomas Duppá:
Then Bentinck up-locks his king in a box,
And you see him no more until supper.

The regal dinner-hour was half-past one, or two at the latest, and breakfast was at an hour virtuously early. Queen Mary, like every one descended from Lord Chancellor Clarendon, with the exception, perhaps, of her uncle, Henry, Earl of Clarendon, indulged in eating rather more than did her good; her enemies accused her of liking strong potatoes. The elegance of her figure was injured by a tendency to rapid increase, on which the satires and lampoons of her political opponents did not fail to dwell; she was scarcely twenty-eight years of age when she became Queen of England, but her nymph-like beauty of face and form was amplified into the comeliness of a tall, stout woman. Among the valuable collections of Colonel Braddyll, at Conishead Priory, Lancashire, was preserved a very fine miniature of William III. delicately executed in pen and ink etching. It is a small oval, laid on a back ground of white satin, surrounded with a wreath of laurel embroidered in outline tracery in his royal consort's hair, surmounted with the crown-royal. The frame is of wood, curiously carved and gilded, and at the foot is a circular medallion, radiated and enclosed in the ribbon of the garter, containing also, under a fair crystal, Queen Mary's hair, which is of a pale brown colour, and of an extremely fine and silky texture. At the back of the picture, Queen Mary has inscribed, on a slip of vellum, with her own hand—"My haire, cut off March y 5th, 1688." Under the royal autograph is written, "Queen Mary's hair and writing."—"Lives of the Queens of England."

THE TANISTRY AND BREHON LAWS OF IRELAND.

THE expedition of Strongbow, in 1162, was undertaken at the instance of an Irish chief, or petty king, who fled the country to elude the punishment due to his crimes. This criminal had the address to prevail on the king of England, to allow his vassals to assist him in the recovery of his district, or province, on condition that all the lands that might thus be acquired by the allies, should be held by them as the vassals and liege subjects of England.

When Macmurragh and his allies landed in Ireland, their ostensible object being the adjustment of a feud between two Irish septs, or clans, the other clans could not interfere without violating "the Celtic principle of disunited independence."* Nor had the patriarchal constitution foreseen or provided a remedy for such a contingency—for the authority of the king, or pendragon, only came into action when the whole nation was menaced, and found it necessary to take the field. In this consisted the weakness of the clan system, which was essentially a system of equity and peace.

Had the king of England proclaimed war against Ireland, and entered the country at the head of his embattled nation, as became his station and his power, the result in all probability would have been better for both nations. In this case, the Irish would have been afforded an opportunity of fighting for their freedom, as a united nation; and, in the event of their fall, the conqueror would have had the title as well as the power to impose his own laws effectually on a subdued and conquered people. But, unhappily for both nations, the king of England seems to have known the strong as well as the weak points of the clan system, and adopted the short-sighted and unworthy policy of working his ends by taking advantage of the latter. He accordingly stood aloof until Macmurragh and Strongbow formed the foundation of the Pale: and from that day until the reign of James the VI. the policy to which the first expedition owed its success seems, with little variation, to have been persevered in, for gradually drawing the whole country, district after district, and clan after clan, under its influence.

From Spenser's account of the Tanistry and Brehon laws of Ireland, it would appear that when Edward Bruce landed in Ireland, the Pale had, by these means, been so extended as to include the whole country "from Dunluce, and beyond, to Dublin, having, in the midst of her, Knockfergus, Belfast, Armagh, and Carlinford."

"Edward le Bruce," as he is called by Spenser, with his "Scots and red shanks," soon changed the face of affairs; and had he only been as cautious as he was brave and skilful, the Irish might then, in all probability, have recovered the Pale. Spenser's work was published in 1596. "The said Edward le Bruce," continues Spenser, "spoiled and burnt all the old Pale inhabitants; and sacked and razed all corporate towns and cities." He wasted Belfast, Greencastle, Killis, Baltarbet, Castletown, Newtown, and many other good towns and strongholds. He rooted out the noble families of the Audlies, Talbots, Tuchets, Chamberlains, Maundvilles, and the Savages out of the Ardes." In short, such was the blow given to the Pale by Edward Bruce, that she had not recovered anything like her former power even at the time at which Spenser wrote—nearly three hundred years afterwards—for her utmost boundary at that time reached only "to Dundalk." Pity it is that the brief and bright career of Edward Bruce, in Ireland, has not met with a suitable historian.

Spenser informs us that, "In a parliament holden in the time of Anthony Saint Leger, Lord Deputy, all the Irish Lords and principle men came in; and being by fair means moved thereunto, acknowledged King Henry" (VIII.) "for their sovereign Lord, reserving (as some say) unto themselves their own former privileges and seignories inviolate." This fact shows that Ireland had not at this date been conquered by England.

Both parties seem to have misunderstood one another as to the extent and effect of this submission. The English statesmen appear to have conceived that the chiefs and chieftains of Ireland had the same despotic power over the clans which the lords and barons had over their vassals and serfs; and they accordingly concluded that, when they obtained their consent to the sovereignty of the king of England, the whole nation was at once reduced to subjection. The Irish, on the other hand, meant that the sovereignty of the king of England, in Ireland, should be limited within the bounds prescribed by the cleachda. This is to be inferred from the reservations under which they agreed to the sovereignty, as above described. Indeed, the chiefs and chieftains, as we have shown in former communications, had no power beyond that conferred on them by the cleachda. The chiefs and chieftains, accordingly, agreed to the sovereignty of the king of England in the Celtic sense of the word; and consequently under the reservation of "their own former privileges and seigniories inviolate."

Had English statesmen, at the above period, understood the character and institutions of the Irish, they would, perhaps, have advised the king to be contented with the limited sovereignty tendered to him by the chiefs and chieftains of the people, who, in that case, would, no doubt, have got him elected sovereign of Ireland in a convocation of the nation—for it could not, according to their laws, be done by any section of the people.

That they were entirely ignorant of the laws and institutions of Ireland, and of the resolute adhesion of the people to them, is evidenced by the work of Spenser, from which we quote the following extracts, in the form of a dialogue between Eudot and Iren. Eudot, in reference to the above submission, or treaty, observes—"By acceptance of this sovereignty, they also accepted of his laws. Why then should any other laws be now used amongst them?" To this Iren very complacently replies, "True it is, that thereby they bound themselves to his laws and obedience. Eudot. Do they not still acknowledge the submission? Iren. No, they do not: for now the heirs and posterity of them which yielded the same, are (as they say) either ignorant thereof, or do wilfully deny or stedfastly disavow it." "They say their ancestors had no estate in any of their lands, seigniories or heridaments longer than during their lives," "for all the Irish held their lands by Tanistry."

Eudot is, of course, greatly astonished at this answer, and exclaims,—"What is that which you call Tanisht and Tanistry? They be names and terms never before heard of or known to us. Iren. It is a custom among the Irish that, immediately after the death of any of their chief lords or captains, they do assemble themselves unto a place generally appointed and known unto them, to choose another in his stead, where they do nominate and elect, for the most part, not the eldest son, nor any of the children of the deceased, but the next to him of blood, that is the eldest and the worthiest, as commonly the next brother unto him, if he have any, or the next cousin, or so forth, as any is elder in that kin or sept. And then, next to him, do they choose the Tanisht, who shall next succeed him in the captaincy, if he live thereunto."

It will be seen by the above, that the Irish, like the Highland clans, kept the offices of chief and Tanister separate and distinct, the one from the other—the former being the military commander, and the latter, the trustee of the civil rights or tenures of the clan. Hence, in the Highlands, the chief, at the inauguration, received a sword, and the Tanister a wand, as the symbols of their office. Spenser, in a subsequent quotation, says,—the chief, in Ireland, received a wand; but we suspect this must be a mistake, or that the elective ceremony he describes was that of the Tanister—as the patriarchal laws of all nations, being derived from the same source, were in all probability everywhere the same. The Tanister, as above observed, held the lands in trust for the clan and their posterity, to whom they belonged in common. Thus the chief represented the clan in their military, and the Tanister in their civil capacity—as is indicated in the previous answer, where it is stated, that "their ancestors had no estate in any of their lands, seigniories or heridaments," which they held "by Tanistry"—that is, the Tanister held, by virtue of his office, the whole lands in trust for them and their posterity.

Spenser gives the following description of the forms attended to in the election of a chief or Tanister. "They use to place him that shall be their captain upon a stone always reserved for the purpose, and placed commonly on a hill. In some of which I have seen, formed and engraven, a foot, whereon he, standing, received an oath to preserve all the ancient former customs of the country inviolable; and to deliver up the succession peacefully to his Tanisht; and then hath delivered unto him a wand, by some whose office that is; after which, he, descending, turneth himself round and boweth thrice forward and thrice backward." "I have heard," continues Spenser, "that the beginning and cause of this ordinance was specially for the defence and maintainance of the lands in their posterity, and for excluding all innovation or alienation thereof to strangers." "Hence they say, as erst I told you, that they reserved their titles,* tenures and seigniories whole and sound to themselves."

There is sufficient evidence here that the aboriginal inhabitants of Ireland had, by their patriarchal laws, entailed their lands on their whole posterity, by forms the most clear, public and solemn, so as to render the misrepresentation or misapprehension of the nature of heritable tenures in that country impossible. Our Celtic ancestors are represented by parties (who seem to have taken extremely little pains to satisfy themselves as to the truth of their statements) as barbarians; but we greatly question whether their patriarchal.

* A gentleman who, about twenty years ago, employed a great many Irishmen in agricultural improvements, had among the number the lineal descendant of an Irish chief. So high were the feelings and manners under the clan system, that, even to this day, the politeness of many among the labouring classes in Ireland and the Highlands has more than once been remarked upon by intelligent travellers. The person referred to was not an exception in this respect; and, his influence over his countrymen being found useful in the management of the party, he and his employer frequently had confidential conversations on the ancient laws and institutions of Ireland, as well as the innovations introduced by the Kings of England into Ireland—especially on the subject of their assumption of a right to the soil. On one of these occasions, he told him, that the Irish never would be reconciled to the justice of that assumption: and that, accordingly, books were kept secretly, not only in Ireland, but also in Great Britain, in which the districts belonging to the respective clans continue to be registered, with the names of their present proprietors, and of the chiefs and Tanisters of "the rightful owners of the soil." Such is the enduring effect of the ancient laws and institutions of Ireland on the character and principles of the people of that country.

Brehon and succession laws are not entitled to rank them for civilization far above the legislators of the feudal and criminal code and law of primogeniture of England, in the eyes of the philosopher of the present day.

"The Brehon law," says Spenser, "is a rule of right unwritten, but delivered by tradition from one generation to another, in which, often times, there appeareth great shew of equity, in determining the right between party and party, but in many things repugning quite both to God's law and man's. As for example, in the case of murder, the Brehon, that is their judge, will compound between the murderer and the friends of the party murdered, which prosecute the action, that the malefactor shall give unto them (for) the child or wife of him that is slain, a recompence, which they call erich. By which vile law of theirs many murders among them are made up or smothered."

The word "compound," as used above, is apt to mislead the general reader. The Brehon had no more power to compound the crime, by the law of eric (a word derived, probably, from ad-heric—the dh being quiescent—horns, the compensation being always paid in cattle) than our Lords of Justiciary have to compound the crimes tried before them. The duty of the Brehon was to receive the evidence, and to fix and determine the degree or class of the crime—the amount of compensation payable therefor being, under the Brehon law, unalterably specified and determined. The Brehon having decided the class of the crime, and the amount of the compensation fixed by the law, his declaration, at the mod or moat, to the effect that it had been duly compensated, according to the cleachda, was tantamount to a verdict of acquittal.

It sometimes happened that the means of the criminal fell short of the compensation required; but in all such cases, where the crime was committed within the bounds of the clan, the "kith and kin" of the criminal charged themselves with the deficiency, and could not thereafter be reproached with the crime of their kinsman. In like manner, when the crime was committed against or within the bounds of another clan, the whole clan of the criminal charged themselves with the deficiency, and thus preserved the honour of their clan from being reproached with the crime of any individual of their number—for so close was the unity, that the clan was liable for the individual, and the individual for the clan, until the eric was paid.

On the other hand, should the crime be considered infamous, either in itself or from the circumstances connected with the perpetration of it, the criminal forfeited his name and privileges; and was banished forth the bounds of the clan. This was a severe sentence, but it saved the honour of the clan from being stained by any unworthy member. The compensation purged the disgrace, when the criminal was disowned and banished, but not otherwise. The criminal was sometimes received, under his assumed name, by some clan resident at a distance from his own, and probably not cognisant of the nature of the crime. The descendants of many persons, who had thus been received by other clans, have assumed the names of their ancestors only since the fall of the clan system. Where the banished man was not thus fortunate, he became what is called, cearnach coille, i. e., a warrior of the wood, or outlaw. The depredations of persons of this description are commemorated in many traditions; but it would seem as if the people had some feeling of compassion for their state—for we scarcely hear of any rising of a clan, or district, for the purpose of putting them down, so long as they confined themselves to the taking of a sheep from the fold, or a cow from the glen, to supply their natural wants.

On receiving the above description of the Brehon law, Eudot continues:—"I trust it is not now used in Ireland, since the king of England had the absolute dominion, and established his own laws there. Iren. Yes, truly: for there be many wide counties in Ireland the laws of England never were established in, nor any acknowledgment of subjection made; and even in these that are subdued, or seem to acknowledge subjection, the same law is practised among themselves."

The statesmen of England, having reasoned themselves into a belief of the unchristian character of the Brehon law, the absolute dominion of the king of England in Ireland, and his consequent right to establish his own laws there—although many wide counties there had not, at that time, made any acknowledgment of subjection, and although those that were subdued only acknowledged a seeming subjection—immediately applied themselves to the enactment of other laws, in substitution thereof. They accordingly enacted that Irishmen "should not use gilt bridles or petronels," "or wear saffron shirts or smocks," "or baird on the upper lips," "and none under their chins;" and, that "Irishmen, conversing among Englishmen, should be taken as spies, and so punished," &c. &c. All this, and more, is attested by Spenser; and the curious in legislation can have no difficulty in naming many other enactments, conceived in the same wise and conciliating spirit, from the same enlightened code!

There can be little doubt that in their ignorance or disregard of the ancient rights and privileges of the people of Ireland, and the enduring effect of these on the national mind, is to be found the great cause of the mislegislation and misgovernment of English statesmen in Ireland.

LARGS.

[Concluded from our last.]

On quitting this mansion of the dead, "where Night and Desolation ever frown," the first objects apt to catch the eye of the visitant, are two wasted funeral escutcheons, affixed to the side walls of the aisle. As having reference to several occupants of the vault, it may not be out of place here briefly to notice the "tattered coats of arms" which they still bear, and the names of the representatives of this distinguished family, whose deaths were thus commemorated.

The escutcheon attached to the west wall, though the oldest, is the least decayed of these proofs of noble ancestry. It was put up in 1694, on the demise of Sir James Montgomery, the third baronet of Skelmorlie—a political character of considerable distinction in very wavering and perilous times. The upper quarterings of this escutcheon are still entire, but of the lower ones, and of the central achievement, nothing but a few shreds remain. The proofs of descent in the dexter quarter are, 1st, Montgomery of Skelmorlie; 2nd, Duke of Argyle; 3rd, Duke of Queensbury; 4th, Earl of Morton; and those in the sinister quarter, or by the female line, are, 1st, Scott of Rossie; 2nd, Willoughby of Paran; 3rd, Lord Lindores; 4th, Slingsby of Redhouse. A baronet's helmet, surmounted by the torse or wreath, hangs over the escutcheon, while on each side of it, along the margin of the ceiling, are arranged eight small funeral banners of sheet iron, but from both sides of which the armorials have been long since obliterated by damp and corrosion.

The escutcheon on the opposite wall is commemorative of Sir Robert Montgomery, eldest son of Sir James, above mentioned. He was governor of a garrison in Ireland, and died in 1731. This escutcheon has exhibited in each quarter only two proofs of descent, the upper ones of which alone remain. These are the father, and father's mother, on the right side, and on the other, the mother, and mother's mother, being respectively, Montgomerie as before, and Scott of Rossie; the Marquis of Annandale, and the Duke of Queensbury. Though now in the last stages of decay, any one may yet perceive that the escutcheons when, entire, must have contributed not a little to the heraldic interest and solemn splendour of the aisle. In their time-worn state, however, they are in perfect keeping with the present condition of those "they were meant to honour," as well as with the blighted adornments of the ceiling, and the mouldering sculptures and broken profiles of the monument. Verily, as we view these things we feel most forcibly the saying of the preacher, "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but all is Vanity."

Before closing this essay towards a description of the aisle, we may add, in reference, that drawings of the monument, which we conceive to be the purest specimen in Scotland of monumental architecture, in the Italian style, at the period of its construction, were taken, in 1818, by Mr Lizars of Edinburgh, (whose name is a sufficient guarantee for their excellence,) by order of Hugh late Earl of Eglinton, a nobleman alike distinguished for his public spirit and his patronage of the arts, and who, it seems, at an advanced period of his life, had conceived the intention of thus preserving this monument of the taste and piety of his distinguished ancestor. His lordship died, we believe, before the drawings were completed, and so recently as the spring of 1838 we were told they were still in the artist's possession. It is to be hoped they may yet be engraved, or that some expert draughtsman may, before many years elapse, find patronage so liberal among the admirers of art, and the lovers of antiquities, as will enable him, by means of the pencil and burin, to arrest, in some measure, the hand of time, and its attendant decay, and for the future, at least, place this magnificent memorial far beyond the reach of the destroyer.

We shall now proceed to scan the other monuments and inscriptions, which have been placed over those who rest in the common fold of the departed.

West of the Skelmorlie aisle, stands the funeral vault of the ancient family of Brisbane of Brisbane. It is constructed entirely of stone, and its only chiseled adornments are two shields of arms, built in the gable over its well secured portal. The shield on the right bears two mullets in fesse, between three cups covered, for Shaw, impaling three fleurs de lis, and parted per fess, three annulets, for Montgomery. On the upper part of the shield are cut the letters P. S., and in the flanks I. M., with the date 1634, below. The other shield bears only Shaw, as above, and the initials I. S. It would appear, from these armorials, that the vault was built by Shaw of Kelsoland, or his heirs, considerably prior to that property becoming part of the estate of Brisbane, in which its name was subsequently merged. The letters on the right-hand shield are the initials of Patrick Shaw, second son of John Shaw of Greenock, and those of his wife, Jean, daughter of Adam Montgomerie of Broadstone, and sister to Hugh, Lord Viscount Airds, in Ireland. Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. II., Appendix, p. 103. The family indicated by the initials I. S., on the other shield, we have been unable to ascertain.

The most ancient monument, in the burying-ground, is one attached to the fragment of the south wall of the old church, already noticed, and which was preserved on this account. It denotes the place of interment of many generations of the Boyles of Kelburn, though nothing but the initials of the name of the individual it commemorated can now with certainty be known; "Decay's effacing fingers" having long since obliterated the lapidary record. The monument is composed of two Ionic columns with pedestals, five feet and a half apart, which sustains a heavy Tuscan cornice, without the intervention of a frieze, above which rises a central compartment formed by columns and a cornice of small dimensions, but otherwise copies of those below. Within the compartment, which is flanked by curvilinear panels, containing sprawling emblems of mortality, are carved a skull and cross bones, suspended by drapery, and over it formerly stood an escutcheon, the crowning member of the composition, but which, along with part of the cornice, has fallen down. It bears three harts' horns, two and one, and the initials I. B. The principal cornice is returned over the columns, above each of which stands a small pyramid, curved in the profiles, and resting on balls. Other features, particularly the capitals of the columns, which are equally tasteless in design and faulty in execution, we pass over as unworthy of notice. This monument must have been erected at a period when there were no standard models in this country, in the style of which it is a spurious imitation, to refer to. It is not improbable that it may have been raised in memory of John Boyle of Kelburn, an adherent to the party of Queen Mary, who died in 1610; although, according to Bloxam, few monuments were affixed to the exterior walls of churches in England in the early part of this century, and that it was not until after the Restoration that they became at all common. *

Of monumental stones of one kind and another, there are within this field of graves, about one hundred and seventy. With a single exception, however, none of the forms of these memorials demand especial notice, being such, in this respect, as are to be met with in every country churchyard. The one thus alluded to is of white Italian marble, and was erected in 1832. It is of an insulated form, and consists of a handsome sarcophagus standing on a pedestal, slightly elevated by three steps, or gradini. In all it is about five feet in height, and is admirably proportioned. The different mouldings are likewise in good taste, and a male and female hand joined together within a sunk panel, on the east side of the sarcophagus, are sculptured in a style meriting high commendation. Altogether this is a chaste and beautiful monument, and truly an honourable testimonial "of filial affection and piety." We are afraid, however, that the material of which it is composed is not calculated to withstand uninjured the vicissitudes of this fretful climate through many years.

The oldest dated monumental stone is 1618, and between that period and the close of the century, there are only other five. With one exception, none of the dates on these are accompanied with any lettering, save the initials of the departed. The most ancient inscription, meriting the designation of epitaph, is that on the tombstone of the Rev. William Smith. He died of the plague in 1647, caught while visiting his parishioners, and in compliance with his wishes, (such is one version of the tradition,) was buried in a narrow little valley, between two holly bushes, situated two miles north of Largs, and about a quarter of a mile from the farm-house of Middleton, the scene of his death. What are believed to have been the hollies, indicated by Mr Smith as marking his last resting-place, still grow hard by his grave. It is a deeply sequestered spot, and well adapted for solitary musing, the little area being screened on every side by hollies, ashes, and pines, except to the north-west, in which direction there is seen, at a short distance, a portion of the banks of the impetuous Noddle, beyond which rise swelling arable fields, overlooked by the quiet, bright green summit of the Knock Hill.

The tombstone is of the tabular form, and bears the following inscription, the English part of which is cut around the margin of the stone.

"Here . layeth . Willm. . Smithe . Minister . of . Largs . a . faithfull . Minister . of . the . Gospell . removed . by . the . Pestilence . 1644 . Renewed . by . James . Smith . his . nephew . in . the . year . 1710 . Renewed 1760 .

* The following remarks on this epitaph, with its translation into English, as well as the translation of the foregoing inscriptions, have been furnished by my learned and ingenious friend, Dr Andrew Crawford of Lochwinnoch, a gentleman rich in antiquarian lore, and most obliging in communicating information. To him, indeed,

"Nor rough, nor barren, are the winding ways
Of hoar antiquity, but strawed with flowers."

Mr William Smith, Minister of Largs, was carried off by the pest, or plague, in the beginning of the year 1647; the date 1644, on his monument, is a mistake, as is testified by the Record of the Presbytery of Irvine. It is said that when the pestilence was laying waste the village, the people, yet free of sickness, fled from it to the Outerwards, situated in the muirs to the north of Largs, where they raised huts for their accommodation. They buried their own clergyman (who died as above stated, of the epidemic,) in the Kelso glen; the kirk-yard having become contagious of this deadly disease. They placed a throchstone over his remains, with the after-mentioned inscription, and planted hollies round his lonely tomb. Some of them afterwards invented a prophecy which they ascribed to Mr Smith, when on his death-bed, to the effect that the plague would not revisit the parish so long as the hollies were prevented from meeting over his grave. The prediction took so well that the bushes have been repeatedly curtailed of their ominous tendencies. The last of these croppings took place some thirty or forty years ago, and was so effectively gone about, that the direful consequences of the hollies "embracing each other," seem to be for ever averted.

The following is an accurate copy of the latin part of the inscription on the gravestone, with the difference only of the arrangement of the words being according to the hexameter and pentameter verse; an order which the sculptor had neglected:—

"Conditus in tumultu hoc jaceo, juvenisque senesque;
Nempe annis juvenis, sed pietate senex,
Divino eloquio celestia dogmata vidi,
Abstersi tenebras mentibus, ore tonans,
Attonitoque hæsit animo perversa malorum
Colluvies verbis improba facta meis."

Some school boy, or collegian in his novitiate, must have written this precious balderdash, put, as it were, into the mouth of the defunct, having obviously searched his Gradus in quest of words for quantity, not for their true meaning. The consequence has been an incoherent string or jumble of queer terms, altogether misapplied: the rules of syntax can scarcely connect such jargon.

The Rev. William Smith appears to have been a thundering preacher, (or a great gun, as the common phrase is; in other words a roaring and popular haranguer,) one who fulminated the terrors of the law instead of dispensing the joys, blessings, and mild precepts of the Christian faith: as such, at least, he is represented by his epitaph-writer.

A literal translation of the inscription would prove arrant nonsense. The following is an approach to the sense of it, affording at least a faint glimmering of what seems to have been the writer's obscure and murky meaning:—

"I lie buried in this tomb, both a young and an old man, that is a youth in years, but an old man in piety. I enforced the doctrine of revelation by divine eloquence. I dispelled the darkness from men's minds, thundering with my voice; and the odiousness of sin, in sooth, which clung to the terror-struck conscience of the wicked, being thus exposed, was rendered hateful by my discourses."

The grave has been immemorially a place of occasional resort to the inhabitants of Largs, and is one of the sights to which the attention of strangers is generally directed. There are several walks in the vicinity of this beautifully situated town, of a more lively and amusing description, but none of them presents a terminus so peculiarly impressive as the one just described, with its bosky dingle and its lonely grave.

The following epitaphs are arranged according to their dates, and except in a few particular instances, it has been considered unnecessary to specify the forms of the memorials on which they are engraved, or the quarter of the churchyard in which they are situated. The selection, which comprises about a fourth of the entire inscriptions, will be found to include every epitaph in any way remarkable on account of its composition, or other circumstances; besides several that are briefly commemorative of individuals, whose living worth entitled them, certainly, to a more liberal measure of remembrance on their tombstones, than the bare record of "their name and years:"—

1. On an oblong stone, resting on pedestals, is the following marginal inscription, in raised characters:—

"Heir . l . y . s . David . B . y . r . b . o . n . who . d . i . e . d . Dec . 1696 .
Also . Archibald . B . y . r . b . o . n . His . l . son . and . H . i . s . b . a . n . d .
to . Agnes . C . r . a . v . f . r . d . Lady . of . Thirdpart . He . d . i . e . d .
Feb . 2 . 1705 . " On the upper part of the stone are cut the following letters and date, in large characters, which are arranged in three lines:—D . B . A . B . A . C . 1707 .

2. On another memorial, similar in form and dimensions to the above, and standing close by it, there is carved the semblance of a shield, bearing what probably was meant to represent a fess ermine. Above the fess is cut the date 1663, and in base is a spur revel or mullet and a rose, with the characters I C A C , A C V 27, but the marginal inscription, if there ever was any, has been altogether deleted by the weather. The family commemorated by these monuments, has been long extinct, nor can anything now be learned from tradition regarding it in the parish.

3. Here . are . buried . the . corps . of . the Revd . Mr . John . Wilson . Minister . of . the . Gospel . at . Largs . who . d . e . c . e . a . s . e . d . the . 15th . November . Anno . Dom . 1699 . aged . 46 . years .

The above and the three following epitaphs, are all engraved on the same stone.

4. Here . lies . the . body . of . the . reverend . Mr . John . Cumine . Minister . of . the . Gospel . in . Largs . Born . Anno . Dom . 1674 . Died . Anno . 1743 .

5. Here lies the body of the reverend Mr Andrew Cumine, Minister of the Gospel in Largs. Born Anno. Dom. 1674. Died Anno. 1762, in the 61st year of his ministry.

6. Also here lies the revd. Mr Gilbert Lang, Minister of Largs, who died 30th Decemr. 1791, in the 65th year of his age, and the 36th year of his ministry.

7. This . is . the . burial . place . of . Theophilus . Rankine . his . wife . and . children . 1724 .

Of all mechanicks we have renown,
Above the hammer we wear the crown.

8. Erected by Hugh Tyre in memory of Jean Hair, his spouse, who departed this life the 10th August, 1799, aged 25 years.

Death doth prove,

What dust we doat on, when we woman love.

9. Here lies the body of John Ewing, Merchant in Fairlie, who departed this life Octr. 3, 1763, aged 65 years.

O Passenger as thou goest by upon this Stone, think, listen, aye, and think on death

While life is lent to thee, for God himself, Commands it so to be.

10. Erected in memory of Mary M'Naught, daughter to James M'Naught, who died at Kelburn, Oct. 26th, 1774, aged 20 years.

Here in this grave a woman lys
Who was cut off in youth;
A warning given to all mankind
To live in faith and truth.
For death may come in various shapes,
When we may least expect;
O that all youth in time may be Prepared for such a step."

Here is interred the remains of Robert M'Naught, Inkeeper in Fairlie, who died on the 17th July, 1827, aged 73 years.

11. Mementi Mori.—This monument is erected in memory of Mr John Anderson, lawful son and heir to the deceased John Anderson, Portioner of Braidley in Dunlop, and late Surgeon in Glasgow, who died on board a vessel in Fairlie Roads, upon the 12th Febr., 1775, in his passage to Jamaica, whether he was going for recovery of health, and was interred here by the Capt. of said vessel, without the knowledge or consent of his friends. Aged 30 years.

12. Largs, Febr. 1, 1792. Interred here Elisabeth Hunter, relict of John Hyndman, aged 83. She was an affectionate mother, and always zealous for the welfare of her children, three of which is buried here who died in infancy.

13. Here ly interred the remains of John Ninian, late Feur in Largs, who died 14th of January 1793, aged 60 years. Also, Margaret Ninian, his spouse, died 7th of February, 1787, aged 41 years. This stone is inscribed to their memory by their son, Quintin Ninian, Anno Domini MDCCXCIII.

Away our friends, wife, drown your tears
For we must part till Christ appears:
The flesh rests here till Jesus come
And claim the treasure from the tomb.

14. Here lys William Paton, who desired this stone to be erected: died 28th August, 1795, aged 18 years. Also, his father, John Paton, Portioner of Noddsdale, who died 21 Nov., 1812, aged 88 years.

Reader, if I do it of the crave,
When thou does me go by,
Think of the dark and silent grave,
Where soon thou here must ly.
All you my scholars that were,
Remember you must die;
And in the days of youth prepare,
For long eternity.

15. This stone was erected by James Glen, Farmer in Gallowgate of Largs, in memory of his wife and Heirs. Here lys the body of Mary Boyd, his spouse, who departed this life, the 13 March, 1796, aged 81 years.

Remember man as thou goes by;
As thou art now once was I;
As I am now so must thou be;
Prepare in time to follow me. *

16. This is the burial place of John and Hugh Craford, 1793.

Boreas blasts and Neptunes waves,
Have toss'd me to and fro;
In spite of both by God's decree,
I harbour here below.
While at an anchor we do ride
With many of our fleet,
Again we will set sail
And Christ our General meet.

* These lines are very old and very common, being met with in more of our churchyards than any other monitory rhymes. The substance of them, however trite it may appear, forms the introduction to the epitaph on Edward the Black Prince, 1376—on his superb monument in Canterbury Cathedral.

Tiel come tu es autiel fu,
Tu seras tiel comme Je su.

These misquoted verses have been much longer on this stone than is implied by the date 1796. In a volume of epitaphs, entitled "Sepulchrorum Inscriptiones," published in 1727, there is a correct version, if not the original itself, of the lines, which are inscribed to the memory of a "Capt. John Dunch, 1686," and in a note to which it is said "The same epitaph is upon a tomb-stone in the Churchyard of Largs, in the shire of Air, in Scotland"—thus satisfactorily proving these rhymes to have been here considerably above a century. The epitaphian verses in question are to be met with in the churchyards of several maritime towns, both in England and Scotland, but scarcely ever in a correct form. Since the disappearance of the monument of "John Arthur, Shipmaster," churchyard of Alloa, from which the lines were transcribed by Monteath into his Theater of Mortality, 1713, the above are probably the oldest, though not the most correct, set of them now to be found in Scotland.

17. Here lies Susan Mure, spouse to John Paton of Noddsale, who died 6th of Janry., 1797, aged 49 years.

Death is an awful messenger.

Many die in fears,
both great and small.
All ye that's young in years,
imbrace the Gospel call;
And when ye walk alone,
distant from Companie,
Think often then upon
Death and long Eternity.

18. Erected by Robert Tweed in Fairley, in memory of his daughter, Elizabeth, who was born 19th Augt. 1793, and departed this life the 12th July, 1811, aged 7 years, also of his daughter Mary, who departed this life the 10th Decr. 1797, aged 5 months.

The flesh shall slumber in the ground,
Till the last Trumpet's awful sound,
Then burst the chains with sweet surprise
And in her Saviour's image rise.

19. Here lies the remains of James Craford, Farmer in Whitburn, who died 16th Novr. 1799, aged 82 years. Erected to his memory by his Sons.

Thy mighty hand can sink us low,
Or raise us up on high;
This moment gives the breath we draw,
And in the next we die.

20. Erected by William Ross, Vintner, Largs, in memory of his son William, who died 22d Sept., 1800, aged 7 years and 9 months.

Here youth's gay bloom & beauty's pride must fall a loathsome Prey,
And there the fairest loveliest form,
must moulder and decay.

21. Erected by John Hendry, Farmer in Towergill, in memory of his brother Archibald, late Farmer there, who departed this life the 21st Janry., 1801, aged 43 years.

How lov'd how valued once avails not me,
For now I Lodge in this dark destiny;
Remember man in youthful prime,
That thou must die, and lodge with me:
Time was like thee I life possessed,
And time shall be when thou must rest.

22. The burying-ground of John Morris and Jean M'Fie, his wife, now the property of their son, Hugh Morris, Merchant in Glasgow, by whom this stone is erected in memory of his beloved daughter, Elizabeth Morris, who died at Largs on the 19 Sept., 1805, aged 19 years.

She ne'er knew joy
But friendship might divide
Or gave her Father grief
But when she died.*

23. Erected by Hugh Boag, Largs, in memory of his wife, Marian Boyd, who died June 25th, 1808, aged 67 years. Hugh Boag died 33 August, 1815, aged 72 years.

How lov'd, how valued once avails thee not,
To whom related or by whom begot,
A heap of dust alone remains of thee,
'Tis all thou art and all the proud shall be.*

24. Sacred to the memory of Mrs Agnes M'Jerrrow, relict of the Revd. John M'Dermitt, Fergushill, Minister of the Gospel in Straiton, who died 20th June, 1812, in the 81st year of his age.

25. Erected to the memory of John Hill, late Factor to the Earl of Glasgow, who died 13th June, 1815, aged 73. Also to his wife, Margt. Muir, who died 10th March, 1807, aged 66.

26. Sacred to the memory of Allan Pollock, late Merchant in Glasgow, who departed this life on Wednesday, the 20th March, 1818, aged 74 years, and of Janet Morris, his spouse, who departed this life on Tuesday, the 23 July, 1816, aged 72 years.

In their characters they combined, in an eminent degree, Intelligence, Industry, and Integrity; and pious and devout, with universal and active benevolence, they were a pattern of conjugal confidence and felicity for forty-two years, and reared a large family.

27. Erected to the memory of William Wilson of Haily, who died 22d March, 1821, aged 73 years. And of Jean Wilson, his spouse, who died 29th Febr., 1816, aged 71 years.

Hic in tumulo pars quiescit pars in coelo.

28. Donald McLean late of the 42d. Regt. died July 3d., 1819, aged 51 years.

29. Margaret Fyfe died 16th Sept. 1819, aged 27 years.

Pure in sentiment, gentle in manners,
Of strict integrity, and ardent piety,
She lived an eminent example
Of female and domestic excellence;
Having endured a long and exhausting illness,
With calm yet unshaken fortitude,
She Died

In the firm assurance of A blessed Immortality.

Here also are buried, John, and Margaret,
Her infant Children.

This stone is erected, by her husband,
John Campbell, Surgeon in Largs.

30. Sacred to the memory of Bertha Leech, spouse of the Revd. John Leech, Pastor of the U. A. Congregation, Largs, who died 11th April, 1821, aged 46 years.

31. Mary, second daughter of the late John Cairnie, Esq., Carron Vale, Denny, died 19th June, 1826, aged 18 years.

Margaret, the third daughter, died 19th March, 1827, aged 17 years.

32. Erected in memory of John Hill, who died on the 4th of Febr. 1811, aged 59 years. Also his son, John Hill, Painter, who died the 29th of July, 1825, aged 35 years.

33. Sacred to the beloved memory of George Gordon Macdougall, Esq., of the Danish island of St Croix, who was drowned at Largs on the morning of the 26th of October, 1835, in the 37th year of his age.

Possessed of brilliant talents, and many amiable qualities, he was thus cut off in the midst of his days, while at a distance from his home and family.

Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord may come.†

Though beyond the pale of our assigned limits, we shall not, we believe, be accused of a very wide deviation from the professed object of this paper, by closing it with two monumental inscriptions to be met with in more cheerful situations in the parish, than within the confines of the last resting-place of its population. One of these inscriptions is on a monument situated in the pleasure grounds

* Two lines, with variations, of Pope's Epitaph on the Hon. Simon Harcourt.

† Pope's Elegy to the memory of an unfortunate Lady.
† Matth. XXIV.—42.

of Kelburn, and the other is affixed to a slab of granite, built in the garden-wall of the villa of Curling Hall, the residence of the late John Cairnie, Esq. *

The monument at Kelburn stands on a small terrace or platform, situated on the margin of a romantic dell, adown which, after heavy rains, bounds along with "torrent rapture," a mountain rivulet, though in settled good weather, its voice, in accordance with its diminished energy, instead of awakening the echoes, rises not louder than "a singan din," or lulling murmur. The spot, from the natural inequalities of the ground, and from being embowered amidst lofty trees, though not above a furlong distant from the venerable family mansion, is nearly as sequestered as if situated "far in a wild, unknown to public view." In almost all moods of the atmosphere, the visitor of taste will be delighted with the walks, and "woods and waterfalls," of this picturesque glen, and should he pause for a little in the vicinity of the beautiful monument, when the moaning of the woodlands mingles with the sound of the water, the melodious lines of Spenser, may, perchance, be recalled to his mind:—

"The water's fall with difference discreet,
Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call;
The gentle, warbling wind, low answered to all."

The monument consists of a handsome female figure, placed in a niche, formed in a piece of ashlar work resembling the section of a stunted obelisk. The niche is finished with doric columns, sustaining a pediment, and in a circular panel of white marble, in the upper part of the obelisk, are neatly carved the armorials of the noble family. The statue, which is of the same material, is gracefully proportioned, and exquisitely sculptured. It represents, says the writer of the Old Statistical Account of the parish, "Virtue lamenting the loss of one of her favourite sons." The figure, which is four feet in height, is in a gently reclined position: the right arm leans on an elegant urn, resting on a tripod, in which hand she holds a chaplet of laurel, and in the other, which is slightly elevated, a portion of the flowing tangles of her hair. The expression of the visage, the form and position of the figure, and the style of the drapery, have been all most happily conceived, and as admirably executed. On the basement supporting the columns is engraved the inscription, which is as follows:—

Sacred to the Memory of
JOHN, EARL OF GLASGOW,
Whose exalted piety and liberal sentiments of religion,

* The following notice, in very questionable taste, of the demise of this generous and public-spirited gentleman, appeared in the Ayr Advertiser of the 3d of November, 1842, and afterwards in several other Newspapers:—At Curling Hall, Largs, on the 27th ult., John Cairnie, Esq., Surgeon, H. E. I. C. S., aged 73. He was a man who has gone to his last account with the love and esteem of the entire community of that sweet marine retreat, where, after a life of activity and usefulness, he had pitched his tent. By every Curlier his memory will be held in veneration; for, full of manly enthusiasm himself, he did more to elevate and excite the popular feeling in favour of the "roaring play," than any man of his times; and "Cairnie's rinks" are familiar as household words to every knight of the broom and channel-stone."

unfettered by systems, and joined with universal benevolence, were as singular as that candour and modesty which cast a pleasing veil over his distinguished abilities. His loyalty and courage he exerted in the service of his country, in whose cause he repeatedly suffered with fortitude and magnanimity. At the battle of Fontenoy, early in life, he lost his hand and his health. His manly spirit not to be subdued: at Lafeld he received two wounds in one attack. To perpetuate the remembrance of a character so universally beloved and admired, and to animate his children to the imitation of his estimable qualities, this humble monument is erected by his disconsolate widow. *

The other memorial presents a strong contrast to that just described, being, as already stated, an unchiseled slab of granite about ten feet in height. It is reported by immemorial tradition (and there is no reason why in this case tradition should not be considered an echo of the truth) to have marked the grave of Haco of Stenie, a Norwegian chief, who fell at the battle of Largs, which was fought on the surrounding narrow plain. On enclosing his garden, within the bounds of which it lay, Dr. Cairnie caused the stone to be built into the wall, which may be the means of preserving it for a longer period than can be well conceived, and that, too, happily, at the distance of only a few feet from the spot it had commemorated nearly six hundred years ago. The following verses, by an eminent scholar, Mr William Fraser, teacher for a short time at Largs, are engraved on a plate of copper, and firmly affixed to the stone:—

Substitit Hic Gothi Furor
Conditur hic Haco Stenienensis, et undique circum
Norvegios fidos terra tegit Socios:—
Huc regnum venere petentes; Scotia Victor
Hostibus hic tumulos, præmia justa, dedit.

— April 20. Anna Brown, relict of John Davidson, and William Reid, servant to the said Anna Brown, as "suspect guilty to the accession of the murder of ane child."

1724, June 19. Margaret Dickson, child-murder, hanged 2d Sept. 1724.

[This woman was resuscitated after execution. She went by the name of "Half-hangit-Maggy," and cried salt through the streets of Edinburgh for years afterwards.]

1725, Dec. 17. Alexander Napier, and Ralph Burnet, murdering William Johnston, postmaster at Haddington, and his wife, and robbing their house. Napier hanged at Haddington.

1726, Jan. 9. Mr John Wilson, "professor of mathematicks, and others, for a riot." Liberated 22d of the same month.

— Jan. 28. James, Earl of Rosebery, "not compearing and answering the Justiciary Court, for Deforcement, Ryot and Spulzie." Liberated on the 10th March following.

[This nobleman was a very eccentric and absurd person. His extravagancies caused a general belief of his insanity. There occurs in the public journals, (1739), a most singular advertisement of this ornament of the Scottish Peerage, relative to the elopement of one Polly Rich, who had been engaged as a servant by his Lordship for one year. She is said to have been about eighteen, five feet six inches high, "fine shap'd, blue ey'd, and black hair, or nut-brown." All her linnen and cambrick bears "the Earl's mark," viz. a large R. and an Earl's coronet above. Two guineas reward were offered to any one who would return her "to her right owner," either at John's Coffee-house, "or the Earl of Roseberrie, at Denheim's land, Bristow, and no questions will be asked. She is a London girl, and what they call a cockney." There are a great many arguments and inducements used by my Lord to tempt the fair one to return; and the whole is wound up by the following lines, which entitle the Earl to a high place in the catalogue of royal and noble authors:—

"My Lord desires Polly Rich,
To mind on Lord Roseberrie's dear little Fish."]

— Feb. 3. Alexander Stevenson, "fencing and dancing master," bigamy.

— June 1. William Davidson, soldier in the Earl of Deloraine's regiment, for the murder of Peter Hutchison, also a soldier. Hanged 24th August.

— June 23. David Marshall and John Pinkerton hanged, and their wives sent to the Correction-house.

— Aug. 10. David Stewart, Collector of Excise, Inverness, imprisoned at the instance of the Commissioners. Liberated on 30th May, 1727.

— Aug. 26. Two persons for false certificates and appropriation of arms, delivered up to the Collector of Excise. Liberated on 16th August 1728, having been two years in prison.

— Oct. 25. John Gibson, forging a declaration, 18th January, 1727. His "lug nailed to the Tron," and dismissed.

1751, March 18. Helen Torrance, and Jean Waldie, were executed this day for stealing a child eight or nine years of age, and afterwards selling its body to the surgeons for dissection. Alive on Tuesday, when carried off, and dead on Friday, with an incision in the belly upwards, but sewed up again.

1756, May 4. Sir William Dalrymple of Cousland, for shooting at Capt. How Dalrymple of Fordell, with a loaded pistol, at the Cross of Edinburgh. Liberated on the 14th May, on bail, for 6000 merks, to answer any complaint.

1752, Jan. 10. Norman Ross hanged and hung in chains, between Leith and Edinburgh, for assassinating Lady Bailie, sister to Home of Wedderburn.

[In 1838 was published "Memoirs of an Aristocrat;" but this work, written by a brother to the claimant of the Earldom of Marchmont, was immediately suppressed, in consequence of a libellous attack upon a very amiable lady, the second wife of Admiral Milne, which led to an action of damages, terminating in favour, as may be supposed, of the injured fair one. The book is consequently scarce, and but for the unjust attack in this, and one or two other instances, might be popular, as it is written with much spirit, possesses great interest, and many of the sketches of particular individuals very felicitous. In this book occurs the following notice in relation to the murder of the Lady Wedderburn. She had married one Ninian Home, a dominie, but by failure of her brothers eventually became heiress. Her husband died before her. Norman was her footman, and "secreted himself in her bed-room, with the intention of carrying off a sum of money, which she had in her drawers, after she fell asleep. But the noise of opening her desk having awoke her, he, for fear of detection, seized a knife, which by accident had been left on the drawers-head, and mangled her throat so dreadfully that she died next day. He then leaped from the window of the second story, but fractured one of his legs so much in the fall, that he was unable to walk, and sustained himself several days, eating pease and turnips, until his hiding place was discovered. He afterwards graced a gibbet in Leith Walk, where his body hung many a long year." The present Lairds of Wedderburn and Paxton are sons of a common working mason, with whom one of the daughters of the family had eloped. But the representative of the very ancient family of Wedderburn, in the male line, is the claimant to the Earldom of Marchmont.]

1757, Feb. 4. James Rose, Excise Officer at Muthil, banished to America, for "forging receipts for arrears."

- The following refers to Lord Warriston, the entry of whose execution occurs in the "Notes," at page 232. It appears he had pretended madness, with the view of evading punishment.

Extract from "Letter from Patrick Blair Sheriff of Orkney Commissr. to the Parliament from the Shire of Orkney to the Gentry and Heretors of the Country of Orkney dated Edinburgh 9th July 1663."

"Yesterday Waristoun was condemned to be hanged at the Croce the 22 of this instant his head to be sett on the Nether bow. He still faines madnes and it is thought his friends will ryde (er that time) for a pardon at Least to have the sentence changed into perpetuall imprisonment."

MINUTES OF IRVINE PRESBYTERY.

In our last number we noticed the deposition of two ministers of the Presbytery, namely, Dunlop of Ardrossan and Crawford of West Kilbride. Soon afterwards (7th May, 1650,) the Presbytery deposed another minister, namely, Lindsay of Dreghorn, being the third in about as many years. Lindsay appears to have been a silly tipping body, having a termagant wife, and a neer-dowee family, much fonder of his tumbler and a hand at cards, than of studying his bible. He was accused of being often drunk, of playing cards all night, and on one occasion on a Sunday, of applying for his stipend upon Sundays, and of other desecrations of the Sabbath. That his wife, family, and servants, were in the practice of swearing and blaspheming, and were not reproved by him, &c. &c. The greater part of the offences, however, appear to have taken place from five to fifteen, and in one instance twenty years previously. But the principal offence seems to have been his having given countenance to parties concerned in the "unlawful engagement," as (singularly enough) at all the previous meetings for censure he had "good testimony and report;" and as a short time before the charges were made against him, a woman, one of his parishioners, complained to the Presbytery that "he had refused her a testimonial to the communion." He being asked the reason, said "she had put a foul reproach upon him in saying that upon a Saturday at Irvine he had been so drunk as to be unable to preach on the Sabbath." She being questioned, answered "that she did not positively affirm that it was he, but one like him. Both parties being removed, the Presbytery went to an examination of the said business, and after examination, not finding much in it, only a mistake, both parties were called upon, and the said Mr William was very gravely exhorted to beware that he did not grieve any of his people; and the woman entreated likewise to tender the credit of her minister, and to beware to speak anything but upon just grounds, and that both of them should entertain peace and love hereafter." The following is part of the evidence given against Mr Lindsay on his trial before the Presbytery. Different witnesses deponed that his son had been outreiked (outrigged or outfitted?) at the time of the unlawful engagement, but knew not whether the father had done so or not, but that it was thought he had done it. That Mrs Lindsay, his wife, had a protection from the enemy—that she took in some of Alister M'Donald's men, and gave them meat and drink—that some Liddesdale gentlemen were in his house, and that he had said on that occasion, "sorrow tak the man that has his horse to shoe when his friends have to do—fiends tak that man." That on another occasion Lord Cochran and Gartland came to Dreghorn church upon the Sabbath; that after they came into the church the minister spake nothing against malignants, that he bowed twice to them, and after sermon he embraced and welcomed them home, and that he prayed for the bringing down of sectaries and those who adhered to them, but not of malignants. It appears that Lord Cochrane and Gartland had just returned from Ireland, where they had gone to bring over George Munro and his army to join in the unlawful engagement. Other witnesses deposed as to applications having been made to them on the part of Lords Eglinton and Glencairn, to dissuade them from giving evidence against Mr Lindsay. One witness, a Marion Crooks of Kilmarnock, remembering the old adage, that ale-sellers should not be tale-tellers, "answered that he was in her house at the time stated blythe and merry, but she thought him not drunk." Other parties more exalted in society don't appear to have shown as much good feeling, as they deposed to various circumstances which took place in their own houses, which it would have shewn more delicacy if they had said nothing about. Another witness, Janet Smith, deposed that "she heard Mrs Lindsay, bairns, and servants, curse, ban, and swear, and that she (Mrs Lindsay) was an ordinary plaspheer. Another witness deposed that she was an extraordinary one. The charges against Dunlop of Ardrossan don't appear in the minutes to which we have had access; but those against Crawford and Lindsay do not give us a very favourable view of the morals of the clergy at that period. It appears very strange that, while they were so ready to take up charges against their people and opponents, and that often upon very slight grounds, offences such as these two clergymen were found guilty of, should have for years been allowed to pass with impunity. We shall now give the procedure of the Presbytery at two separate visitations of the parish of Stewarton, by which it will appear that some of the clergy did not come up in spiritual matters to the standard of some of their elders.

"At a visitation at Stewarton, 23d March, 1648, after removal of the ministers the elders were desired to declare upon their oath of fidelity what they knew was lacking or scandalous in their minister. The rest being removit, the Laird of Lainshaw is satisfied both in the exposition of the chapter and in preaching, &c., &c. Lainshaw being removed, Corsehill was called in, expressed himself generally satisfied, but wished they were more particular in reproving vice and speaking more home to the conscience, especially Mr Wm. Castellaw. Farther, he declares he knows nothing anent their life and conversation but honesty, only it is his desire that Mr Wm. Castellaw, when he was in company, might be exhorted to be a little more in spiritual matters. Lainshaw, younger, and Wm. Dunlop of Block, don't appear so very fastidious as Corsehill, and declare themselves well satisfied with their ministers in every point; so does Allan Brown and Wm. Hobrowne. The other elders being called in in cumulo, and desired to speak their minds freely, the most part affirmed that they were well pleased with their ministers, except John Steel, who wished that Mr Wm. Castellaw were more on the point of application, and came nearer to folks' spiritual condition. In other things declares himself satisfied. The elders being removed, the ministers were called in, and gave their elders good characters; and the Presbytery expressed themselves highly pleased, giving Mr Wm. Castellaw a gentle hint to be more spiritual.

NOTE.—The Presbytery about this period appear to have been very active on the subject of church extension, proposing to divide Largs and other parishes; and in several parishes there were two clergymen placed. At this meeting they proceeded with the necessary steps to procure a manse and glebe for the second minister of Stewarton, in which there appeared to be some slackness on the part of the heritors, although they appear to have been great judges of doctrine, and very zealous in otherwise promoting the spiritual interest of the parish.

"At a visitation of the kirk of Stewarton, 10th August, 1649, Corsehill urged the propriety of Mr Wm. Castellaw 'being stirred up to greater diligence,' &c., 'and that both ministers should be more frequent and particular in informing the people concerning the condition of the times, and in stirring up the people to suitable affections and duties answerable to the times, and withal, desired that he might be more spiritual,' &c. Other elders agreed with Corsehill, and 'withal, wished that they would be more authoritative in the session—that it may be kept as the judicature of Christ; and so much the more they desired this, because there was some disorder and unchristian carriage seen among some of them in high words and drawing of whingers.' Other elders agreed in this, and added their desire 'that both of them (the ministers) might shew greater authority in the session, in rebuking disorders and making the gentlemen stand more in awe of them.' The ministers being called upon 'were approved in their doctrines, and according to the elders' testimony, as they had grounds, the Presbytery partly encourage them and partly admonish them. Concerning the elders, the ministers did desire that they might be exhorted to greater diligence, and that they might be rebuked concerning their slowness in contributing when times were appointed to that effect, which was accordingly done."

"14th August, 1649, compeared the two bailies of Irvine, and did represent to the Presbytery the great skaith and damage that the town had sustained through fire, and did desire a contribution from the several parishes for re-edifying of the houses that were burnt. The Presbytery having heard their desires do unanimously condescend thereunto, and that the contributions should be gathered with the first conveniency and brought in.

"The judgment of the commissioners of the kirk is to be enquired anent ane Alex. Henry in Largs, for saying that he would prove that the kirk of Scotland was as guilty of the king's blood as Cromwell was.

"Mr Geo. Crawford, late minister of Kilbride, having applied for church privileges, and made a full confession of his guiltiness with tears, he is to go to Kilbride, and there satisfy the first Lord's-day. At next meeting it was reported that Mr G. Crawford had done as directed; it was agreed that he be admitted to church fellowship without any relation to the opening of his mouth towards the ministry. Alexander, Erle of Eglinton, appointed ruling elder to go to the General Assembly."

"2d Jan., 1649, on a report that some persons in the family of Lady Semple, then residing at Southanan, did absent themselves from church, enquiry directed, that in case Lady Semple remain there some course be taken with that family."

"13th Feb., 1649.—It is appointed that Elizabeth Bruntfield and Bessie Duel, two of my Lady Semple, her servants, for the present at Southanan, for their absenting themselves from the public ordinances, shall be cited before the session of Largs."

"8th May, 1649.—Elizabeth Bruntfield and Bessie Duel, my Lady Semple, her two servants, are gone out of the country."

"20th Nov., 1649.—Thos. Cumming having been required to sign the covenant, 'he gave in a paper, declaring that, notwithstanding all the pains the brethren had taken upon him, he could not do it without sin.' The Presbytery finding him obstinate, and unwilling to receive information, does appoint that, without further delay, he renew the solemn league and covenant upon Sabbath come-fortnight, publicly, in the kirk of Kilmaurs; and that before renewing the same, he acknowledge that he has given scandal and offence to the people of God, and that Mr Wm. Guthrey preach that day, and tender the covenant to him; and in case he do refuse that Mr Wm. Crooks make report, that the Presbytery may go on in process against him."

15th Dec., 1649, compeared Thomas Cumming, who offered to take the covenant privately before the Presbytery, that rather than take it publicly, would venture upon excommunication, imprisonment and a scaffold; because to do it publicly was to make him suffer as an evil-doer, &c., &c. The Presbytery think it altogether unjust and ridiculous, and therefore directed that he receive the covenant on the first Lord's-day. Poor Thomas' courage evaporated: and on 1st Jan. it was reported that he had taken the covenant as enjoined."

"N.B.—The Episcopal clergy, and the government of the country, were, a few years afterwards, most justly reprobated, and held up as persecutors, for fining and otherwise punishing people for not attending their churches, &c. We must, however, confess that we cannot discover any material difference between their proceedings and those in the cases of Cumming and of Lady Semple's servants above quoted."

"2d Feb., 1650.—The Presbytery having heard of the miscarriage of some of Mr Wm. Guthrey, his parishoners, towards the men of Stirling, who came to give him a call, does appoint the said Mr Wm. Guthrey, publicly, to preach against the same."

"19th March, 1650.—Mr Wm. Guthrey does report that he had rebuked those of his parish publicly that did injure the commissioners that came from Stirling to give a call to the said Mr William to Stirling. And for farther censure to be inflicted upon them, the Presbytery takes it into consideration till the next day."

NOTE.—The people must have been sadly changed from June 1647, when Mr William gave them such "a very sweet testimony."

THE DEIL OF ARDROSSAN.

A legend of the "Devil of Ardrossan" will be found at page 110 of the Journal. It would appear, however, from the following tradition, that there were more than one devil localised at Ardrossan. The correspondent, A. C., to whom we are indebted for it, observes, that "there is a remarkable similitude" between it and a story related by Sir Walter Scott in the notes to his "Lay of the Last Minstrel;" but he traces back the legend to the authority of Robert Montgomerie of Braidlie, in the parish of Dalry. Montgomerie was born in 1729, and was early engaged in a sea-faring life, sailing from the port of Saltcoats—so that he may be supposed to have been well-versed in the "long yarns" connected with Ardrossan, which is adjacent to Saltcoats. Our correspondent thus proves, beyond doubt, that the legend, as applicable to Ardrossan, existed before Sir Walter Scott was born. A. C. then relates the "tale of superstition" thus:

"The people of the west of Scotland, or rather the folk of Cuninghame and Renfrewshire, have a great many legends of the 'Deil of Ardrossan,' or 'Michael Scott.' A merchant of Dumbarton sailed in his ship from that port. After being several days at sea, they met with a great storm, and were ship-wrecked on the coast of a desert island. All the crew were drowned except himself. He, wandering about, found a cave on the shore, and he took up his abode in it. A mermaid found him there; and, as she exhibited a fondness for him, they afterwards lived together in the cave. The mermaid went every day to her own element, and brought provisions; but, after a whole year's residence, and his mermaid spouse being from home, he saw a ship, and he hailed her. The ship's crew sent a boat ashore, and they entered into conversation with this forlorn merchant, who related the tale of his captivity: and how that the mermaid 'brought rowth of food, and gowd, and sillar, and gews (or jewels), and wine, &c., to him; so much, that he kentna what to do wi' them. Being outward bound they requested him to induce the mermaid to gather all the stores she possibly could, and they promised to come again, after a year and a day, and take him, with the valuable 'spuilzie,' or bootie. They came at the time appointed, and, the mermaid being absent, they made quick despatch to get all the stores on board before she returned. Then, they sailed away. When the mermaid came home she found the cave desolate and 'herried.' She pursued and overtook the ship, and demanded her husband and her stores. The skipper cast off a bundle of hoops, and promised the mermaid her husband after she had counted them. This done she renewed her request; but the skipper gave her another bundle, again and again, till they reached Gourrock and Laurence Bay."

"The Dumbarton trafficker, being on dry land, refused to go with the mermaid again. But she told him that he must meet her at the cave where they spent 'sae monie happie days, a year and a day hence;' and she committed to him the 'bairn' (or mongrel, half-fish, half-man,) which she bore to him, telling him to nurse it and give it 'meikle lair,' as he had plenty of 'sillar belangin' to her.' She also gave him a book, which he was not to let the child see, till it was able to read it. By the directions in this book—when he came to understand them—he could, it would appear, do what he liked, the 'Foul Thief' being at his command. The mermaid's 'bairn' took up his abode in the auld castle of Ardrossan. He went under the name of Michael Scott.

"At that time the people of Scotland were oppressed with Pow Sillar.* Michael Scott had a wonderful horse, which was the real Devil. He went to Rome on this horse, and visited the Pope, for the purpose of getting the poll-cess taken off. He mounted his mysterious horse at the top of Ardrossan Castle, where the print of the foot of the horse, or the Devil, is to be seen to this day. He said, 'Munt and Flee;' and they flew through the lift to Rome. On their journey, the horse inquired at Michael, slyly, how the 'auld wyves of Scotland prayed when they slept into their beds?' The Devil had a design to entrap Michael to use the name of the Supreme Being, which holy name broke all enchantments; but Michael, seeing the drift of Satan, replied, 'Neir mind, munt and Aee.' At Rome, he desired that the people of Scotland should be relieved of the Pow Sillar, threatening, if refused, that his horse should give three 'nichers!' The horse 'gied ae sneer, and made the haill city shake;' and on the second, 'the lum pigs cam down.' But the Pope would not permit a third 'nicher,' so he agreed to relieve the people of Scotland of the Pow Sillar. Home then came Michael and his horse triumphing.

"One day Michael Scott ordered the Deil to 'thraw rapes' of the sea-shore sand. His Clootie-ship could not make them unless he was allowed 'beer caff.' The present worm-like appearances on the shore were popularly believed to be the remains of this arduous task.

"Michael was desirous to have a road through a moss, or a marshy piece of country, called Cuninghamehead Moss, betwixt Knockmaid and Dalry. He ordered the Devil to make the road. Vestiges of it are seen to this day.

Michael Scott once made a paction with his Satanic Majesty, whom he over-reached. Michael Scott set his bonnet, without a crown, or a large hole in it, over the mouth of a coal-heugh. The Deil, according to his bargain, poured 'gowd' into it; but his Satanship could not fill the heugh. Michael offered to sell his soul finally to the Deil if he wad 'fill his bonnet wi' gowd;' but Clootie being tricked once, thanks to the coal-heugh, it may be supposed he declined the purchase on the terms proposed.

The warlock, one day, set the Deil to erect a bridge from the Island of Cumbra to the Mainland at Hunterstoun Point. When this stupendous work was almost finished, a luckless stranger, or landlowner, not knowing who was the vaar, or mason, thus expressed his surprise at the greatness and magnificence of the undertaking—'Gude be heir and Rowntree.' Immediately Satan vanished in a flash of fire, overwhelming the bridge, which fell into the sea, leaving the landstools or foundations of it, one of them on Cumbra, and the other near Kilbride. The Cumbra landstool is called the 'Deil's Dyke' to this day. It is a vein of whinstone, rising from sandstone."

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST THE IMPORTATION OF FRENCH WORDS, IN 1758.

It is with infinite concern that we behold an inundation of French words pouring in upon us, and this at a time, too, when there is some sort of merit in detesting every thing that is French. In regard to ourselves, we are daily insulted, by some of the finest lips in the world, with the opprobrious term of 'canaille.' We cannot resent the insult from them, as they are too sacred for our unhallowed hands. Besides, they are sufficiently punished, by the mirth they afford to their 'Mademoiselles,' when they attempt to pronounce the uncouth word; for 'canaille,' from English lips, sounds 'canal.' But as most things are pardonable to the pride of the creation, we should readily excuse them, if the infection had not spread among the officers of our army: and as we chiefly compose the numerous squadrons that are to guard the liberties of Britain, we cannot conceive that we ought to have any more to do with their language, than we have with their religion. All our business is to beat them, and that we can do in plain English. If our officers order us to form a line, we can do it; but if they call that line a 'cordon,' we must be obliged to apply to the chaplain for a 'denouement' of the mysterious word.—'Coup de main,' and 'manoeuvre,' might be excusable in Marshal Saxe, as he was in the service of France, and perfectly acquainted with both; but we cannot see what apology can be made for our officers lugging them in by head and shoulders, without the least necessity; as 'a sudden stroke' might have done for one, and 'a proper motion' for the other.—'Reconnoitre' is another favourite word in the military way; and as we cannot find out that it is much more significant than 'take a view,' we beg leave it may be sent home again. We should not have troubled the public with this address, if we had not received a fresh insult by the papers of Saturday last, in a supposed letter from Germany, where the ingenious author tells us, speaking of the intended operations of war, that the General's intention remains 'perdu;' which we are informed, signifies 'lost.' In what sense we are to understand this gentleman, we cannot say. His meaning indeed seems 'perdu.' He may perhaps give us to understand, by printing the word in Italics, that the army and treasury sent to Germany is all 'perdu.' The word then wants a little 'epaulement' to support it; or rather a little 'eclaircissement;' for, in the present application of it, it is dark and mysterious.

There was anciently (says Camden in his Notes upon Coins) a personal tribute called Capitatio (Poll-Silver) imposed upon the POLL or person of every one—of women from the twelfth, of men from the fourteenth year of their age.—COWEL'S LAW DICTIONARY.

We must beg the gentlemen of the army pardon, if, next to them, we should take the liberty of mentioning the barbers; a set of gentlemen very useful in their station, but under no absolute necessity of hanging out false French upon their signs. It may indeed become a French 'friseur' to acquaint the public, that he makes a 'tete de mouton,' or simply a 'tete;' but we are a little offended, when an English tonsor, under the sign of a thing which in some countries might be called a periwig, shall write, 'Ladies taites,' or 'tates,' or 'taets,' or 'taites,' or 'taites's,' made here; it looks as if they meant a reflection upon the ladies of Great Britain, by acquainting the public, that their heads were made in barbers' shops, and to be had either in Middlerow or Ragfair. Now, their intended purpose of serving the community would certainly be better answered, if they would suffer their signs to speak plain English, and inform the world, that SHEEPS' HEADS (which we are told is the meaning of the three French words above) were sold there; as, by that means, they would bid fair to serve gentlemen, as well as ladies, who were not already provided.

'Je-ne-sais-quoi,' though of French extraction, we shall not presume to find fault with; because it has been naturalized and productive of infinite good in England. It has helped many an unfortunate girl to a husband; it has indeed sometimes parted man and wife, but has soon brought them together again; seldom fails of healing up the breaches it had made between friends; has fitted out fleets and armies, and brought them home again; has been a theme for orators in velvet and in crape, and has furnished matter for many volumes.

'Chicano,' we dare not meddle with, as we are told the lawyers have taken it under their immediate protection: but as quirks and tricks are as foreign to their profession, as ambition and avarice to that of a more venerable order, we suppose the charge is without foundation.

'Bagatelle,' or 'trifle,' we shall leave to the smarts; as it would be a pity to rob them of the chief object of their study.

'Pet-en-l'air,' may suit very well with French 'effronterie;' for if the ladies of that country make no scruple of watering their 'ruelles' before the gentlemen who attend their 'levees,' I see no reason why they should be ashamed of [a crack of air]; but we could wish they had found a name of a little more delicacy for this garment.

We therefore humbly pray, that French words, as well as French dress, and French manners, may be laid aside, at least during the continuance of the present war; for we are apprehensive, should their language and customs descend to us, we should be taught, by their example, on the day of battle, to 'f—te le camp.'

For these reasons we pray as above: and shall, as in duty bound, hold them in everlasting abhorrence.—Scots Mag.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SCOTTISH JOURNAL."

SIR,—In the 18th Number of the Scottish Journal, (top of right hand column, page 275) there occurs in the article on the Dunrod family, this sentence. "Yet it is bot four rumeys, and ilk tour twyss wantit, satoye kirk ye first place and buriall." May I presume to offer an explanation of what is said to be unintelligible. It appears there were two towers, and fourteen houses, consequently there were seven in each tower. Now, in each tower there are "bot four rumeys, and ilk tour twyss wantit," that is, so arranged that two rooms were on one side and two on the other. "Sa ye kirk ye first place, and buriall." So also in the church the proprietor, who it appears was also the patron, had a right to the principal seat, or place, in the church; and also to the most honourable place of sepulture in the same, which was sometimes in the porchway, but usually in the chancel, at the foot of the spot where formerly stood the altar—as may be instanced in the Earl of Strathearn in Dunblane Cathedral.—Yours with much esteem,

D. W.

January 5, 1848.

["D. W." has made a good effort to explain the passage referred to, still it does not seem clear. It was not the houses but the place which consisted of four rooms. Although the place was "two touris and forteine housis", yet it was "bot four rumeys." Rumeys meaning, probably, as the word usually signifies, distinct possessions. We have never seen the word "wantit" applied in the sense understood by "D. W."]

HENRY SCOUGAL—ANE SONGE OF CONSTANCIE.

In the fine antique Chapel of King's College, Old Aberdeen—fine notwithstanding the ravages of the infuriate Reformers—may be seen a black marble tablet, with suitable inscription, which marks the grave of the amiable Henry Scougal. Henry was the second son of Patrick Scougal, Bishop of Aberdeen, and was born in the year 1650. From his earliest years he was of a sweet, studious disposition; and so great were his acquirements, that at the age of nineteen he was promoted to the Regency connected with the Professorship of Philosophy at King's College, where he was educated. After holding this situation for four years, by the advice of his friends, and for the improvement of his delicate health, he resigned his chair, and accepted the pastoral charge of the parish of Auchterless.(2) In 1674, Henry Scougal, now in his twenty-fourth year, was called to fill the chair of Divinity in King's College. This charge he was not destined long to enjoy. At an early period he is said to have suffered the pangs of disappointed love, and he at length fell a victim to the effects of this or a subsequent unrequited affection. (3) There seems to be some indirect allusions to this passion in his beautiful treatise, "The Life of God in Soul of Man." The "highest and most ravishing pleasures; (he says) the most solid and substantial delights, that human nature is capable of, are those which arise from the endearments of a well-placed and successful affection. That which embitters love, and makes it ordinarily a very troublesome and hurtful passion, is, the placing it on those who have not worth enough to deserve it, or affection and gratitude to requite it, or whose absence may deprive us of the pleasure of their converse, or their miseries occasion our trouble. . . . No wonder lovers do so hardly suffer any rival, and do not desire that others should approve their passion by imitating it. They know the scantiness and narrowness of the good which they love—that it cannot suffice two, being, in effect, too little for one. Hence love, which is strong as death, occasioneth jealousy, which is cruel as the grave, the coals whereof are coals of fire which hath a most violent flame. . . . Love is the most valuable thing we can bestow; and by giving it, we do in effect give all that we have; and therefore it must needs be affecting to find so great a gift despised—that the present which one hath made of his whole heart cannot prevail to obtain any return. Perfect love is a kind of self-dereliction, a wandering out of ourselves; is a kind of voluntary death, wherein the lover dies to himself and all his own interest; not thinking of them, nor caring for them, any more, and minding nothing but how he may please and gratify the party whom he loves. Thus he is quite undone unless he meets with reciprocal affection. He neglects himself, and the other hath no regard to him. But if he be beloved, he is revived, as it were, and liveth in the soul and care of the person whom he loves; and now he begins to mind his own concerns, not so much because they are his as, because the beloved is pleased to own an interest in them. He becomes dear unto himself—because he is so unto the other." (4)

We have not been able to discover the special cause that prevented the course of Scougal's true love from running smooth, whether

"It was different in blood,
Or else misgrafted, in respect of years;
Or else it stood upon the choice of friends:
Or, if there were a sympathy in choice,
War, death, or sickness did lay siege to it."

But we conceive that in his cell, in the steeple of St Machar Church, whither he retired from the world to end his days, and where he died at the early age of twenty-eight,

"Thus could, or would, or should have sung"
The gentle Henry Scougal.

ANE SANGE OF CONSTANCIE.

The sunn bade farewell to the wynterie day,
And the myste of the evenyng were wanderinge grey,
And hung in wreaths on the hyll and the wood—
Lyke angels of hyen gairdyng the good:
And the tingleyng rill, slow wympleyng along,
Seemt to wander and think whaur its waters wad gang;
Now stopinge ane while—then gurgleyng agen,
With ane mournfull saich throw the mystie glen.

Ane lonelle tree stood by the side of the burn,
With ane head that droopit lyke them that mourn,
And the wynter wind, in its frantic glee,
Had left but ae leaf on that lonlie tree;
And as I watcht the wympleyng rill,
And listit its sang on the echoinge hyll,
The lanelle tree o'er its banks that hang,
Like the deeyng close of ane mournfull sang,
Flung its hyndmost leaf on the waters free
And bade it join in their minstrelsie;
Yet tears in its branches seemt to hang
To part with the leaf it had fostered sae lang,
And it listit, and leant to the burnie its play,
As it bore its best luv on its waters awa.

The earth was so quiet, and the hyen was so still,
That I heard ilka sound on the wood and the hyll;
The hameless bnrd sang with ane dolefull moan
That the deep-wood boweris o' summer were gone,
And I thought on myself—and I mix'd with ane sigh
The mournfull murmur of echo's reply;
But I grat when I thought on the lanelle tree
That flung its last leaf on the wateris free—
For I thought it was lykest my true-luv and me!

For it wasnae to view the myst on the hyll,
It wasnae to listen the tinklyng rill,
Nor see the sunn synk 'mang the clouds of green
That I wander'd out on the wynteris even;
But it was to list with the ear of luv,
If the wynd that saich'd over the leafless grove,
Bore ane sound on its wing—to me how dread!—
Lyke ane rattleyng car, or lyke horses their tread.
For my true-luv was forcit frae me to sever,
It boot to be lang, and it might be for ever;
And it was forbidden that I should see
Ane blink of hope in her bonnie blue e'e;
And it was forbidden that I should view
The trickleyng tear of her hindmost adue;—
But they couldnae ystop the ear of luv,
And I listen'd the wynd that saich'd over the grove.
And I thought on the future, and thought on the past,
And thought on the tyme quhen we parted last,
And thought how my heart was amaist at my mou'
When my feeble tongue falter'd my hindmost adue;
And I ponder'd upon the deep, deep sigh
That strove with her heart as it wander'd bye—
The sigh was sae deep and the heart was sae high—
As scho said, quhill the mikle tears fell lyke rain,
"I dinna ken quhen I may see you agen."
And my hand yet thrill'd with her hindmost press,
And my lips yet glow'd with her hindmost kiss!

Eftsoons the douff bell frae the auld grey tour
With ane doleful clang told the partyng hour,
And I heard the tout of the trumpet borne
On the breeze of the evenyng sadly borne,
And I heard the dyrrl of the car and a'
That was bearyng my true-luv far awa,
And I listen'd and lean'd till the sound was lain
In the still of the evenyng breeze agen;
And O! it seem'd on mine ear to fail,
Sae pain'd with our mutual luv and bale,
Lyke the saddest sound, like the saddest sigh
That ever was breath'd in the evenyng sky—
Lyke the synkyng strain of ane angel of luv
That is bearing ane soul to the mansions above—
Lyke the flutteryng fall of ane scriph's wing
With the blessings of hyen wanderinge—
Lyke the dyinge peal of ane wave of the sea
It mylted away to eternitie!
But had I had the wingis of ane dove to flee
They hadnae parted my Marie and me.

I kisst with ane sigh the ringlet fair
That I shred from my Marie's golden hair,
And I thought I never would see her mair.
But when I tryt to rest on my bed,
The visions of night surrounded my head;
Methought of ane land that was fair to see
With many ane streamlet and blossomyng tree,
And many ane luvly and fragerent bowir,
And many ane bonnie and simple flouir,
Quhare the bnrd sang sweet in the brichte blue sky,
And hylls of sunny clouds made reply:

Quhare the shepherds were leaning beneath the trees,
And tuneyage their reeds in the whisperyng breeze
That was danceyng amang the floweris with glee—
And in that sweet land was Marie and me.

And I thought in the depths of the lovely bowers
We found all the joys of our fondest hours;
And I thought I claspeth her in mine arms,
Quhile my soul was enraptur'd with her charms,
And I kist her lips of the rosey hue,
And watchet the blink of her e'en of blue,
As scho bent her looks of luv upon me
And patted my cheeks as scho'd want to dee.(5)

And I thought as I look'd o'er the luvellie land,
That seemit fresh from the Creator's hand,
Quhare the snaw never fell on the brichte green hylls,
Nor winter had chaint the tynkleing rylls,
Nor blighted ane flower, nor blasted ane bud,
Quhare nocht but the zephyr sigh'd through the wud,
Quhare naething was felt save the breath of the Spring,
With rapture methought I began to sing.

SONGE.

Come, Marie, come o'er the flowerie earth,
The hylls blush with bewtie, the winds ring with mirth,
The brichte clouds are danceyng along the skie,
And the sunn looks blythe on their harmonie.
I will lead yon 'mong hylls quhare the fountains swell,
And the hyvens look luv to the meek heath-bell;
And the soundyng shells by the heavyng sea
Will teach our bosoms constancie,
As they ever sing the songe of the waves
That revellit first in their native caves,
And kist the sweets of their virgen dies
Ere their bewties had feasted human eyes,
Quhen their snowie breasts pillowed the Mermald's cheeks,
And stole from her blushes their crimson streiks,
As their lullaby sooth'd her to balmie sleep,
And to dreams of her luv of the mightie deep.
We will stray by the shores of the mountain tarn
Beneath the beam of the evenyng starn,
And view the brichte sunn in the glimmering west
Wrap his purple plaid round his gowden breast,
And gadder the dewie floweris of even
To make him a bed mong the hylls of hyven.
We will stray quhare the roses blush through the dew
And the violets drynke of the hyven's deep blue,
Quhare the birds sing—quhare the honie-bees roam—
Quhare the lammis are playenge them, come, Marie, come!

The scene was chang'd. Quhen my songe was deen
I thought I was standyng my leafu-lane
By the lanelle tree and the burnie agen:
And the sound of the car that bore Marie away
Was sinkyng awa in the evening day,
And the burnie was singin its songe of grief,
And the tree was flingin its hyndmost leaf
To join in the burnie its minstrelsie—
And I was lykin'g to Marie and me.

But the dreams of the night nae langer were mine:
The beams of the morninge beginning to shine
Bore me frae the land of visions away,
And plung'd me agen in the world of wae!

Since that sad time how monie ane Spring
Have I seen flutter its flowerie wing
But never ane leaf has its balmie glee
E'er budit or blown on that lanelle tree;
And the mournful strains of my songe declare
I havenae yet met with my Marie fair,
And the thought shoots up with ane sting of pain
That I never, never will see her again!

But, hark! the sound of the vesper chyme
Cries fie on my feckless waste of time,
And tells of ane Being quo dwells abave,
Quho is wortlie the depth of ane Serephis luv,
Quho meets the longings of loftiest soul,
That ever yet panted for hyvenlie goal,
With luv for luv, in ane boundless degree—
May my luv and my longings be centered on Thee!

(2.) This circumstance might be brought forward to support Henry Scougal's high character, did it require any straining to do so, for it is a saying in Aberdeenshire that clergymen are always found willing to remove to Aughtermair, but never to Aughterness.

(3.) Pinkerton has a more severe version of this story, "It is said that, being of an amorous complexion, he sometimes loved God, and sometimes loved women; and that, having unfortunately become enamoured of a married lady at Aberdeene, he died in the struggles of virtue and passion."

(4.) "Life of God in the Soul of Man;" cited in Bruce's "Eminent Men of Aberdeene."

(5.) We have ventured to put several Aberdonianisms into the mouth of Henry Scougal, as almost every one is aware of the peculiar Teutonic accent of the district from the well-known satire upon it, "There's as gweel beets and sheen in the aul' town o' Aberdeene as there is in a' braid Scotland."

THE LORD PROVOST OF GLASGOW IN PERIL.—On Saturday last, (May 1835,) our worthy Lord Provost was seen near the Royal Exchange, talking to a man, who, from his outward appearance, seemed to be a chimney-sweep. The Provost and the sweep appeared to be deeply engaged on some interesting subject, and were seen describing with the point of an old nail the inclinations and curvatures of certain vents or flues which might be swept by means of the newly invented machine which is to supersede the use of "climbing boys." A crowd very soon collected around the Provost and the sweep, wondering no doubt what business his Lordship had to do in such company. But so intent was he on the subject under discussion, that he seemed to be quite unconscious of any person being present save the man with whom he was talking, until an official, "drest in a little brief authority," came forward, and in the true Celtic twang abruptly ordered his Lordship to "dismiss." "What!" said the Provost, "do you know to whom you speak?" "No—she'll did not, neither did she care; her orders was not to let peoples stood upon ta planetane cansey, causing a crowd, and if she wadna gang awa, she wad put ta offish upon her." "Do you know that you are talking to the Lord Provost?" said a gentleman present; "you should pay more respect to his Lordship." "Let her pe ta Lord Provish, or ta Lord Jhustice Pence Court, she did not care one pinch of snish! but if she will not "dismiss," her order will pe ta put the offish upon her shust in a minut." It is needless to say that his Lordship good-naturedly yielded to an authority of his own sanctioning, and walked off, glad, no doubt, to find that the Police Establishment was filled with such faithful servants.—LIBERATOR.

RISE IN THE VALUE OF LAND.—Baldoon was bought by Lord Galloway from Lord Selkirk for £150,000: but under the condition that if it should turn out to be worth more in nineteen years than £7000 per annum, at which Lord Selkirk took a lease of it for nineteen years, Lord Galloway should pay the estimated advertised value. It is now subset at £10,000 per annum, and of course Lord Galloway will have to pay upwards of £100,000 more.—MEMORANDUM BOOK, 1805.

SCARCITY OF MONEY IN 1764.

WE are at the present day, apparently, as ignorant of the principles of a sound currency as our great-grandfathers were a hundred years ago. The monetary crisis of 1764 was, in many respects, similar to the present; and its effects were felt, at least in Scotland, for several years afterwards. We were shortly before engaged in a foreign war, which no doubt had drained the country of a considerable amount of specie. "The present scarcity of money, universally complained of," says a paper of the time, "however strange it may appear to short-sighted people, is what every man of common forecast, not intoxicated with the extraordinary success of our arms, must have expected at the time we were sending millions to support a war in Germany; when all the money that could be spared by the landed man out of his rents, and by the merchant and manufacturer out of his trade, was invested in the several loans to the Government." *

In our own day railway speculation is blamed, by a certain class of politicians, as the chief cause of the existing calamity, though not a shilling has, on that account, been sent to Germany, or any other foreign country.

The writer of the article we have quoted was no bullionist: "That paper credit must be continued," he observes, "no man, acquainted with the state of this country, can deny; that the trade of this nation cannot be carried on without it, is well known to every man who has given any attention to the subject."—The Bank of England was then blamed, as it has been at every crisis since, of narrowing its credit, hence the writer justly remarks—"If the directors of the Bank, at this time, when every sinew of industry ought to be exerted, for enriching the country, and thereby providing for future want, should withhold the usual credit from the merchants and tradesmen, putting it out of their power to make their payments, till their effects are remitted them from abroad, must not this curtail our trade and lessen our manufactures?" No matter what might move the directors to this course—whether ignorance, arrogance, or self-interest; the writer seriously questioned the propriety of continuing such power in the hands of a few individuals. The same opinion, as to the injurious tendency of the Bank of England charter, has since been repeatedly urged, and several ameliorations of its restrictive clauses have from time to time been effected—still the main evil remains.

But it is with the scarcity of money, as felt in Scotland, that we have, in this article, chiefly to do.

Until about the middle of last century there were no private banks in Scotland. Down till 1746, when the British Linen Company was incorporated, there were only two banks, the old and new, as they were called—i. e., the Bank of Scotland, instituted in 1695, and the Royal Bank, instituted in 1727. A public journalist, writing in 1752, says "within these few years, banks have been set on foot by some private companies in Scotland. The first at Aberdeen." Two were afterwards established at Glasgow, whose notes were for some time in circulation in Edinburgh.

Very opposite opinions prevailed as to the cause of the scarcity of money in Scotland, and the various statements which appeared in the public journals of the day, though in many instances fallacious, throw considerable light on the state of affairs at the time. They show the grievous struggle in which the trade and commerce of Scotland was involved for many a long year after the Union—that union from which instant wealth was to flow over the barren wilds of Scotland.

The scarcity of gold and silver, in 1764, was, extreme—so much so, that it was with the utmost difficulty change could be procured for a five-shilling note! "The canny English," says one writer, in the columns of the Edinburgh Advertiser, "taking advantage of our scarcity of silver, and distance from the mint, draw from us hundreds of pounds for what they call Birmingham buttons, which are not worth half a farthing. But we are glad of anything that is round." The same writer blamed the increase of banks for this state of things, and exclaims, "How vexing it must be to every honest man who has the smallest regard for his country, to see the whole profits of all the commodities in the kingdom, both natural and artificial, swallowed up by a set of men, who, instead of having any merits are public nuisances!" These nuisances were the private banks. The writer concludes by recommending, amongst other parliamentary enactments, that "no bank-notes under ten pounds, or five pounds at lowest," should be issued, being an anticipator of Sir Robert Peel in this respect; but how decidedly did the practical opinion of the country outgrows such a notion, when, in 1826, it produced a Malachi Malagrowth!

The views of the writer in the Advertiser seem to have been pretty widely entertained. The country gentlemen held public meetings, and resolutions were very generally come to, not to accept of any notes save those of the chartered banks. The county of Renfrew, however, was more liberal. It agreed that "the distress into which the country was thrown, was not owing to the multiplicity of banks, but to the optional clause in notes."* The gentlemen of Aberdeen followed in attributing to the same cause "the great and daily increase, and boundless extent of paper money, the scarcity of gold and silver coin, the high exchange between England and Scotland," &c.

A writer in the Caledonian Mercury notices these county resolutions as absurd. "For my part," he says, "I cannot conceive how a thing so evidently calculated to keep the specie among us, should have met with such general dislike at present. I think it is pretty plain, that the more obstacles lie in the way of getting specie for notes at the bank, the less specie will be carried out of the country; and, on the other hand, if the banks pay always readily in gold, or without taking the benefit of the option, the more specie will be carried away to England; for I will venture to affirm that nine-tenths of all the specie given out at the banks, goes to the country of England. If the specie given out at the banks were to circulate in Scotland, and go from hand to hand amongst traders and manufacturers, things would soon wear a new face. Let us suppose that the banks were to send £500 or £1000 in specie to every little trading town in Scotland; would it circulate a fortnight among them before it was in the hands of the English? Is there at present in Scotland a dealer in English goods (and how few dealers are there in any thing else?) that is not daily taking every opportunity of seizing all the specie he can get, to send to pay his English merchant? Those indeed that send riders to this country to receive their money, their riders accept of bank-notes from their customers, and they again demand the specie of the banks: so that in both cases the loss falls upon the banks. If any one will take the trouble to look into the Newcastle waggon going from Edinburgh, or any of the Leith trading ships going for London, they will see such vast sums of specie going up as must surprise the most inattentive, and give every lover of his country reason to dread the inevitable consequences of such a perpetual drain of our specie from amongst us."

Believing that the cause of the national distress must be sought for in something else than the increase of paper money and the optional clause, the writer goes on to state certain facts:

"At the commencement of the late war, and for long before, specie was very plenty in Scotland; we had no banks but those established by authority, except Glasgow. The exchange betwixt Scotland and England was from thirty to sixty days par: and the Royal Bank always drew on London at one, sometimes at one-half, per cent. sight. Specie was then so plenty, that people chose rather to keep bank-notes by them, than be troubled with it, and threw all their specie into the banks. At this time there was a vast quantity of English money in Scotland at four per cent., as the English could not get such interest in their own country, or in the stocks at that time. This money was lodged mostly on heritable security, or in the bankers or exchange-dealers' hands; and, while it staid among us, had a very good effect to keep the exchange low.

"But no sooner had the war broke out, and the government begun to give high premiums for money, than the English withdrew all their money out of Scotland. This affected the exchange immediately. However, it was still pretty moderate, from one to one-and-a-half per cent. sight. The banks, regardless of the growing ill, dealt about large credits to every person who could find proper security, and enlarged the credits of the bankers. They thought they could never go too great lengths in launching out, and the more they lent, the greater advantage it would be to the banks. What was the effect of all this? Some people, collecting all the money that could be raised in this country, took a trip to London to meet Mons. Bussy, who every body imagined was to conclude the peace, expecting no doubt to raise immense fortunes in one day; and left us to lament our own foolishness, while they laugh at our misfortunes. Their example was followed by some of the richest and most considerable men in Scotland; and from that very day we may date our three, four, and five per cent. premium of exchange on London bills.

"We now severely feel the balance of trade against us. Before Scotsmen became stockjobbers, we had a deal of English money in Scotland; but now we must have hundreds of thousands of our money in England in the stocks. Formerly the merchant and trader could remit to his correspondent in England at a very easy rate; bills were cheap, and cash was plenty; but now his trade will not afford to give three and four per cent. sight, and his English merchant will not accept of bills at four months (which is the par) when the money is already due by the merchant here. Cash is to be had nowhere but in the banks, and they must pay specie for every bit of English goods sent to Scotland; nay, so assiduous have dealers in English commodities and the English riders been to send and take away the very silver, that it is rare to find five or ten shillings of silver in any house in the country. Ask change of a twenty-shilling note to pay your bill in any tavern in the country, and you shall get five shilling notes as far as they will go. This I take to be the rise of the several five and ten-shilling banks that have lately set up. Merchants, mechanics, and manufacturers, found they could not carry on their business without silver money; and as that was gone, several of them took it in their heads to issue five and ten-shilling notes for their own use: they found a demand for them; and the country people, finding they could not want them, gave Edinburgh notes in exchange for them, as these were too big to be of any service to them: and it is believed, that if the banks at Edinburgh had issued five and ten-shilling notes when the silver began to grow scarce, none of these little banks would ever have been heard of.

"Another great drain of our specie is, a great many of the nobility and gentry residing at London, they must have their rents remitted to them yearly: not to mention the vast sums sent up by the excise and customs, which are all paid in London, except what goes for payment of the civil establishment, and charge of management here."

The banks had been labouring under this drain for a number of years, and tried several plans to provide a remedy, but without any permanent effect—which, indeed, was impossible, so long as the exchange continued so much against Scotland. There was another annoyance to which the banks were subjected—which is thus stated by the writer in the Caledonian Mercury:—
